constitutional character is not denounced by any of its numerous Japanese critics—and happily they are numerous. Yet, beyond question, it is a gross violation of the Constitution. The 28th article of the latter says:—"Japanese subjects shall, within limits not prejudicial to peace and order, and not antagonistic to their duties as subjects, enjoy freedom of religious belief." How can it be pretended for a moment that a father enjoys freedom of religious belief when he is forbidden to have any religious instruction given to his children except at the cost of letting them be drafted into the ranks of the Army? Freedom of religious belief hampered by such a condition is a mere farce. It is perfectly well known who are the Japanese educationists responsible for this monstrous legislation. They are the so-called Daigaku-ha (University Section), as opposed to the Meikei-ha (High Normal School Section) and the Mombu-ha (Educational Department Section). They are the men whose shibboleths are chū-kun aikoku-shin (loyalty and patriotism) and hokusei hoson (eclectic nationalism). At the head of all the qualities essential to a good subject they ostentatiously place "loyalty." Where is their own "loyalty?" What respect can they have for an EMPEROR whose Constitution they thus trample under foot? Do they expect to educate a sentiment of loyalty among the youth of the nation when they, the elders, set the example of flagrantly violating their SOVEREIGN'S most solemn ordinances?

Of course we well understand that this project is directed chiefly against Christianity. Buddhism is at present moribund. It has a huge body of priests; it has magnificent temples, and it levies enormous sums from the people for its support; but it grossly neglects the first function of religion, namely, the cultivation of a high moral standard among the young people of the land. A creed which has no place in the hearts of the nation's children is a creed with one foot in the grave. Very different were the Buddhists of former times; the men who made Japan's civilization. Education was practically in their hands. The school was a part of the temple; the priest was the village pedagogue. The statesmen who planned the Restoration of 1867 were great in many ways, but they made one stupendous error: they drove the priesthood out of the sphere of education and they provided nothing to fill the moral vacuum thus created. As for the priests, they tamely accepted the situation. They failed to see that the disestablishment of their creed and the confiscation of their revenues were mere pin-pricks compared with the deep stab their religion received when it was banished from the child life of the nation. They have never made any attempt to recover their old position, and their apathy amounts to a public confession that no Buddhist parent need believe sufficiently in Buddhism to include its doctrines, its precepts, and its service in the education of his children. Buddhism receives no new hurt from this uncivilized and disloyal legislation for which the Department of Education and the High Council of Education are prepared to be responsible, since Buddhism has already consented to be eliminated from the schools and is quite content to purchase military exemption by self effacement. As for Shinto, it has no part in the discussion. It is a cult, not a creed. Its sphere is in the cemetery not in the life of the people. But the Christians believe that children should be brought up in the path of Christianity. They have established schools for that purpose, and they would rather suffer any material sacrifice than be compelled to make no provision for the moral education of their sons. It is against the Christian then, that this legislation is directed. The leaders of the "University Section" believe that Christianity can not exist side by side with loyalty and patriotism. They have set up a religion of their own; a religion based on the heavenly ancestry of their sovereigns and the divine origin of their land. They have an indisputable right to that religion. If they sincerely believe in it, they are just as much entitled to profess it and to preach it as the followers of the Nazarene are to assert his godhead and to proclaim his gospel. But they have no manner of right to make it the compulsory religion of the schools, public and private, to the exclusion of all other creeds. That, however, is precisely what they are doing. They have taken steps that their own doctrine shall be taught in the schools under the ægis of a law which professes to interdict all religious instruction. Thus they violate the EMPEROR'S Constitution while professing to make loyalty the principle of their lives; they violate the laws which they have themselves framed, and they reduce their country to the low level of mediæval intolerance. It is a sorry spectacle for the friends of Japan to have to witness, and we observe with the sincerest satisfaction that not one leading journal in the country endorses such procedure.

THE TAXATION OF FOREIGNERS.

SOME interesting problems are under discussion with regard to the taxation of foreign residents after the Revised Treaties go into operation. Chief among these problems is the levying of the Business Tax. Reference to the Business Tax Law shows the following provisions:—First, according to the 13th Article, returns of businesses liable to taxation must be sent in to the Authorities by January 31st every year. From this Article it would seem that, since a business can not possibly be taxed before data for assessing its liability are in the hands of the Authorities, there can be no taxation before February next. Such is said to be the view entertained in some quarters. But it is open to query, inasmuch as the returns furnished in January are not necessarily intended for purposes of future taxation only. They may also be designed to show the taxable transactions of the period prior to January. That, indeed, would be so in the great majority of instances, and it is possible that the figures sent in during January next may be taken as bases for collecting taxes from August 4th of the preceding year. The second provision which suggests food for reflection is contained in the 21st Article of the Law. It says:—

Taxes shall not be collected on newly established businesses until the year after their establishment. In the case of the following newly established businesses taxes shall not be collected until the third year after the year subsequent to their establishment:—banking, insurance, warehousing, manufacturing, printing, transport (land, water), landing, docks and wharfs.

What is meant by a "newly established," or "newly opened," business for the purposes of this Article? Obviously the intention of the exemption granted to newly established businesses is to enable them to attain a stable position before being subjected to fiscal imposts of any kind. On the other hand, it is technically possible to assert that a business must be classed as "newly established" when it is registered for the first time. From that point of view all the businesses carried on by foreigners in this country would be "newly established," according to legal phraseology, from the time of their registration, and as they can not be registered before August, some of them would not be liable to taxation before August 1900, and some not until August 1902 (N.B.—1903 would be the third year after the year subsequent to registration, according to English reckoning, but 1902 is the year according to Japanese arithmetic). This view also is said to be taken in some quarters, but it is not a view for which foreigners are at all likely to contend, since it involves an evident subterfuge. The Law refers to businesses newly established in the sense of being actually commenced de novo, not in the sense of being registered for the first time. Thus, when the Law went into operation originally, businesses already existing were brought immediately within its purview, whereas businesses freshly started were granted exemption. The trades and occupations carried on by foreigners in this country are, for the most part, old established affairs, and there will be no disposition to save them from taxation by a quibble obviously opposed to the intention of the Law. Some among them will doubtless be entitled to temporary exemption, but they will be the exceptions.

The last question raised has reference to the Prefectural, City and District Land Taxes. It is alleged that the Central Government sent to the Governors of Kanagawa, Hyogo, and so forth instructions that these taxes should be levied from the date of operation of the Treaties, but that the Governors objected on the ground that the Local Land Taxes must be regarded as an outcome of the Imperial Land Tax, since their maximum rates are fixed with regard to the latter, and consequently where the Imperial Land Tax is not levied, Local Land Taxes can not be imposed. This story appears to us to be unworthy of credence. In the 18th Article of the Anglo-Japanese Revised Treaty, it is provided that when the Foreign Settlements are incorporated with the Japanese Communes, "existing leases in perpetuity under which property is now held in the said Settlements shall be confirmed, and no conditions whatever, other than those contained in such existing leases shall be imposed in respect of such property." The form of these perpetual leases is fixed by Convention, and the charges to which the land is liable are clearly set forth, namely, so much for rent and so much for foreign policing. It does not appear that any other imposts may be levied on the land.

THE SENDAI AFFAIR CONNECTED WITH MR. SNYDER.

So many conflicting reports have been spread in Sendai in reference to the manner in which the affair connected with Mr. Snyder ended—and some of them have, we understand, been circulated in Tokyo—that it seems important to state just what did happen. It appears that the chief promoters of the agitation were soshi, and that one very dangerous fanatic who calls himself the Avenger of Wrongs, Matsumoto by name,—he resides in Miyamachi—did actually threaten Mr. Snyder with violence in an indirect manner. Mr. Snyder informed the police of the threat and of the fact that Matsumoto had called at his house during his absence. In order to pacify the ignorant people whose animosity had been stirred up, Mr. Snyder was advised by his Christian friends and others to meet the father of the child whom he had bound and to make some kind of apology to him. The apologising was done by Mr. Hayasaka, Mr. Snyder's right-hand man, and the fact that it had taken place was proclaimed far and wide. The report that the Governor of Miyagi and the Mayor of Sendai called on Mr. Snyder and told him that his life would be in danger unless he apologised is quite false. Mr. Chikami, the present Governor of Miyagi, is far too shrewd a man and too well acquainted with international usages to be guilty of any such folly. The story that the matter was reported to the American Consul by the Japanese authorities is made out of whole cloth. The whole episode was very silly and would not be worth writing about were it not for the light it throws on the constitution of Japanese society in a large provincial town. It would be unfair to omit to note that the local authorities have done all in their power to allay excitement and have taken steps to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of similar incidents by impressing on school teachers their obligation to instruct their pupils as to how they ought to conduct themselves towards aliens. The drunken policeman has been dismissed from the service. It seems to us that so long as that curse of modern society in Japan, the soshi, is paid by political leaders and is found residing in the midst of peaceful citizens always on the look-out for an incident which will bring his stout club into request on one side or the other, there is no saying what proportions a very trifling occurrence may suddenly assume. For these roughs believe in no half-measures and value their own lives little less than those of the victims of their violence. If Sendai report is to be credited, the recent political meetings have given a new impetus to soshi lawlessness in Sendai, and there is a feeling that Count Okuma had some warrant for classing his political opponents with semi-civilised American champions of lynch law or barbarous South Pacific tribes in respect of the language which they use and the practices to which they give their sanction.

But, as a matter of fact, neither of the political parties has a monopoly of this kind of thing, and, since the soshi have virtually disappeared from Tokyo, we may reasonably hope that they will not long find an asylum in provincial towns. England had her soshi not so long ago; Ireland has them still; they abound on the Continent of Europe, and perhaps it would be too much to expect that Japan should be entirely free from them.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN POLICY.

The Fiji Shimpō, with unflagging energy, sustains the strange campaign it inaugurated recently against the Foreign Office. It declares that Japan is now in a more dangerous position than she was even at the time of the Otsu incident, the peril being that, unless she adopts resolute measures, she will be pushed totally out of the Chinese arena by Western States. By "resolute measures" our contemporary means, of course, that Japan should not be content with a mere promise that no part of Fuhkien will be alienated. She ought to acquire a position such as will enable her to secure the fulfilment of the promise. In other words, she ought to obtain a naval base in Fuhkien. That would be a step in advance of any Far-Eastern precedent. Germany, Russia, England, France and even Italy, all had pretexts of some kind for the demands they made upon China, but Japan can not even point to an outraged missionary. However, the Fiji Shimpō is not troubled by any considerations of that kind.

We wonder whether this campaign will educate public opinion to results such as were reached in the case of Korea five years ago. There is a strong resemblance between the methods of the newspapers to-day and their methods then.

LAND AND MARINE TRANSPORT TO HOKKAIDO.

Arrangements have now been completed between the Japan Railway Company and the Transportation Company (Tsuun-Kaisha) for the overland carriage of goods from Tokyo and other parts of the main island to Hokkaido, the connexion between Aomori and Hakodate being made by a service of good steamers. The transport of goods and passengers from the southern islands to the northern has hitherto fallen almost entirely to the ships of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and latter is expected to engage in sharp competition rather than allow its business to be diverted into other channels.

MEETING OF CHIEF PUBLIC PROCURATORS.

There is to be a meeting of all the chief public procurators in Tokyo, in order that instructions may be given to them in connexion with the operation of the new Civil and Commercial Codes, and with the inauguration of Mixed Residence. It was supposed that these officials would have been summoned simultaneously with the Local Governors, but the authorities have preferred to convene an independent meeting.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

The hold which divination still retains on the minds of the uneducated in Japan is very noticeable in large provincial towns, where in street after street the well-known fortune-teller's signboard meets the eye of the passer-by. The Fūsoku Gwahō, which amid a mass of badly arranged and superfluous matter occasionally gives publicity to facts of considerable interest, in No. 184, under the title of Yuki-uranai (Snow Augury) furnishes an account of a number of popular notions as to the weather that may be expected when certain indications are present. It will be observed that many of these ideas differ little from those current in England among the conservative section of the agricultural classes, many of whom still consult "Old Moore's Almanac" and other weather prophets. All over Japan, says the Fūsoku Gwahō, heavy snowfalls are considered to be signs of an abundant harvest the following season. In Nara, Gifu, and adjacent provinces it is a common saying that the presence of a large number of small birds in the autumn corn and their eagerness to obtain food is an indication of a severe winter. In Kanagawa, Shizuoka, and Kōchi it is said that a fall of snow is preceded by the collecting together of a number of sparrows and by the screeching of a large number of hawks. In Niigata people say that early autumn tints are an indication of early snow. When the lemons are well covered with leaves as they hang on the trees, it is a sign that heavy snow will fall, say the inhabitants of Shiga, Fukui, and Shimane. The Shiga people assert that a heavy snowfall is indicated by the stags only roaring once in the autumn.

Many of the sayings given by the Fūsoku Gwahō are founded on silly superstition, but those which concern the habits of birds and animals doubtless contain more than a grain of truth, as there is little doubt that most animals and many birds are far more susceptible of subtle climatic influences than human beings. Farmers in England, for instance, are sure of coming rain, when sheep begin to feed at an earlier hour in the morning than is usual. In Japan even the sea is represented as furnishing data for forecasts of the weather. In Fukui it is said that when sea water becomes clear about mid-autumn the winter will be mild, but if at the beginning of the winter season the water is still in a disturbed state a severe winter may be expected. The Fūsoku Gwahō quotes sayings connected with the appearance of certain autumn fruits that are said to indicate snow. Then rain on certain days is supposed to be a sign of continual snow falls. Itching of the feet and hands is said by the Hiroshima folks to prognosticate rain or snow. All these indications are studied by sharp diviners and relied on in the weather forecasts which, in return for small fees, they supply to anxious farmers.

The following books deserve a passing notice. Dr. Inoue Enryō has published a little book entitled Tetsugaku-hayawakari (Philosophy Made Easy). It is written in a semi-colloquial style and is designed to be within the comprehension of persons of little education. It gives a short account of the different schools of philosophy and of the chief writers, and would prove a suitable text-book for elementary classes in schools. The work sells at 15 sen per copy at the Kaihatsusha, Nishiki-chō, Kanda, Tōkyō, and may be recommended to foreigners studying Japanese on account of its lucid and forcible style.

Mr. Owada Kenju, the lexicographer, has been for some time engaged on an elaborate work on Japanese literature, whose publication was announced for the end of last month. It professes to be a minute history of both ancient and modern literature, divided into five volumes, each volume being about 300 pages in length. Vol. I. deals with ancient literature; Vol. II. with the literature of the Middle Ages; Vol. III. with the literature of the last century; Vol. IV. with modern literature, and Vol. V. contains various chronological data and a glossary of the language used by the writers cited. The price of the work is 40 sen per volume and the title Nihon-Daibungakushi (A History of Japan's Greatest Books).

The Seiyō Tetsugaku-Shōshi (小史), by Dr. Nakajima, gives a history of western philosophy. Though called a "Short History," it extends over 1,100 odd pages, and is furnished with a large number of portraits. Vol. I. costs 1 yen 30 sen and Vol. II. 1 yen 70 sen. The Fuzambō, Omote-jimbōchō, Kanda, Tōkyō, are the publishers.

In the Shigaku Zasshi (History) we read that the history of Japanese Art to be sent to the Paris Exhibition, the compilation of which has been entrusted to Mr. Fukuchi Mataichi, is approaching completion. Mr. Fukuchi has traversed the country, he tells a member of the staff of the Shigaku Zasshi, in search of specimens of the art of various ages and has had photographs taken of each chef d'œuvre that he came across in his travels. Among the heirlooms of the Nara Shōsōin he found several masterpieces which few people have been privileged to see. He has ready for publication more than a hundred photographs and 500 pages of printed matter. The history is divided into 3 periods. The first goes back to the dawn of history and ends with the Tembiō era (A.D. 729-748). The second begins with the Kōnin era (A.D. 810), and goes down to the fall of the Kamakura Bakufu, and the third covers the Ashikaga era and part of the Tokugawa age. The manuscript of the book is now in the hands of the translator, and the work will be published in Japanese and French some time this year.

The 史學界 Shigakkai (The Historical World) is a new monthly, covering about 100 pages and selling at 10 sen per copy, published by the Fuzambō. Its raison d'être is stated in its pages to be the collection of more general information on historical subjects than is wont to appear in the Shigaku Zasshi, the contributors to which are a set of specialists. The material published in the first number is classified under some 9 headings. But, whether the number of reliable writers on historical subjects in Japan warrants the establishment of a new organ is open to doubt. The Shigakkai does not profess to confine itself to Japanese history, however, but purports culling interesting chapters from the histories of other countries.

In the Taiyō Mr. Omachi Keigetsu elaborates the theory that in most countries of the world civilisation originated in the south and worked northwards, and affirms that civilisation has always contained elements of weakness, which have resulted in the highly refined southerners being ruled by the lardy warlike northerners. It is well that we should recognise, says Mr. Omachi, that great refinement, taste for arts, and keen appreciation of luxuries have in the history of the world over and over again undermined those manly qualities the retention of which is indispensable to national independence. This is well expressed in our term 文弱, bunjaku, the weakness of refinement or exclusive devotion to literary pursuits. It is this principle that accounts for the fall of the ancient Greek and Roman empires; and in our own history the real cause of the substitution of the Fujiwara rulers by the Taira and of the overthrow of the Taira by Minamoto was that luxury and refinement gradually engendered effeminacy, the sure precursor of defeat in battle. The one reason why Kyōto and Osaka for so many centuries were never able to offer anything like a stubborn resistance to the usurpers of authority who attacked them was that they had for a very long time been the centres of Japan's civilisation, the home of refinement, art, and literature. It is only in an imaginary world that the pen is mightier than the sword. In the actual world it is not so. The theory that the north is destined to rule the south, says Mr. Omachi, is strikingly illustrated by the steady advance of Russia towards the Chinese capital. While China is boasting of her literary tastes and attainments, giving out to the world that she alone is truly civilised and all the world is barbarian in comparison with her, piece by piece of her empire is being snatched from her by the less refined but warlike Cossack and the ambitious Teuton.

The Taiyō gives an account of the Japanese School established at Foochow called the 東文學堂, Tōbungakudō. It is designed for high-class Chinese. Mr. Okada Kamejirō, who speaks Pekingese, is the principal teacher. Up till lately there have been 100 pupils in attendance, whose aim is to make themselves acquainted with learning by means of the Japanese language. But the change in Government in China affected the institution seriously, and the number of attendants has dropped to 40. The course extends over three years, and graduates are to come over to Japan and conclude their studies here. The school was established by Chinese and receives no support from the Japanese Government. The Taiyō thinks it important to mention this, as it is commonly reported in Fuhchau that Japan has designs on the province of Fuhkien and that the school has been started as a training institution for officials. The Taiyō thinks that the Japanese Government ought to assist the school, as it is helping to extend the influence of the Japanese nation in China.

The articles published in the Yomiuri Shimbun entitled "Japan as seen by Foreign Eyes," summarised by us a month ago, have been followed by a series entitled, "Foreigners as seen by Japanese Eyes," written by a man who signs himself "Tōa-gakujin." The following is a synopsis of his opinions:—The foreigners who come to the East are usually persons with a strong individuality, who take delight in differing from the majority of their fellow-countrymen. Foreigners are pig-headed and extremely independent. In this there is much to admire, but it frequently leads to impoliteness to Asiatics. . . . One point in which they differ from us is in the way they display their feelings on all occasions. It is a canon of Japanese ethics that emotions are to be suppressed and that no outward sign of the state of feeling must be given. There are those who say that foreigners have deeper feelings than Japanese because they display them on the most trifling occasions, but to us this constant display is often a proof of shallowness. Whether the display of emotion or its careful concealment is the better course to be followed is a matter of opinion on which Orientals and Occidentals differ and on which there is much to be said on both sides. To us it seems that a great many foreigners are extremely flippant and that there is a lack of genuineness about their gestures and their words. Speech, laughter, and gesture are often made to do service for the existence of real feeling. The foreigner, on the other hand, maintains that the Japanese is hypocritical in pretending not to feel what he does feel, and that this suppression of feeling leads to misunderstandings of various kinds. If foreigners go to extremes in one direction, it is certain that the Japanese do the same in another. And there is some reason in the complaint of foreigners that the Japanese are very difficult to understand on account of their aversion to the display of feeling. We are said to be lacking in feeling because we do not show it.

This difference of racial temperament shows itself in a very marked manner in intercourse between foreigners and Japanese, and not infrequently makes the society of foreigners absolutely distasteful to us. It is noticeable that the Japanese who get on best with foreigners are very seldom men of any strength of character, and the reason of this may be the radical diversity of nature to which we have referred.

Self-confidence is very highly developed among foreigners, and often leads a man to pursue a course of evil that would be avoided by an Oriental. . . . Speaking generally, the whole nervous system of the Occidental differs from that of the Oriental and makes intercourse between Easterns and Westerns somewhat difficult. Foreigners are much more full-blooded than we are and their actions are much affected by this circumstance.

They are lacking in the diffidence that induces us to entrust delicate transactions to a middleman, or that leads us to seek a formal introduction before approaching a stranger on any business. They would consider it absolutely rude to send a middleman to transact very important business, and even the soliciting the hand of a maiden each foreigner undertakes for himself.

Coming to the subject of morality between the sexes there is a great difference between the East and West. In Japan the prostitute and the geisha do not lose their self-respect and their connection with other members of society in the way that is the case with the fallen woman of the West. Owing to the strictness of Occidental society, for the woman who has once gone astray there is, as a rule, no way back to social respectability. But in Japan many are the women who on the altar of duty to parents sacrifice themselves to a life of shame for a series of years and afterwards return to the bosom of their families with little or no disgrace attached to their names. The end purifies the means. But with the Western harlot it is total abandonment, the loss of all the qualities that distinguish other women. It is not that she likes the life, in most cases, but, driven to it at first for the sake of making a livelihood, she finds that society will not allow her to return to the paths of virtue. Accustomed to the stringent rules of Western society, the foreigner comes to Japan to find a diametrically opposite state of affairs, and as a consequence usually gives the reins to his desires.

It may perhaps be truthfully said that, with the exception of missionaries and married men, there are few foreigners that are living pure lives. We complain of the ineffectiveness of our Oriental systems of morality to restrain vice, but does Christianity produce better results? The foreigners who profess Christianity at home come out here and show by their lives that they are hypocrites. This lapse into licentious living is very manifest among members of the diplomatic corps.

Coming to money matters, the foreigner is keen in looking out for his own profit, and will allow neither blood relationship nor friendship to interfere with his gains. Where money is concerned he will often regard with suspicion persons who are quite honest. It is true that he has had to deal with some bad specimens of Japanese humanity, but the fact that he has trusted the men who have cheated him shows how little he is able to judge of character where Japanese are concerned. . . . But it is only fair to say that, while on the one hand among foreigners we are an absorbing interest in money-making, on the other there is a far-reaching charity, clarity that knows no distinctions of creed or race. . . . Of the missionaries that come to Japan, a great many are poorly educated, and the men who in addition to being learned have force of character are very few. A large number of the missionaries it would be well to ship off to some of the Southern Pacific islands, where the people are quite uneducated. The foreign professors that fill chairs at our University are mostly men who have no name in their own countries and come here to make a reputation, and look forward to obtaining employment in Europe or America as a result of their labours here.

The writer starts with the intention of saying all that it is possible to say against foreigners and carries out his programme faithfully, as the above abstract serves to show, though he tells us at the end of his last article that he has by no means exhausted the list of Occidental defects.

There have been many fruitless attempts to place the study of sociological subjects in Japan on a reliable basis and to insure the collection and classification of facts in a scholarly manner. According to the Tetsugaku Zasshi, the Shakaigaku Kenkyu Kai (Sociological Investigation Society) promises to fulfil all reasonable expectations in this line. The Society is supported by a number of scholars whose reputation and zeal ought to guarantee success. The Society held a meeting in December last in the Education Society Hall near Hitotsu Bashi, at which various papers were read. Dr. Motora discussed "the Standard of Living" in Japan. Mr. Ogawa Shigejiro's subject was "Society and Crime," in which he traced the connection of social conditions and customs with crime. At a meeting held in January Dr. Tsuboi read an essay on "The Life of the Ainu," and Mr. Ukita Kazutami discoursed on "The Sociological Study of Society." The Society issues a magazine in which are published the papers read at their meetings and other articles. The magazine is called the Shakai. The first number appeared in February. It is not to be confounded with the Shakai Zasshi, now defunct, which was a short time before its decease amalgamated with the Nihon Shūkyō. The new magazine has the support of Dr. Takagi, of the Imperial University Literary Department, and a number of other learned specialists, and is said to have every prospect of success. The first number opens with a portrait of the father of modern Sociology, Auguste Comte, and contains the following contributions:—"Congratulatory Address," by Dr. Katō, on the founding of the Society; "On the limits of Sociological Inquiry," by Dr. Ariga; "Standards of Living," by Dr. Motora; "The State of the Poor in Japan," by Mr. Kure Bunsō; and "Methods of Sociological Investigation," by Dr. Takagi. Among the miscellaneous items, "The Effects of the New Civil Code on Family Life," and "The State of Society in China," are discussed. The investigators have a virgin soil to work on, and problems of great interest and importance await the solution which carefully collated facts alone can furnish.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun gives an interesting account of a cloisonné picture prepared by Mr. Namikawa Sōsuke for exhibition in Paris next year. As a work of art it is said to surpass anything that has been produced in the same line. The scene represented was designed and painted by Mr. Watanabe Seitei. It consists of a river of sparkling water running through prettily grouped pine-trees and oaks with towering mountain heights as a back ground, from behind one of which peeps the autumn moon. The dimensions of the picture are 4 ft. 8 in. by 3 ft. 2 in. (Japanese measurement). The following is Mr. Namikawa's account of the difficulties he encountered in executing his design. "Ever since August, 1897, I had been puzzling over the details of the work of art I had decided to prepare for the Paris Exhibition. The rapidity with which the work was eventually completed was the result of months of careful study of every minutia affecting its success. The arrangement of the shades of light, which to a skilled painter might prove a very easy matter, in Shippō-yaki taxed all my powers. Some idea of the difficulty of the work will be given by my saying that I used some 300 different ingredients in mixing colours. Every tree, every branch, every twig, every leaf has its shade of colour. In order to make the colours of different parts of the picture faultlessly uniform, as they would be in nature, I had to be sure of using the same enamels, and to do this every enamel that had been used had to be labelled and kept separate from its fellows. I have been engaged in making cloisonné for 19 years. It is not a paying business. The number of enamels that have to be used and the extreme care required in mixing and baking means that there are many failures and consequent losses. To make up for these, high prices have to be charged for the successful articles. This being so, I have always looked forward to a time when Japanese cloisonné should make a market for itself in rich Western lands. Already I have innumerable customers, specially in Germany, where of late there are not a few persons who are prepared to lay out a thousand yen on a single article. I live in hopes that this Paris exhibit will open the eyes of Occidentals to the capabilities of the art."

In the pages of the Tōyō Tetsugaku, Dr. Inoue Enryō urges the importance of a chronological reform in Japan. The system of reckoning time in vogue for many centuries was borrowed from China, and began to be followed in A.D. 645, the Taikwa being the name of the first year-period. Since that time, says Dr. Inoue, there have been some 250 periods. Hardly anybody remembers them all, and consequently allusions to ancient history where dates are important often become quite unintelligible. Various substitutes for the present system have been proposed. Dr. Inoue discusses each in turn in the following manner:—(1) The present year is said to be the year 2,559, reckoned from the accession to the throne of the Emperor Jimmu. But nothing is known of the history of the first 1,300 years of this period; therefore the daily repetition of all these years is a useless task.* It would be advisable to start from the Taikwa era. (2) Foreign chronology should be adopted, in order to facilitate comparison of Japanese history with Western annals. But the birth of Christ is nothing to us as a nation. It may be said that the foreign method of computation was not decided wholly on religious grounds, but the events that took place at the beginning of the Christian era in Europe were of sufficient importance to make it desirable to make the supposed date of Christ's birth the starting point of a new era. If this be so it does not apply to us. Nothing in our history makes it desirable to settle on this special period as a starting point, and, moreover, to adopt foreign chronology would go against the grain with the majority of us. I am quite opposed to any such measure. (3) There are specialists among our own writers who maintain that, in imitation of the Chinese, our early historians lengthened out the period that elapsed between Jimmu's accession and the Taikwa era, in order to make it appear that Japan was not to be beaten in point of antiquity. If, say, about five hundred years were subtracted from the present computation the beginning of the Christian era would be reached, and in that case it would be convenient to adopt western chronology. (4) It is proposed to make the eras correspond to changes in the Government. In opposition to this it is said that such an arrangement would be disrespectful to the throne. Those who are in favour of making changes of Government mark the lapse of time propose only five periods, namely the Nara, the Heian, the Kamakura, the Ashikaga, and the Tokugawa periods. (5) As during so many of the year-periods now in use no event of importance happened, it is proposed to drop out all but the principal ones, thus reducing the number to about 30. Thus in the Tokugawa era the Manyō, Bunkyo, Genji, and Keiō periods might all be included in the Ansei period. It would be advisable to retain the latter in preference to any of the others, as during the Ansei era some great events took place, such as the great earthquake, the assassination of Ii Kamei, &c. (6) In the whole history of Japan no age is so important as the Meiji era, say some. It has witnessed changes which are more fundamental than any recorded in the annals of the nation. Instead, then, of dating history from an event that had little influence on the destinies of the race, why not let this present era be raised to the dignity it deserves? And why not speak of all events as taking place before or in it? According to this arrangement the Meiji era would last as long as we exist as a nation. (7) There are those who would make the eras correspond to the reigns of the different Emperors or Empresses. (8) There are those who would let the era begin with the Taikwa period, and abolish all subsequent year-periods.

* It is, we presume, too much to expect scholars of such a conservative type as Dr. Inoue to come to the conclusion which foreign critics have reached in reference to the highly mythological nature of all that the Japanese histories contain bearing on events supposed to have happened during those 1,300 years. [Writer of the Summary.]

At a meeting held on February 11th at the Tetsugakkan I put these various theories to the vote, in order to see what amount of support they would obtain, with the subjoined results. For No. 1, there were 4 votes, and the others stood as follows:—(2) 0, (3) 0, (4) 12, (5) 7, (6) 80, (7) 2, (8) 2. It is thus seen that the majority are in favour of the Meiji era being made the starting point, the ne plus ante, as it were, in Japanese annals.

Among the miscellaneous scraps of information published in the Seikai-no-Nihon is an amusing anecdote told by Marquis Saionji about Prince Bismarck. "The young are full of hope and ambition and love to think and talk of the future," says the Marquis. "With the old it is just the opposite. Their one delight is to review the past. In this respect there is no difference between the high and the low, the rich and the poor. Even with the greatest men there is nothing they love so well as to live the events of their lives over again in imagination, and recount their adventures to attentive listeners. This was eminently the case with Prince Bismarck. When about 10 years ago I was Minister in Berlin, on the occasion of the German Emperor's birthday, Prince Bismarck gave a dinner to the diplomatic corps, and after dinner entertained us with a most lively account of the history of the Berlin Congress of 1878, his connection with it as President and all the political balls it had set rolling. I went away delighted beyond measure. A few days after I had occasion to attend a meeting at which several ambassadors were present. I alluded to the Birthday dinner, and said how interesting was that account of the Berlin Congress that Bismarck gave. 'Yes,' replied one of the Ministers, 'but I had heard it all before.' Whereupon another Minister who was present, in a low voice, chimed in, 'You gentlemen are fortunate indeed; as for me, I have heard it five times.'"

There is in Japan a great dearth of books on commerce and industry, which is much to be regretted on account of the immense importance of these subjects to the nation at the present time. Mr. Nagata Ken-suke, Lecturer on Geography and History at the Commercial School, who is also connected with the Science Department in the Keiōgijuku, has lately published a book called Shōgyō Shiyō (史要), which covers over 200 pages, and, as its title indicates, furnishes a history of the most important developments of commerce. The first part of the work deals with Japanese Commerce and Industry only. In the latter part of the book is a concise account of Commerce and Industry in European countries, the United States, Australasia, India, and China. The work is issued by Maruzen and sells at 75 sen per copy.

The Seishinron (Mind) by Mr. Sasaki Hidesaburō deals with several important modern psychological questions, especially with the location of the organ of thought and the connection of mind and body. The work is said to embody the results of some years of patient study. It is for sale at Maruya's at 28 sen per copy.

The number of medical works on technical subjects that appear from month to month is very large.

Of colloquial phrase books, English, French, and German, there are any quantity, but very few of these are reliable guides to the learner. When compiled by Japanese they consist too frequently of translations from phrase books published in Europe, by translators whose knowledge of the real meaning of the original is quite inadequate; when compiled by foreigners in not a few instances the Japanese is very lame and unidiomatic. In a work like that of Miss Perry's advertised by Maruya it is quite evident that the English comes from one source and the Japanese from another. Hence the manifest inequality between them. There is room for a larger and more scholarly work than any that is now offered for sale.

PROGRESSIVISTS IN SENDAI.

Count Okuma, Viscount Miura, Mr. Kono Hiroaki and a number of other leading Progressist politicians arrived in Sendai on the evening of the 17th. As a political party the Shimpo-tō is far better supported in Sendai than the Kensei-tō. Count Okuma was met at the station by all the local authorities, and the town of Sendai celebrated the occasion by a display of fire-works. As had been predicted by Mr. Hoshi Toru, the Count did not speak at the large public meeting held on the 19th. A Konshinkai was called for the 18th, and on that occasion both Count Okuma and Viscount Miura delivered their message to their Sendai supporters. As this friendly gathering was not advertised in the papers, not a few persons anxious to hear what the Count had to say in reply to Mr. Hoshi Toru's vehement attacks, were not present at the Konshinkai, and had to rely on the reports of the speech given in the local papers, which were more detailed than usual. The chief plank in the platform of the party as revealed in the various speeches delivered on the 18th and the 19th was the reduction of taxation as much as possible and the taxing of trade and industry rather than land, where taxation is absolutely necessary. Count Okuma spoke for over an hour. Though his speech was somewhat conversational in style, its tone was dignified and he did not descend to any of the personalities in which his opponents had so freely indulged. Not a few of the prominent citizens of Sendai who heard the speeches of both leaders observed that that of Count Okuma was on a higher level and carried conviction with it to thoughtful people, though Mr. Hoshi's utterances were doubtless better adapted for captivating the unthinking masses. Count Okuma doubtless acted wisely in choosing not to appear at the Public Meeting of the 19th, for it was a very noisy affair and almost ended in a free fight between the partisans of the rival parties. What the Count had to say did not contain anything specially new or striking. The speech was chiefly devoted to reviewing events which have been repeatedly discussed in these columns, and which it would be wearisome to recapitulate at any length now. The Count said that after giving the whole subject of the increase of the land tax his most careful attention, he had come to the conclusion that the present is not an opportune moment for adding to the burden of the farmer. If the latter measure had to be resorted to, it should be only adopted as a last resource when all other available means of revenue had been utilized to the full. The party to which he belonged had the credit of reducing the amount of the land tax to be levied and that of itself was a satisfaction. In taxation the principle for which he contended was that care should be taken not to lessen the staple products of the country, not to increase the hardships of the mass of the people, and not to injure the future prospects of the nation. Surely the burdens of the lower classes were already heavy enough, without our increasing them further. It is an undeniable fact that in all the great countries of the world the present tendency is to tax the luxuries and not the necessities of life, to levy as few direct personal taxes as possible and to rely on indirect taxation as a source of revenue. . . . Already among Eastern countries we are the most heavily taxed. China's rates are far lower than ours, and as for India, though it has the reputation of being an over-taxed country, its taxes are as light again as ours. Among European countries Austria's land tax is said to be the heaviest, but even that is not more than half of what our farmers have to pay. . . . The opposite party has denounced us as a set of robbers because we have opposed the increase of taxation. It would be difficult to find men using such violent language outside of America, unless it be among the uncivilized tribes of the Southern Pacific islands. That there should be men of our own nationality unscrupulous enough to represent men to whom at various times His Majesty the Emperor has been pleased to entrust the management of the affairs of State as traitors to their country, because they have opposed a policy which they conscientiously believe to be most injurious to the country's highest interests creates unbounded astonishment. . . . Notwithstanding all the claptrap that passes for political oratory, and in spite of the existence of men whose minds are shallow and whose actions are weak, notwithstanding the utter absence of shame which characterizes so many who are anxious to figure as prominent politicians, this seiji age is not so bad as it is made out to be, and the men who are shaping its destinies are neither liars nor traitors. . . . Shallow.

mindful chattering have asserted that the object of our political tour in the North Eastern provinces is to stir up the farmers to revolt. Could any grosser falsehood be invented? What is there in our action to lead to an agrarian riot? Our action has been misrepresented by our foes. We are here to put it before you in its true light. Only men bereft of all feeling of moral responsibility, only the most flippant of politicians could invent such a report. . . . Undoubtedly the times are such that the reduction of taxes is a work of enormous difficulty. Our joining the comity of Western nations must involve increased expenditure in various ways, but I maintain that the government may be administered in a cheaper way than it has hitherto been done by employing fewer officials. My plan is to engage the services of the very best men the country can produce, pay them well, and expect them to work hard. By proper management the present expenditure might be reduced so as to make the increase in the postal rates and the extra land tax unnecessary. To show what is possible in the way of cutting down expenditure I will quote what happened in the 10th year of Meiji. When Okubo was Home Minister and I was Minister of Finance, Okubo proposed that the land tax be reduced from 3 per cent. to 2 per cent. I favoured the plan and it was carried out. At that time the whole revenue of the country did not amount to more than about 5 or 6 million yen, and the reduction of this tax necessitated a lessening of expenditure by one and a half million yen. . . .

But this reduction caused great indignation in the army, and led to an attempt to assassinate me. But we have survived all the troubles through which we passed and I feel that even with one leg the life of the last decade has been worth living. . . . There would be no difficulty whatever in reducing both the land tax and postal and telegraphic rates, and as for the reduction in the expenses of administration it ought to be carried out at once. We are not the only people who are suffering from excessive expenditures. Russia's proposed Peace Conference is dictated by the conviction that the strain of keeping up her armaments while she pushes forward her industry and commerce is more than she can bear. I have come all this way, old and afflicted as I am, to tell you that what our adversaries say is not true. We do not wish to cripple the country by the reduction of taxation. We see our way to doing all that is required for the safety of the empire and the development of the country's resources without increasing the burden of the class of producers on whom the present wealth and prosperity of the country principally depend.

Viscount Miura expressed his want of confidence in the present Government and dwelt more minutely on some of the topics treated by Count Okuma. He was followed by others. At the close of the meeting a resolution was passed in favour of reduction of taxation. The title of the meetings held in Sendai is the 20 Aoku Gento-kai (The N.-Eastern Tax-reduction Association, not the Anti-Tax Association as stated in some Tokyo journals).

On the evening of the 18th, Count Okuma and Viscount Miura were entertained at the Yueni-Kwan by a Society which has for its object the construction of a harbour in Miyagi Ken, and by certain leading Sendai members of the Shimpo-to. On this occasion both the guests made speeches. Count Okuma dealt with the harbour scheme at some length, saying that it was a serious defect that there should be no good harbour for large vessels between Yokohama and Hakodate. The idea of making a harbour had been before various Governments during the past 20 years and the desirability of taking action had always been acknowledged. But there were financial and other difficulties in the way. He would recommend the local agitators on this subject to be a little more earnest. The Osaka folks had succeeded where the dead-and-alive Tokyo citizens had failed, and the harbour at the former place was in course of construction. It seemed to him that the Sendai people were greatly lacking in enterprise. This part of Japan was far more backward than many other parts. The town of Sendai looked cleaner than he had seen it a decade ago, but the almost total absence of smoke from factory chimneys was very noticeable. They must not depend so much on the central government, but should help themselves more. Transport facilities throughout the country were in a very backward state, and there was considerable inequality of prices in North-Eastern districts owing to the imperfect means of distributing goods. One of the essentials of progress and proper development in every country was the existence of transport facilities which enabled markets to regulate themselves by sending commodities in from any part of the country where the supply was abundant. The Miyagi Ken folks seemed quite ignorant of some of the most elementary principles of trade and industry. An equal distribution of political power, general intelligence, and wealth was most desirable. The harbour was needed. He, the Count, could do with one leg, but the country could not do without harbours.

Viscount Miura managed to twist the harbour scheme so as to make it serve as an occasion for dwelling on the reduction of taxes.

Count Okuma and Viscount Miura returned to Tokyo early on the morning of the 19th inst.

The Progressist meeting held on the afternoon of the 19th was not so largely attended as that of the Liberals, which took place on the 10th. But the interruption to the speakers was of a far more determined character. On the whole the oratory was very poor. Only one speaker thoroughly delighted the audience and quieted all opposition, and that was Mr. Jumon Shinsuke, a local magnate, formerly Mayor of Sendai. The meeting began at 2.30. Mr. Sawa Bai, the editor of the Sendai Shimbun, the paper which took such a prominent part in the discussion of the local foreign taxation question, gave some details of the privations and hardships of the Miyagi Ken farmers and drew the inference that they were unreasonably taxed. Shouts of "Shut up!" were loud and constant. It was quite evident that the interrupters had attended the meeting with the intention of making a row and that they were of the soshi type. Their voices were often drowned by the noise made by their opponents. The next speaker was Mr. Sato Kiyoshi, of Miyagi Ken, a member of the Diet, whom Mr. Hoshi Toru affirmed had voted in favour of the increase of the allowances of members. This allegation Mr. Sato denounced as a base falsehood. This declaration was the signal for a great uproar and a well-known soshi was so unruly that he had to be removed by the police.

The 3rd speaker was Mr. Suzuki Manjiro, of Fukushima, who was followed by Mr. Kudo Kōkan, from Awamori. The speeches made by these gentlemen were of a very mild nature, and Mr. Kudo went fully into the subject of the purchase of private railways by the State. The audience heard them out, but the appearance of Mr. Hoshi Matsushiro on the rostrum was the signal for renewed disturbances. His subject was, "The wonderful meaning of the term Constitutional Government." But he had nothing to say of special interest to anybody and he committed the grave mistake of replying in angry tones to the comments of certain persons in the audience. This had the effect of lashing the meeting into a fury. A rush was made towards the platform by five or six youths—missiles began to fly about the building. The rostrum was invaded, the table overturned, chairs smashed. The police had a busy and an exciting five minutes, but after turning out five or six of the ringleaders, they succeeded in quieting the audience sufficiently for the proceedings to continue. Mr. Hoshi Matsushiro made another attempt to speak, but nothing would induce the meeting to listen to him any longer, and he retired amidst the hooting of his foes. His failure was largely owing to his utter want of tact. The managers of the meeting did the right thing when they put forward an old man who has made a name for himself in these parts by the intelligent interest he had taken in agriculture. Mr. Jumon Shinsuke is an old friend and associate of the well-known Mr. Tada, of Tokyo, and is an earnest advocate of the adoption of improved methods of agriculture. He began his speech by saying that he was not specially interested in one political party or the other. He was a practical man and he had come to the conclusion that there was very little difference between the moles who worked under the earth and the Japanese farmers who worked above it—for both classes of animals were working in the dark. There were no people in Japan so backward as the farmers. The land tax bore heavily on them because they made so little out of the land compared with what could be made out of it with proper appliances. Barley that in Germany could be bought for 23 yen a hoku cost 48 in Japan, and was not equal to the German barley for brewing purposes even at that price. In no civilized country were farmers to be found whose life was as full of hardship and yielded so little result as those of this country. Mr. Jumon has a wonderful flow of language, in fact is quite a local Enchō in the way that he rolls out his sentences and heaps simile on simile in the most captivating manner. We venture to think there are few subjects, however distasteful to the audience, that Mr. Jumon could not render palatable.

After a heavy speech by Mr. Tanno Yasuji, Mr. Kono Hironaka in a short quiet address on the need of carrying into practice the resolution to which the party had come, brought the proceedings to a close.

A STUDY OF KENSITISM.

Many of the English journals have affected a very superior air in commenting on the Dreyfus case. The terrible wave of illiberalism, of race prejudice, of blind passion that has so disfigured France the last few years is made the ground for the complacent reflection that we are not as other men, i.e. Frenchmen; that our common sense is too profound and solid, our morality too deep-rooted, our self-respect too imperious, to render it possible for us to make of ourselves a spectacle so sorry and despicable.

How easy is it to see the mote that is in our neighbour's eye, and how difficult to observe the beam that is in our own. While the editors are penning their truly Pharisaical leaders, while the orators are making speeches which assume a monopoly of common-sense for England, and a large share of it for themselves, while we are assuring ourselves so complacently that in England there is no race feeling, no religious bigotry, no blood-thirsty passion, while Mr. Kipling tances his Jungo lyre to an air of mingled piety and boastfulness that is absolutely nauseating to a man of average modesty—while all this is going on, England herself is the scene of an agitation which makes a sober observer wonder whether after all progress has been only on the surface, and whether the crowd is much more reasonable than in the days of Titus Oates.

The mention of Titus Oates, by a natural association of ideas, brings us to John Kensit, the originator of the new "No Popery" cry with which England is now ringing. There is unfortunately no doubt that Kensit has been most widely successful in his appeal to the lowest passions and the most vulgar prejudices. The new crusade, as he has the impudence to style it, has supporters not only among the rabble of Clerkenwell and Bethnal Green, who see in it fine possibilities of amusement after their own heart, but grave middle-class men, sober people, who should know better; even a few aristocratic noodles, have been so misguided as to throw in their lot with this brazen brawler. The Kensit boom flourishes, and probably pays. From the description in the Daily Telegraph it would appear that one of the great meetings—that held at St. James's Hall—was attended by grave grey-beards and substantial men of business; that frantic cheers were raised for Ken-sit; and that his appearance on the platform was greeted with most extraordinary enthusiasm. Kensit is even a possible candidate against Mr. Arthur Balfour at East Manchester, for Mr. Balfour's refusal to listen to the counsels of bigotry in regard to the Irish University question has saddened the Protestant "Stalwarts" against him. If East Manchester so loses its self-respect as to replace an enlightened, amiable, high-souled, and well-mannered politician like Mr. Balfour for a person of the Kensit calibre, it will certainly be not the first instance of electoral folly, but it will be truly one of the most striking.

Who is this Kensit? Truth has done some service in making known to the public his goings and comings before he emerged into the fierce light which beats upon the St. James's Hall platform. Kensit is a postmaster of Evangelical principles. Some years ago, he became convinced of the necessity of combating the pernicious Romanising influences in the Church of England. He published, with this righteous aim in view, a number of obscure pamphlets such as "The Priest in the Confessional," the character of which can easily be guessed from the title. Suffice to say that every filthy suggestion and foul innuendo was to be found in these books, which enjoyed much the same type of popularity as that class of gutter literature whose Paternoster Row is Holywell-street, and which is occasionally hawked late at night in the Strand. These pamphlets were supplied broadcast for a few pence, and no doubt brought the author a fair profit. At length, however, this game was stopped, and Kensit had to look for another means of obtaining a lucrative notoriety.

Fortunately for him, the supply of blockheads and fanatics never runs short. What says Robert Macaire to dear stupid Bertrand when he—Macaire—found company promoting too hazardous, and proposed instead to establish a new religion? "Le jour de la société en commandite passe; mais les badauds ne passent pas; occupons nous de ce qui est éternel." Kensit, like Macaire, turned his attention to the eternal, and exploited the badauds for all they were worth.

He commenced to enter Ritualistic Churches during service, to shout insults to the clergy, to disturb the worshippers, to brawl and rave, and even to attempt to tear the candles and vases from the altar. He opposed rejection by physical violence, and the more disgraceful the "scene" the greater his satisfaction. Sweet, indeed, are the uses of advertisement. Kensit began to furnish the newspapers with paragraphs. A Kensit scene would often fill the placards of the lower-class papers. Then some occurrence, more scandalous than its predecessors, drew the attention of the graver journals to the agitation so artfully manufactured. Reviews and magazines began to publish condemnations and apologies; questions were asked in Parliament; Church dignitaries were forced into the arena. Kensit had succeeded. His fame, at first local, was now national.

There has been for some time smouldering in England a deep-seated, and on the whole a righteous, dislike to the innovations of the ultra Ritualistic clergy. It has displayed itself from time to time in strong protests to authority; and it is impossible not to sympathise to some extent with those who view with disapproval any tincture of Romanism in the National Church. But up to the time of Kensit these worthy people had for the most part conducted themselves generally with moderation, and always with decency. It remained for Kensit to turn sober law-abiding Protestant Churchmen into rowdies and profaners, or into the accomplices of rowdies and profaners.

How well he has succeeded is too evident. Kensit is now a name to conjure with. Kensit has, in a section of the Church, supplanted Christianity. The brawling party do not call themselves Churchmen, but Kensit's Men. They concoct and sing blasphemous rhymes which would be hissed at the lowest free-and-easy ever held at the Pig-and-Whistle or the Spotted Cow. The Salvation Army, in which reverence is rather at a discount, would reject the profane and silly jingle which is called "The Battle Hymn of Kensit's Men." This specimen of what the mixture of cupidity and religiosity—it cannot be dignified by the name of religion—can be capable is taken from Truth:

The Church is in a awful state.
With Richelists and such:
The Pope 'e won't 'ave long to wait
For most of 'em—not much!
So Mister Kensit's took the 'ump
(And tightly too, says I),
And when 'e goes upon the stump
You'll see the leaflets fly.
Then pack your traps and clear the way; depart, be gone, get hout!
And make no noise, or Kensit's boys 'il show you
'oo can shout.
No more of yer 'anky-panky, now, no more of yer Romish rot.
For Johnny K. is hon the way to bust the blooming lot.

This is a noteworthy specimen of the quality of the New Crusaders. Can it be imagined that any men with an earnest religious purpose, with a particle of reverence for things which many people still consider holy—would express their views of a grave question of Church discipline in an affectation of the argot of White-chapel and Seven Dials? The mere fact of such a contemptible thing having been written and published by the Kensittes should make every sensible and high minded man separate himself from such a cause.

But worse follows. Another verse describes either an actual or ideal Kensit scene, and the plain inference is that all true Kensittes should go and do likewise. Kensit (or a follower) is supposed to have entered a church and commenced a protest. The clergymen mildly remonstrate.

"Sit down," says 'e. "I won't," says I.
'Then, verger, turn 'im out!"
With that I lets a Bible fly,
And lands 'im on the mont.
To stop 'is Richelistic row,
I knucked 'im off 'is perch;
And, there and then, we taught 'im 'ow
To desecrate a church.
Then pack your traps, &c.
My friends all stuck to me like bricks,
The 'ymn books flew like 'ail;
With one of them big candlesticks
I smashed the halter 'ail.
The idolaters set up a squall,
But soon they got the toe;
We made a 'olesome Gospel 'all
Of that galanty show.

So pack your traps, &c.

This is religion—this is Kensitism in 1899. The fact that such a man and such a cause can gain so much popularity at the very end of the most enlightened century in history may be amusing to the cynic, but it is surely rather saddening to a serious man. It is, one is almost inclined to say, infinitely more disgraceful in England than the Dreyfus affair to France. Tremendous interests are bound up with the final settlement of the Dreyfus affair—interests of vital consequence to France, and she may be pardoned if she has a little lost her head. But that, after all the scientists and philosophers have had their say, England should still be bitterly divided over the question of a few brass candlesticks; that the party who wish to call a "table" a "table" should go about seeking to break the heads of those who wish to call it an "altar"; that a few bars of music or a few yards of linen surplice more or less should be considered serious questions for presumably sane men to quarrel over—this is something of which England, the most free and enlightened country of the world, should be deeply ashamed. Most truly did Carlyle say of John Bull, "His religions, his Church systems, his Protestantisms, are of a kind unexampled in the world."

Indeed, there must be something extremely morbid in the mind of England—the popular mind, that is—just now. The nauseous rubbish poured out over Kipling—who, after all, is only a dexterous rhymester and tale teller who has had the good fortune to hit the popular taste—is not reassuring evidence of the mental manliness of the age. The recent exhibition of hysterics and self-advertisement would have been ridiculous if the fate of empires had been hanging on Kipling's life or death. Consider this drivel which The Times thinks worthy of publication:—

TO RUDYARD KIPLING, ESQ., FROM THOS. ATKINS.

There's a rag'lar run on papers, since we 'eard that you was ill;
An' you might be in a 'ospital, the barracks is so still;
We 'ave all been mighty anxious, since we 'eard
it on parade;
An' we 'aint no cowards neither, but I own we was afraid.

An' we all prayed 'ard and earnest:
"O Gawd, don't take 'im yet!"
Just let 'im stop and 'elp us:
An' warn, 'Lest we forget!"

The sergeant said: "'E won't get round. It's 'three rounds blank' for 'im!
'E won't write no more stories!" And our 'opes was bloomin' dim.
But you 'ad always 'elped T. Atkins, an' though things did look blue—
Well! we ain't much 'ands at prayin, but we did our best for you.

"'E mustn't die; we want 'im!
O Gawd, don't take 'im yet;
Spare 'im a little longer!
'E wrote 'Lest we forget!"

We 'eard that you was fightin' 'ard—just as we knew you would;
But we 'ardly oped you'd turn 'is flank; they said you 'ardly could.
But the news, 'as come this mornin', an' I'm writin'
'ere to say,

There's no British son more 'appy than your old friend Thomas A.

"O Gawd, we're all so grateful
You 'ave left 'im with us yet,
To 'old us in, and 'alt us,
Lest we, Lest we forget!"

Tommy Atkins, we are afraid, is not too much given to praying, but if he did pray he would not insult "Gawd" by that particular kind of twaddle. It would be the prayer of a strong man, and not of that most miserable of all "Gawd's" creatures—for we cannot think God (properly spelled) could be responsible for him—a modern newspaper Cockney dialect poet. E.R.T.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RELIGION AND EDUCATION IN JAPAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—We Germans feel often highly amused at the gross misstatements of German affairs which we hear in this country. This was the case when we got from day to day reports concerning an estrangement or even hostilities between the German and American navies in the Philippine waters, reports which were apparently untrue; this was the case, when in the Japanese Parliament the opponents of state-ownership of railways referred to the example of Germany, which was represented as favouring the private-railway system, though in reality there is in Germany scarcely one railway with normal gauge left in private hands.

To-day we have to complain of another gross misstatement made in the Higher Educational Council some days ago in favour of the deplorably retrogressive proposals of the Mombusho. I have it on good authority that Germany and France were represented as excluding religious teaching and worship from their schools. As far as Germany is concerned, exactly the contrary is true. Everybody pretending to be acquainted with her school-system ought to know that the whole instruction in her schools (especially elementary schools) is based on a religious foundation. In all her public schools up to the university, which is no school in the proper sense of the word, i.e. in elementary, middle, and higher schools, as well as in seminaries for school-teachers, religious instruction and worship are a vital part of the school curriculum.

As to France, which pays the salaries of her clergy from the exchequer, it is true that religion is excluded from the curriculum of public, not private schools, but even there, if I remember correctly, an arrangement is made, by leaving out school instruction on Thursdays, so as to enable religious bodies to impart their religious instruction.

On the whole all the Western nations consider religious instruction as an important and indispensable factor of education, and it would be deplorable if Japan, by intolerant school-regulations on the eve of the enforcement of treaty-revision, should prove her difference from them.

I remain, yours truly, SCHILLER.

MORAL STANDARDS OF EAST AND WEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—It would be interesting if the gentleman with the long Latin name, whose personal experiences have been the reverse of mine and those of several of my missionary friends, would extend his testimonies in some of the other points of my recent letter. Perhaps he can give us the names of quiet, rural, American county-seats which are as abundantly supplied with inmates of dens of infamy as are the towns to which I referred,—Furukawa and Wakuya. And possibly he knows of American states in which as considerable traces of phallicism can be found as in Miyagi Ken.

In case the carative contraries cannot be found, would it not be in the interests of a fair statement of the case if the gentleman hereafter adds some modifying or limiting phrase to the name he bears?

Sincerely yours, E. C. FRY.

ENDOWED THEOLOGY AND JAPANESE CHRISTIANITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The letter of your correspondent "T.S.T." needs no lengthy reply from me, as it entirely fails to establish any points that invalidate the arguments stated in my letter of March 23rd, the subject of which was the misunderstanding between the Japanese Kumiai Christians and the American Board, the causes of that misunderstanding, and the lessons which it was designed to teach. "T.S.T." is, I take it, an American Episcopalian, and as such naturally does not feel disposed to figure as a champion of Congregationalism. But my letter has offended him and he attempts an attack on it on general grounds. The endowment of theology is evidently a term that is distasteful to "T.S.T." He and I live in different worlds and mix in different circles of thinkers, and hence it may be hard for "T.S.T." to even understand the point of view of his opponent on this occasion. I, on my part, must confess to considerable difficulty in apprehending on what it is that "T.S.T." wishes to insist in the first part of his letter. Surely he cannot mean to say that a professor of chemistry, history, or physics at a University is on a par with the Bampton Lecturer or a Professor of Divinity as regards liberty to teach what he pleases. Seeley when professor of history was at liberty to teach history in any way he pleased, and his lectures known as "The Expansion of England" contain many startling departures from the traditional methods of teaching history. Granted the competency of an ordinary teacher, it would be quite untrue to say that he is expected to defend or to perpetuate any special doctrine or theory in the way that the Christian miracles and the Divinity of Christ have to be preached and defended by orthodox ministers. It may be said that there are certain scientific truths which all scientific men acknowledge and teach, and "T.S.T." may believe that the theological inventions of Church fathers and fanatical early Christians are to be placed on a level with mathematically or experimentally demonstrated truths. But this of course the majority of thinkers even in so-called Christian countries will not for a moment admit. From the point of view of the Christian minister of the Gospel the endowment of certain doctrines may appear to be the only feasible method of perpetuating them. The less the censorship exercised over men's minds the further do they go in the direction of heterodoxy. The appeal against established authority in the matter of religion is perpetual and world-wide. The questioning of ecclesiastical authority commenced with the Reformation. Protestantism demanded the right to reject the authority on which the giant Roman superstructure rested. But it found it necessary to set up something in its place. It created its own authorities. It interpreted the ancient fathers in its own way. But the principle of liberty of belief and conscience having been established, Protestants began to divide up into sects and subjects, and the right of one set of Christians to legislate for other sets was perpetually denied; and so the thing went on till to-day within the different bodies there are found ministers who differ from each other what used to be considered fundamental points of doctrine, and millions of laymen who, while they attend church for the sake of the music and the pleasant associations that old customs invariably possess for certain minds, no longer believe in any of the so-called supernatural elements of the Christian religion. "T.S.T." thinks that no one can be called "Christian" unless he accepts the dogma of Christ's divinity. But what right has he to draw any such line? Public opinion in Europe and America at the present time in every way possible champions the opposite opinion. The ordinary man of the world does not care a fig what doctrine a man believes or disbelieves as long as his life is straight, that is, as long as a man's conduct comes up to existing local standards.

"He can't be wrong, whose life is in the right" is the universal feeling of the majority of persons who are not paid to teach theology. A clergyman like "T.S.T." is not in a position perhaps to find out the real state of opinion on the uselessness of supernaturalism as a set of doctrines that are supposed to have converting power. The spirit of the age is so much in favour of liberty of belief that no ministers of any denomination that I know of venture to make a special inquiry into the doctrines believed or rejected by the lay members of their congregations. Judicious silence on the subject of personal belief has become the etiquette of Christian Society, and laymen are specially careful not to disclose to prying clergymen any of the secrets of their minds bearing on Christian doctrines. It has come to be a recognised principle that no man has any right to cross uninvited the threshold of his neighbour's soul and lift the veil that hides his "holy of holies" from the gaze of the vulgar crowd. The principle of non-interference as regards individuals and as regards churches of different denominations has been established. The limits of belief and unbelief can only be settled by each individual for himself or herself or by churches for those who are ready voluntarily to bow to the authority of those churches. That truth will fare badly under this system I cannot for a moment believe. I am one of those who think that the more it is sought to endow doctrines the less likely is it that they will prove by survival that they are the fittest. In matters where it is absolutely impossible that one educated, well-read man can know more than another, where clergy and laity are alike in the dark, to expect highly gifted men of great research who have read all that is worth reading on the subject of the future world to bow to the dicta of bishops, presbyters, or priests, or acknowledge these as the possessors of superior knowledge is quite ridiculous. What the Japanese Christians demanded of the American Board is after all only what millions of professing Christians have not only demanded but obtained, namely, the right to reject any doctrines of the foreign Christian missionary that may seem to them to rest on insufficient proof. This right was denied to them by the Board on account of the fact that the Board is the slave of the pernicious systems which Huxley and hundreds of others have condemned—that of endowing certain dogmas of Christianity.

I am, yours, &c.

JAPAN AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The fact that the Higher Educational Council adopted an article on the 22nd instant according to which all religious instruction and worship is to be absolutely excluded from all schools, public and private, having in any way any recognition from the Government, makes it expedient to touch upon the educational policy of the country in its bearing on religion.

A study of educational policy in respect to religion as pursued by prominent nations, seems to warrant the following statements:—

A.—In Europe the State interferes with religion in its favour. This is acknowledged for England. In Germany this is even more emphatically true. Religious instruction is imparted daily, it is obligatory in public and private schools and even where instruction is given in families, and through all grades from the beginning up to entrance into the university or technical schools. Religious instruction holds the first place in every curriculum and receives the most careful attention from educational authorities and teachers alike. The writer knows whereof he speaks from careful and thorough personal investigation and can produce proof on this subject. Every intelligent person, however, can readily convince himself of this fact if he does not know it yet. Emphasis is put here on this fact inasmuch as the Higher Educational Council, in its late discussion which led to the recommendation to abolish all religious instruction from schools, claimed Germany as a precedent for such action. The precedent is emphatically on the opposite side. In Japan, where the tendency of the people is toward English ideals, and where the ambition of the Government is set on German ideals, it would seem strange not to pay heed to this vital element in the moral training of both these nations. This element extends also into the naval and military training of both these nations foremost in everything, including a lofty ideal of patriotism and loyalty, while in England even the merchant marine is not exempt from religious services. In France, too, provision is made by the Government; not only is the clergy (Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish) supported by the State, but also one day a week outside of Sunday is allowed for religious instruction for all pupils of Government schools. The privilege thus accorded and publicly fostered is to be noted. To construe the fact that on other school days only secular instruction is to be imparted as a prohibition of religious instruction in its schools would be an argument singularly absurd,—would in fact miss the whole point. Yet as such it was construed in the question recently before the Higher Educational Council. Even if this Council could rely upon France as a precedent (which it can not), France with its false nationalism culminating but recently in a Dreyfus case, would be no ideal.

B.—In the United States the policy of non-interference is the one that prevails with the Government at large. The few cases of local conduct to the contrary, only prove this general rule; they are only exceptions arising from a mistaken interpretation or application, men at times trying to stand up so straight as to lean backwards.

C.—There is still another policy on this question conceivable, viz. that of interference against all religion, making a State's policy not simply non-religious, i.e., judiciously endeavouring to abstain from all interference, but anti-religious or atheistic,—putting the State in the attitude of a persecutor of religion, an attitude attempted by the French Reign of Terror a century ago. Of all modern countries, Japan seems to be the only one that is essaying this policy. If the recommendations adopted by the Higher Educational Council should become law, Japan would seem to proceed on this policy of educational interference against religion, with vengeance. From what has been said above, it will be seen that if she thinks she may quote France or even Germany as a precedent (as is reported), she is greatly mistaken as to both fact and inference. There is no such precedent in the present educational policy of the leading nations, and it would be difficult to find any in history outside of the Reign of Terror.

There are thus in brief three policies:—

1. What we may call interference in favour of religion, or the general European policy, with variation as to detail.
2. The United States policy—non-interference.
3. The Japanese policy (as advocated at least)—interference antagonistic to religion.

Now in studying what history has to say on the motive principle in national morality, it seems beyond the cavil of a doubt that the following position is true, viz., in all nations the real motive power making for the morality of the people in general has been a religious one. A religious sanction has been the only one ever found equal to the stupendous task of a nation's moral training. True, individuals have often claimed exemption, but (1) their claim has extended no farther than as individuals, and (2) their environments have wielded a powerful influence undetected by themselves, perhaps, while their very antagonism has been deeply rooted in and determined by the very religion they antagonize.

These theses may therefore be fitly proposed here:—

1. Japan is not likely to exempt itself at this juncture from this great law of history. It would not be profoundly, but likely the very opposite, to claim that religion is not to be the deep spring of action for a moral basis adequate to the great needs of Japan.

2. Japan's morals are confessedly weakening, if the testimony of keen and competent observers is to be admitted. Morality is losing its grip upon the people, and especially upon the young men. "The rising generation is devoid of the moral instruction that will give it tone and pure character. The present attempts to teach morality are without heart and without effect." Not even a noble and sufficient intellectual ideal is aimed at, while the affections and the will are left almost totally famished. The old forms and principles are proving themselves inadequate to control or even to seriously influence the modern mind of Japan, while on the other hand the temptations to immorality and self-indulgence under the influx of a material civilization are growing apace. So prominent an authority as Count Okuma is reported to have recently asserted that only a religious basis could secure the moral fibres which modern Japan needs.

3. Japan's need for its youth is therefore not to deprive them of all religious instruction and influence, or to shield them in ignorance from a basis which history has uniformly proved to be the well-spring of life for the morality of nations, even for its own in the past.

4. Japan in its educational policy is therefore emphatically not called on to interfere against religion. Its proper policy may be that of non-interference if there be a real constitutional or practical difficulty in adopting what is above termed the general European policy.

5. It can also be abundantly shown that, from a purely educational standpoint, the youth of Japan should not be kept in ignorance of the religious sphere. History, philosophy, literature, and science all demand that intelligent young men be not ignorant in this one subject alone.

6. Japan's constitution proclaims the principle of religious liberty. This principle must at the very least guarantee the government against interference antagonistic or detrimental to unoffending religion. If the European policy is unadvisable it can only warrant a policy of non-interference akin to that of the United States.

7. If Japan desires to sail along smoothly in the International Ocean her policy on this question ought not to thus diametrically distinguish itself from the chief voyagers in that same ocean. On the contrary her policy would seem to be dictated by the practice of these other voyagers. Japan is perhaps for well-known reasons peculiarly liable to clashing interests if she should attempt to pursue such a course. Conformity to the standards of the nations with whom she is so soon to rank on a plane of equality, rather than an illiberal course likely to handicap her, would seem to be a safe principle of educational statesmanship, as it is in other spheres. Interference against all religion in schools is opposed to the policy of all other nations. It is not proper perhaps to advert here to some possible vested interests that Japan would reasonably prefer to protect.

In conclusion, it may be asked,—why should Japan adopt this policy so opposed to the policies of the rest of the civilized world? That education of its youth in patriotism and loyalty, demands this is certainly an exploded and extravagant fancy. Are there deep reasons of state for doing so? If so, why are they not disclosed? Does history give a warrant for such interference? Is such interference in perfect accord with the privilege of religious liberty guaranteed by the constitution? Is it to the highest moral interest of the nation to debar its youth during the formative period of life under pain of very serious disability from all training in the deeper life springs of morality? Is it, to say the least, proper to put private schools under such disabilities as proposed, when their only sin is that they believe in religion strongly enough to act upon it?—this being their only crime for which this penalty is to be visited upon them. Can Japan afford thus to despise the convictions or at least the policies of the rest of the world, now that she is reaching the goal of her aspiration to sit as full equal at the council board of the nations? Will she willingly handicap herself by a spirit of illiberality at this juncture? In this question, in which many foreigners (very many in other lands) feel is bound up so deeply the moral weal or woe of Japan, can Japan deliberately afford to foster a policy that deprives her rising generation of any moral training worthy of the name? We will let the philosophy of history speak here rather than the vagaries of a few speculative sentiments so cheap and current in these days of superficial materialism and agnosticism. Will such a step enhance the reputation of Japan for judicial fairness in the eyes of foreign nations at this time when the treaties are to put their nationals on a par with a nation that would antagonize all religious sanctions of morality to such an extent as to deem these worthy of severe exclusion from the training of its school population?

Thanking you for your courtesy, I am very respectfully,
H. M. LANDIS.
Meiji Gakuin, Tokyo, April 24, 1899.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The ball given at the Public Hall on Tuesday evening by the St. George's Society was largely attended. The band of H.M.S. Barfleur supplied the music.

On Tuesday evening Bro. A. Bellamy Brown was unanimously elected W. M. of the Orient Mark Lodge of Japan for the ensuing year. Wor. Bro. G. Hodges was re-elected Treasurer.

The old P. & O. steamer Brindisi has been renamed the Dalny Vostok since changing to the Russian flag. She loaded with coal at Nagasaki for Hankow, whence she takes tea to Odessa.

A New York despatch received by a firm in the Settlement states that, owing to the late furious tempest in the Atlantic, 8 English steamers, one American, and one German are missing.

The truth of the story about the discovery of the remains of Andrié and his companions is now out. It was invented by a Russian mine-owner as a joke, and, reaching the ears of a newspaper correspondent, was telegraphed all over the world.

A woman of 23, and her lover, named Ooka, aged 26, committed suicide in a house of ill fame at Eirakucho, Yokohama, early on Wednesday morning by cutting their throats with a knife. The woman was found quite dead, and the man in a dying state. He was sent to Yokohama Hospital.

The schooner Kotsu Maru (350 roku), with Captain Miyoshi Hikoshiro and a crew of four, was caught in a storm on her voyage from Tsushima to Tokyo the other day and capsized. Two persons were saved by a sailing vessel, but the other three, including the captain, are missing.

Captain Sueider (accompanied by his wife and daughter) and the crew of the German barque Atlantic, arrived in Hongkong in a Chinese junk, on April 14th, their vessel, which had sprung a leak, having been abandoned about 60 miles out. She experienced some very rough weather after leaving Sumatra.

A bicycle race took place on Sunday between Mr. J. L. O. Eytton, 53 years, 175 lbs., and Mr. K. J. Kawata, 24 years and 106 lbs. The course was from Sengenshita (Kanagawa) to Kodzu, about 32 miles. The roads were in wretched condition, and much of the journey had to be done on foot. Mr. Eytton, who won with ease, if the expression is allowable under the circumstances, lost his boots in the mud, and finished in his stockings.

About four o'clock on Sunday morning Mr. W. C. Read, who occupies a house on the Ishikawa Bluff, happened to wake, and saw a Japanese stooping over his bed. The burglar bed on observing that Mr. Read was no longer asleep, and was out of the room in an instant. Mr. Read pursued him and fired three shots at the flying figure, but without effect. Two overcoats and a pair of shoes were the chief articles taken, and the overcoats were afterwards found a little distance from the house.

In the early morning of Saturday one of the servants found a down stairs room of the Yokohama N.Y.K. office full of gas. The man, whose name was Sakakibara, lighted a match, when an explosion followed, and the room was at once in flames, the windows, the maps on the walls, and other things being destroyed. The four persons who were in the room were injured about the head, face, etc., and one, Suzuki Nanjiro, was so seriously hurt that he had to be taken to the Jozen Hospital.

A barrister named Nakamura Kumataro, living at Sakumacho, Shiba, engaged a jiriki on Monday near the Shinmei shrine to take him home. The rider was greatly astonished when the jiriki—man, whose name was Tatsuji, took him to a dreary out-of-the-way quarter, and began to attack him, shouting out "You beastly fellow!" The barrister persuaded the man to accompany him to a police station and the matter became clear when it appeared that the coolie mistook his fare for a person who had run away with his wife.

In the French Journal Officiel a Decree has been published instituting a new Government Department, which is to be known as the "Colonial Office." The duties of this new department, which will be quartered in the Palais Royal, will be to collect and give information to the public concerning the French Colonies from an agricultural, commercial, and industrial point of view. Governors, administrators, and other Colonial functionaries, whilst on their leave in Paris, will attend at the disposal of colonists or commercial men. A library and a permanent exhibition will be attached to the office. M. Auricoste, an ex-Deputy, will be at the head of the new office, which will entail no fresh expense.

At a recent meeting of the Yokohama City Council, the principal topic for discussion was the reclamation of foreshores below the Bluff. A resolution was unanimously passed in favour of the application of Mr. Kiujiro Wakizawa and 35 others who propose to reclaim an area of 89,242 tsubo extending from the northern part of the Bluff to the boundary point between the city and Honmoku. This will have to be submitted to the Kanagawa Kencho for official sanction. One of the other applications was made by Mr. Oyamada Shinzo and two other Japanese of Tokyo, reclamation to the extent of 107,137 tsubo being contemplated by them. The third is by a number of Japanese of Tokyo, their project being to reclaim as much as 160,000 tsubo.

Says the Nagasaki Press:—By the firing of the salute in honour of the arrival of H.E. Vice-Admiral Dubassoff, of the Russian fleet, in the harbour on Thursday morning, the British ship Torrissdale suffered material damage from the concussion of the saluting cannon. Three pictures were thrown from the walls, glassware was broken, and other damage done. The captain was in the chart-room at the time and, fortunately, he opened the windows or else they, too, would have been broken. The three cabin port windows—of unusual thickness—were also demolished. It would seem advisable—if not more appropriate—to fire these salutes further down the harbour. By doing this complaint would be avoided and destruction to property rendered barely possible.

The Northern Pacific liner Glenogle, which left Tacoma for Yokohama on Sunday, the 23rd inst., has collided with the City of Kingston, which was on her way to Tacoma from Victoria, and the latter sank. The Glenogle is badly damaged and has put back to Tacoma. She is likely to be considerably delayed. The agents here have no further details of the casualty. The City of Kingston was of American build, and 15 years old, and was the property of the Puget Sound and Alaska S.S. Co. She was of 117 tons register and her dimensions were: length, 246 feet, breadth 33.5 feet, depth 12.5 feet. Her speed was 18 knots and she was employed in running from Victoria to Port Townsend, Seattle, and Tacoma in connection with the Northern Pacific Railway. It is probable the collision took place either in darkness or in a fog, and as this steamer usually carried a large number of passengers it is more than probable that there was some loss of life.

The late Sir John Robert Mowbray was born at Exeter on June 3, 1815, being the oldest son of the late Mr. R. S. Cornish. In 1847 he assumed the surname of Mowbray by Royal license and six years later entered the House of Commons for the City of Durham. He represented this constituency until 1868, when the University of Oxford chose him as their senior member, a position he occupied uninterruptedly till his death. He was President of the famous Oxford Union Debating Society in 1836 and had a distinguished record at Christ Church. In politics a Conservative, he occupied in the administrations of 1858-59, 1866-68 the position of Judge-Advocate-General, and later became a Church Estates Commissioner.

Lady Alcock, widow of Sir Rutherford Alcock, who was well-known to a younger generation of foreign residents in Tokyo, Shanghai, and Peking, died on 13th March of pneumonia, at her residence, St. Margaret's House, Victoria-street, London. She married, first the Rev. John Lowder, British chaplain at Shanghai; and, secondly, in 1862, Sir Rutherford Alcock, who died in 1897. Mr. J. F. Lowder, of Yokohama, is her son. What an entertaining book this gentleman could write of Sir Rutherford and Lady Alcock's experiences in Japan, for he was an eye-witness of the many stirring events that took place in Yedo, Yokohama, and Kobe when Japan was first opened.

Mr. Sim's steam yacht Snowflake ran upon a rock near Miyajima on Monday and partially sank. Mr. Sim was taking a party of foreigners down the Inland Sea, and about two o'clock on Monday afternoon, while the Snowflake was in charge of a special pilot, a native of Onomichi, she ran upon a sunken rock, about six miles from Miyajima. The dinghy went off to a neighbouring island and fetched sampans, in which all on board were safely taken to Miyajima. The nose of the yacht only had touched the rock, the after part being in deep water. At low tide—about five o'clock—she heeled over. The bow stood out of the water, but the after part, including the funnel, sank under water. The yacht has suffered no damage worth mentioning, the keel is not hurt, and everything portable had been taken out of her before she heeled over. Mr. Sim soon obtained the assistance of divers and lighters, and hoped to get the yacht off the rock by Wednesday.—Hogo Evening News.

CHINA NOTES.

The following special telegram, dated Peking, April 16th, appears in the N. C. Daily News:—An urgent telegram from Governor Jao of Kashgaria, to day, states that Russian emissaries (Andjanis) have been caught smuggling firearms to the Tunganis (Chinese Mussulmans) in the New Dominion, and that the near proximity of a large Russian force, west of Yengisar, has stirred the Turkis up considerably and serious trouble is anticipated. In Kashgaria only 1,500 troops of all arms are available, and of these 500 are Mahomedan cavalry whose loyalty under the circumstances cannot be relied upon. The Governor therefore expresses regret that his advice had not been taken last summer when the best troops were being sent to Peking. Further, that there are over 8,000 Russian subjects (Andjanis, Bokharis, etc.) in Kashgar city alone, and the Taotai (Huang) of that Intendancy reported that they are becoming more arrogant and hence he fears trouble, but has no troops sufficient to overawe these people, who in the event of trouble will surely be joined by the indigenous Turkis. Governor Jao therefore asks that Viceroy I'ao Mu of Lanchow be commanded to detach 5,000 of the 15,000 men under him in Kansu, and send them post-haste to Tihua (Urumtsi).

Dispatches recently received from Tihua (better-known to geographers as Urumtsi) the capital of Chinese Turkestan, report that Chang Yin-huan, the cashiered Vice-President of the Board of Revenue, was expected in that city from Hami, the first large Turkish city after leaving the Great Wall, some time during the middle of the present month of April. Further that, instead of being ordered to work on the military post roads between Tihua and Kuldja, as at first commanded, the latest edict of the Empress Dowager concerning ex Vice-President Chang is that he is to be imprisoned at Tihua until further orders. Judging from the barefaced manner in which bribes are demanded by those who just now "run things" in the Empress Dowager's Palace, one cannot help wondering how many tens of thousands taels were paid by the family of Chang Yin-huan in order to procure the edict exempting the aged ex-official from working as a convict on the military postroads, among the mountains of the Tianshan or Celestial range, leading from Urumtsi to Kuldja. In further comment on the sad case of the ex Minister, the N. C. Daily News says:—This, perhaps, is the first time in the history of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George in which a holder of the Grand Cross of the Order has been made a felon and driven into banishment; this high distinction having been bestowed upon Chang Yin-huan in 1897, when he represented his now equally unfortunate Imperial master Kuang Hsu at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee. It, indeed, there were no other excuse for interfering during the coup d'etat of September last, this fact alone could have been sufficient for the Minister of Great Britain to prevent this disgrace to an exalted order of his country.

The following notes from Peking are printed by our Shanghai senior contemporary:—It is stated that soon after his return from the Yellow River and his audience with the Empress Dowager Li Hung-chang presented a memorial resigning his post in Peking and praying that he be permitted to return to his native city to pass the remainder of his days. It is reported that the Empress Dowager is favourable to granting Li's prayer, but so far no edict has appeared on the subject.—Great secrecy has of late been observed in the meetings of the Grand Council, presided over by the Empress Dowager, who is assisted by Jung Lu, her nephew, every outsider, eunuchs and all, being ordered out of ear-shot during the deliberations. Hence there seems to have been considerable difficulty of late in getting reliable news of the movements of the Empress Dowager and her advisers.—The Peiyang Grand Army has been divided into Five Army Corps, viz:—The troops under the Generalissimo Jung Lu are now termed the First or Centre Army Corps; General Tung Fuhsiang's Kansu men, the Front or Second Army Corps; General Sung Ch'ing's Szechuan and Anhui men, the Rear or Third Army Corps; General Nieh Shih-ch'ie's g's North Kiangnan men, the Left or Fourth Army Corps; and General Yuan Shih-k'ai's Northerners and Kiangpoh men the Right or Fifth Army Corps. The total strength (on paper) is 100,000 men, but 75,000 is probably nearer the mark.

According to the China Gazette Sir Claude Macdonald, British Minister to China, is so dangerously ill that there is little hope of his return to Peking.

The North China Daily News understands that the local Viceroy proposes to employ in the Settlement Extension negotiations the notorious Yu Sai-wan, who has been "wanted" for some years by the police in Hongkong, and with whom, it will be remembered, Sir Nicholas Hannen refused to sit in the Mason Enquiry some years ago.

Hongkong people think that the recent fiasco which attended the flag-raising over the Kowloon hinterland is to be attributed to the blundering of Mr. Stewart Lockhart. He should have known Chinese character better and made the necessary arrangements, say these critics.

The Empress Dowager has changed her time for attending to business in the morning from 5 a.m. to 7 a.m.

News has been received at Shanghai of the death at home of Mr. Edward F. Duncanson, formerly a partner in the firm of Gibb, Livingston & Co., and latterly in the firm of T. A. Gibb & Co., London. Mr. Duncanson, who was about 64 years of age, came to China at the end of the fifties and left Shanghai in 1868. He was one of the founders at home of the Shanghai Waterworks Company.

A Shanghai contemporary prints the following despatch, said to have been received by local mandarins from Chinanfu, the provincial capital of Shantung:—"A large force of Germans went, about ten days ago, to the village of Kzochiachuang, in the Lushan hills, near Kiaochow, and forcibly evicted the inhabitants. When this had been done, the Germans set fire to a part of the village and then left the place."—Another force of Germans is now in Jihchoo demanding the person of one Hsüeh Tien-tze, a townsman of that city, who is charged with having grievously insulted a certain Roman Catholic priest. The Germans, who have taken up their quarters in the magistrate's yamen, declare that they will not leave the city unless their demands are fulfilled.—It is stated by emissaries returned from Tsintao that the Germans are gathering a large force and quantities of ammunition and food supplies in that place preparatory to a general move upon Chinanfu, but this report must be taken with all reserve.

It is common talk amongst the Chinese in Hongkong that rewards have been offered for the heads of the Hon. Wei A Yak and Ng Shui Sang, who are accused of influencing the British Government to take possession of the Kowloon hinterland. The heads of several villagers are also threatened.

Peking as a news centre is a failure, says the Tientsin local paper. Reports concerning China come to us via London, Tientsin, or anywhere else. The reports we get here are few, and often either unimportant or unreliable. As a railway centre, we are not much more successful. Feng-tai—which is to be "one of the great railway centres of the world" some time in the future,—is a long weary ride from Legation Street, if one hires a cart. Bestride an animal, and the time may be reduced, if the beast is a rapid one. But for foreign passengers, most of us can take the trains to and from Ma-chia-p'u, one stage nearer to the city. The new road from the station to the Yung-ting gate is nearly ready for the wearing traffic of Peking carts, which will soon begin to tear it to pieces in accordance with ancestral custom. The electric railway—well, it has been so long in attaining its present development, that one dares make no prophecies. In the southern city, work on the stone roadway is being pushed, as if to make up for the long delay through the frozen months. As an educational centre, we may not be up to the mark set at Tientsin; but we hold our heads high. The report recently in circulation, concerning a lack of financial backing, that might lead to the closing of one well-known institution, appears to be absolutely without foundation. The faculty is being increased in numbers; the work is being systematized, and is progressing quite satisfactorily; and new courses and departments are planned. But the authorities are acting in accord with the wise maxim, Festina lente. As for other established institutions they are pursuing the even tenor of their way.

H. E. Liu, Viceroy of the Liang Kiang provinces, has lately been very ill, and an urgent telegram has been sent to Choup'n for the well-known Imperial Physician, Ch'én Lien-fong, to come to Nanking with all haste to attend upon the Viceroy.

The Avenir du Tonkin has an article on the Foochow Arsenal, in commencing which it says:—"We believe we are correct in saying that Lord Charles Beresford made strong representations to the Peking Government that the management of the Foochow Arsenal should be taken away from the French and given to the English. The following was the plan concocted with Sir Claude MacDonald: An inquiry into the new French management of the Arsenal was to be demanded by the Empress. An unfavourable report would be made. The Arsenal would then be temporarily replaced in the hands of Chinese engineers, and afterwards given definitely to the English, who would undertake to construct for the Chinese Government a complete fleet. The "cavalry of St. George" would then play its customary part. We would be evicted from Foochow in virtue of the programme Lord Beresford was commissioned to apply when visiting all the coast defences of China. The English wish to take charge of all these defences, including the Foochow Arsenal." Our contemporary then goes on to refer to the organisation and resources of the Arsenal, and concludes as follows:—"Having been reneged by the French, England would like to derive the sole benefit. It is the eternal Sic vos non vobis. But we hope that the French Government will protect the work of our nationals. The Foochow Arsenal is a French glory which ought to remain French while rendering great services to China. If our Fokien establishment is endangered, we shall be driven out of the province, and from Shanghai to Canton the English will no longer encounter any obstacle. The intrigues which are going on about Foochow are graver than is generally supposed. It is not a question of whether a factory shall work or shall not work; it is the irresistible influence exercised upon the Chinese mind by the order, the clearness of conception, and the honesty of the French engineers that is at stake. One cannot but hope that this influence may continue to be exercised. An attempt is being made everywhere to substitute English influence. Shall we permit it?"

The Bank of China and Japan, Limited, presented the following report to the shareholders at the fourth annual meeting held on Monday, the 27th March, at the Cannon Street Hotel, London:—"The directors beg to submit to the shareholders a statement of the affairs of the Bank as at 31st December, 1898. A final payment was made to depositors in the Old Bank on 14th May, and their Committee, as advised you in our circular of 20th September, obtained their discharge from the Court on 27th July last. The Taotai of Shanghai, on 24th October, gave a decision adverse to the Bank in the test suits instituted in this Court against recalcitrant Chinese shareholders, but, on appeal, the Tsung-li Yamén have ordered the case to be reheard by the Viceroy of Nanking. In the suit in New York Courts, against an American shareholder, judgment in favour of the Bank for the amount sued for, with costs, was obtained on 3rd ultimo, but the defendant has appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court against this judgment. The accounts as now presented show a result of £2,325 13s. 2d. to the credit of Profit and Loss Accounts, which sum it is proposed to carry forward. Deficiency Account has been reduced to £209,946 19s. 3d., a sum of £3,494 13s. 10d. having been recovered from Old Shareholders during the year. A Branch of the Bank has been opened at Singapore.

FIRE IN TOKYO.

A fire broke out at Aomono-cho, Nihonbashi-ku, Tokyo, at 4 10 a.m. yesterday. Six houses were wholly and four partially destroyed, beside two barns. A policeman sustained injuries.

HOW CAPT. STORNAWAY ABDUCTED THE RUSSIAN ADMIRAL.

[WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL" BY JOHN C. WERNER.]

My only comment on the following yarn, related by my voracious friend Captain Stornaway, is the one made by Truth in regard to the wonderful adventures lately chronicling in a popular magazine;

"Truth is stranger than Fiction,
But Rougemont is stranger than both."

"'Twas the second year I had the Fly-by-night," began Captain Stornaway, "when I carried out successfully an exploit which, if I had failed, would have sent me, molens tolens, to the yard-arm of a Russian man-of-war with a rope round my neck, or to one of the deepest mines in Siberia. Even now, after so many years have passed, I wake up sometimes during the night with a kind of creepy feeling, imagining myself in the hands of the White Bear. But I succeeded, and the result was something over twenty thousand dollars in my pocket. Would I try the same experiment now for the same money? Not for a Klondyke, I say emphatically.

My blood is getting thin, the bold, reckless spirit has left me, and the old man is only a wreck of what he has been, what is left of him. It is many years since this adventure happened; it was in what I may call the palmy days of sea-otter and fur-seal hunting. I left Yokohama early in the year, not with any intention of doing great strokes in hunting, but mainly to evade the temptations of the gilded temples of pleasure in Blood Town, and also to keep the hunters I had secured from being led away by unscrupulous captains of other schooners. I had good men that year, all Scandinavians. There were Hansen, Jansen, Nilsen, and Johnson; they were good men—none better, all but Johnson. He was a big, useless brute, untidy, and drunken, and played me afterwards some dirty tricks—but that is another yarn. Jansen was a Russian Finn and could almost make the wind blow—fair or foul—as he wanted it, and helped me considerably that way. I had Japanese sailors, as this happened before the embargo was put on Japanese shipping in the hunting schooners, and they were good men too; so I was well satisfied with my crew. Well, up to the beginning of October I had not done much; I had 22 otter skins, but no seal skins. I was really not very keen after otters; the skins were very low in the market and it took an immense lot of hard work to get enough to pay expenses. I wanted seals; the skins fetched a good price, and if I could succeed in making a raid on one of the rookeries I should make a small fortune.

About the 2nd or 3rd of October I arrived off one of the Northern Rookeries, and unexpectedly found myself almost in the middle of a hornet's nest. The Russian fleet were cruising in the northern waters that summer, and were anchored off the island when I arrived there early in the morning. They were at anchor inside the island, while I approached it from the outside, so we had it between us, and I think I saw them before they detected me and, of course, I altered my course at once. It would not have mattered so much even if they had seen me: in those days they were not so strict on the schooner, and as I had no fur-seal skins on board they would probably not have molested me. I must say for the officers on Russian cruisers that they are all perfect gentlemen—I ought to know if any one knows—and they perform their uncongenial task of seizing a hunting schooner unwillingly. But here was an effectual stop put on getting seals; nevertheless I was determined to get them in spite of the Russians, although I would perhaps have waited for a day or two. Fog had been hovering about us for several days, and that day it set in heavy, wet, and chilly. The fog was just what I wanted, so instead of putting to sea, I steered further in and dropped the anchor in 6 fathoms of water close under the southern point of the island. The seals were racing on shore, and thousands were swimming about the schooner, but I had given strict orders not to touch any of them. I wanted to have a clear ship if I should be boarded by anyone from the men-of-war. The sea was perfectly smooth where I was anchored, and we were riding as easily as if we were in Yokohama harbour.

It was just about 8 o'clock when I anchored, and after breakfast I lit my pipe and sat down on the grating aft for a comfortable smoke. I must have dropped off into the arms of Morpheus before I knew it—and slept on too with the fog settling on me like rain, for suddenly I woke up with a start, and, looking at the clock, realized that I had slept for over two hours. What woke me up I could not imagine at first, as I was the only person on deck aft, but in a moment I perceived what had disturbed me. It was the sound of a boat being pulled through the water and evidently coming in this direction, and by the regular rhythm of the oars I could tell at once that it was a man-of-war boat, and I knew that I had a bad half-an-hour before me. I roused the boys up, and told them to send all the Japanese below and remain forward themselves; I would attend to the business aft. Slowly and haltingly the boat came along, as if uncertain of the course, occasionally ceasing pulling. It might have passed me by when an unfortunate creak from the fore boom brought a rough hail in Russian from it. I did not know what was said and remained silent, but Jansen volunteered the information that they wanted to know who we were. I told him to shut up, and mind that nobody could understand Russian on board here. But apparently they did not wait for an answer, but pulled right along, and here they were alongside of us, on the starboard side. It was a fine model of a boat, with a gilt streak and fancy yoke lines. It was manned by six sailors, and aft a tug, heavy man, all hair and epaulet, with his legs carefully covered over with a costly boot cloak. He seemed to be astonished when he saw the Fly-by-night, and after a long look over the schooner, aloft and below, he perceived me standing aft with my pipe in my mouth, and beckoned to me with his finger to come up to the sail. I leisurely knocked the ashes out of my pipe, and then, also leisurely, walked up towards him. He watched my movements impatiently, and said something to the man pulling the stroke oar—he coxswain, and then in English to me: "Russian, no?" I shook my head. "Who are you?" he continued, "what you do here? I must come on board; ladder, no?" I told him I had no ladder, but I would help him if he wished to come on board, and I called Johnson and Hansen, and with the assistance of the Russian sailors we managed to drag the burly gentleman on board. How he puffed and snorted when he got inside, evidently not used to exercise! He stood for a moment regaining his wind and looking at me with a decided frown under his shaggy eyebrows. "So, so," he finally began, "you come to steal seal, no? You come to rob Russian land, no? Ah, I make you one example! no more you can do it! I take you, so, so," and he spread out his hands. I stood meekly listening to him in silence, while a bright and daring three-cornered idea was quickly forming itself in my head. "Very well, captain," said I, when he had finished, "you have me, but I am no robber, I am not after seals, I am a sea-otter hunter; I have no sealskins, but I have a dozen otterskins. Come down in the cabin and I will make you a cocktail, and I will show you my otterskins." "So you have otterskins, good! you take them on Russian land, no? You take skins, I take you, ha, ha, ha!" and with this pleasant he followed me down in the cabin, after first giving some orders to his sailors, who all jumped on board, and dropped the boat astern.

I don't know if the promise of a cocktail made any difference in his feelings, but he seemed to be more amiable when he got down below. "I, Admiral"—(the name was a jawbreaker, and I have forgotten it)—he introduced himself, "I go ashore; I go back, I careless; I find the ship not; I have no compass; I go wrong; where my ship, you know?" "No, Sir," said I, "I am sorry to say I don't; I anchored here in the fog; it will soon clear up again and you will find the ship." "Ah yes," was his encouraging remark, "my sailors heave up your anchor and we sail up, no?"

"You will with a hook," said I to myself, and I felt almost inclined to murder him then and there. I dissembled, however, and, putting on a smiling face, asked the noble Admiral to take a seat, while I busied myself in mixing up the cocktail. He watched my movements somewhat suspiciously, I thought, but I mixed the ingredients quite openly before him; gin, a little water, sugar, maraschino (I happened to have a little), bitters, and essence of lemon; all these he saw me put in the tumbler, but he did not see me drop a big dose of opium in it. I shook up the mixture in scientific style and then offered him the glass; he took it and had a big sup, and smacked his lips, and then emptied the glass. I put a bottle of Three Star brandy before him, and asked him to help himself, I had business to attend to on deck. Taking a three-quarter-full bottle of gin with me I ascended to the deck, pleased that I had succeeded so far. The Russian sailors had hoisted the mainsail and foresail and were now going to haul in the kedge when I appeared. I called Jansen aft, and giving him the bottle, after I had mixed it as I wanted it, told him to give the Russians a big second mate's nip each, but no more, and then throw the bottle overboard. I warned him against letting any of our own men have any of the mixture, and I cautioned him especially against Johnson, who would drink it even if he knew it was dangerous. I watched him as he poured out the drinks, which the sailors swallowed greedily; for a few minutes they were hilarious, but the stuff worked on them quickly and they were all sound asleep within ten minutes, stretched out on the deck. I looked down the cabin and there was the powerful Admiral with his head on his arms resting on the table, and breathing stertorously. Everything was safe so far; but supposing it cleared up, or some of the steam-launches were out searching for the Admiral and found him on board here in this state, where would I be then? I smiled to myself when I thought of it, and considered it all in the day's work; I was younger then than I am now, you see.

The boys looked at me inquiringly. I had not yet explained anything to them. "Up, and get all the kites on her," said I, "and let us away from here, and then I'll tell you everything; too much danger about these diggings." Within a few minutes' time we were off to the north-east with everything set, making over seven knots an hour. Next we brought the Admiral's boat up alongside and hoisted it in, and then I breathed more freely. It was now eleven o'clock, so you see it did not take us long to do the great work. I disclosed my plans to my hunters, or as much of them as I thought they needed to know; they were rather taken aback at my boldness, but none of them except Johnson had a word to say against it. They trusted in me implicitly. Johnson, like a big baby, began to cry and howl and protest that now they would all get hung, and not until the others had given him a few kicks did he stop; he was not so averse to taking his money when we returned to Yokohama, though. My passengers would sleep 24 hours, and by that time we should be 120 miles from here at least, and beyond danger, and I would then let them go—if the Admiral was reasonable. We stripped all the clothes, except the under clothing off him, and placed him in a more comfortable position in one of the banks. After Johnson had been crying so much I little expected to catch him going through the Admiral's pockets, but that was just what I did. I gave him a few severe slaps in the face, which set him crying again, and then ordered him on deck.

Both the wind and fog kept with us faithfully, and we were making fine headway; I was steering parallel with the land and had smooth water, and everything was lovely. Our dear Admiral slept the sleep of the just, but I barely shut my eyes the whole night. At noon the following day I kept the schooner in for the land, and at 2 o'clock I could hear the breakers. At 2 o'clock I took in all the light sails, and put the Admiral's boat over, and kept her astern. I had armed some of the sailors with rifles and the hunters had their revolvers in sight, and I had also cleared all arms out of the cabin, and at 2.30 o'clock I began to rouse the Admiral. I was the only one down in the cabin, but the hunters stood ready above, but I anticipated no trouble; he would feel too sick to do any kicking. We had pulled him out of the bunk and he was lying on the lockers, and his clothes were thrown on the table alongside of him. I kept splashing cold water in his face incessantly, until finally he began to gasp and sneeze, and then suddenly started up and roared out something in Russian. When he saw me, and then perceived his surroundings, he looked at me bewildered. His head presumably pained him, for he put his hands up to his forehead several times.

"Water, give me water," he begged humbly. He must have felt bad. I gave him a tumbler-full, which he drank with gusto. "You had a fit," said I, when I saw him looking at his clothes, "we had to take off your clothes, and you have slept nearly four hours."

"I—a fit—you lie!" was his answer, "where my ship? I sick! please call coxswain!"

"Your coxswain is sick too," said I, "and so are your sailors—sea-sick, I think!"

"You lie," he reiterated, "what you want? I like to go to my ship; you call coxswain, no?"

"Now, look here, Admiral, you are my prisoner, and you can not leave this schooner until you give me an order that will permit me to kill some on any of the islands."

"Prisoner!—I—I—You fool!" and he rushed up as if he was going on deck. I pointed the muzzle of my revolver at him. He was too sick to resist, and sank back on the seat.

"Suppose I sign no!" he asked, "what you do? kill me, no?"

"Ah, perhaps so," was my answer, "too far gone now to hesitate."

He considered for a moment, and then abruptly asked for writing materials. I put ink and pens before him, but told him he had to use his own paper, and write it as from the flagship. He nodded, and took several sheets of stamped paper out of his pocket book. He wrote slowly and pondered over the exact words to use; I watched him closely.

"I trust to your honour, Admiral," said I admonishingly, "to write what you promised to write; but I wish to tell you that one of my men can read Russian, so I hope that you do not meditate treachery, because he will read it!"

He paused when I said this; he had no doubt written out a consignment to jail, thinking that I, an ignorant sailor, would take it without further paucity. With a curse in Russian he tore up what he had written, and began again. When he asked me the name of the schooner I told him Alexander, Captain Carlson; that schooner just came in my thoughts. When he had finished he read it for me in English; it said that, for services rendered, all Russian subjects were ordered to assist me with all their power to get my schooner full of fur-seal skins. I passed the paper up to Jansen to read, and told the rest to wake up the Russian sailors and get them down in the boat, the Admiral was coming directly. In the meantime I assisted him to dress; he was fearfully sick, and I suppose the sailors did not feel any better. When he was dressed I offered him a nip of gin; he sipped a little of it, but it did not agree with him. Jansen had passed down the paper with the remark that it was all right, but I discovered later that he could not read it; how nicely I should have been fooled if I had taken the first paper. Finally word was passed down that the boat was ready, and with much trouble and difficulties did we get the portly gentleman down into it. I had passed a quantity of provisions into the boat, both solid and fluid; enough to last them for a week, and I advised the Admiral to pull right for the beach and land, as he would not be able to reach his fleet that day, and perhaps not the next. They were, at the nearest, 120 miles from the rookery; but after the Admiral was missed the vessels would surely disperse in all directions to look for him, and that was just what I was afraid of. If I had been caught I should have been shown no mercy, that was sure. While the boat was in sight I kept the schooner for the southward, but the fog soon hid her from my view and then I altered my course to the north-east and set everything I could carry. It was 90 miles to the next rookery and there I wished to be the next morning.

It began to clear up before daylight, or rather we were running out of the fog, and about the rookery it was clear as a bell. It was 7.30 o'clock when I anchored, and, perceiving a number of natives on the beach, I put one of the boats over, and with four men in her pulled for the shore; my men were all armed and I had my revolver handy. When I landed two tolerably well dressed and clean Russians came up and effusively shook hands with me; the rest stayed at a respectable distance.

I said interrogatively, "Governor." "Da, da," one of them answered, "speak little English." I presented the Admiral's note, which he took, and I can assure you I watched his face with some anxiety while he read it. It was evidently satisfactory, for he passed it to his friend, and they had a long talk over it. Finally he turned to me and asked me if I had any liquor on board; I told him I had some. He made me understand they had no more left ashore, and if I would give him five bottles he would fill my vessel in two hours; they had 2,000 skins in the salt house, all ready for shipping. I told him I would give him fifty bottles if he would do that. In a moment all was in a bustle; boats were hauled down to the water, and the skins began to come down before I reached the schooner. On board we had our hands full, getting everything up from the hold, but the boys worked with willing hands, and we were ready when the skins came alongside. The Governor came off with the skins, and I tell you he was delighted when I passed the bottles down into his boat. At 11 o'clock I had 2021 fur-seal skins on board, obtained without much trouble, and was off flying to the southeast with a fresh north-west breeze at my heels. I kept right out in the ocean for 206 miles before I considered myself safe, and then I kept away for Yokohama, where I arrived after a quick passage of seven days.

I had taken down the foretop mast and made several alterations in the look of the schooner before I got in, but nobody was on the watch for me, either then or later, nor were any curious inquiries made as to how I had got the skins. I only reported 1700 fur-seal skins and 22 otter skins on my arrival in case anything should be said further. The winter passed and I heard nothing about my adventure; but in March the Russian fleet arrived in harbour, and I observed at different times boats and launches cruising among the hunting schooners. I had, however, most effectually altered the Fly-by-Night, and I am sure none of my visitors off the bleak northern islands would know her. I had a Japanese ship-keeper on board, but used to visit her almost every day. One day I had been on board for ten minutes, and was sitting on the grating all smoking a cigar, when suddenly a Russian steam launch came alongside and made fast. An officer was sitting in her, who politely asked me in good English if he had permission to come on board for a moment.

"Certainly," said I, "you are welcome, but I am really sorry to say I can not offer you any refreshment, as I have nothing on board yet;" I offered him a cigar, which he accepted.

"Are you Captain Stormaway?" he asked.

"Yes," said I, "I am the man."

"How many seal skins did you bring down?" he inquired.

"One thousand six hundred and ninety-eight seal skins, and twenty-two sea-otter skins," I told him.

"And where did you get them?" he asked.

"Ah," said I, "now you are asking too much!" He laughed, "Poor Russia!" he said.

"Aye," said I, "poor Russia indeed!"

I had observed that one of the sailors in the launch was taking careful stock of the schooner and of me, and surmised him to be one that I had entertained up north, but I pretended that I did not notice him. The officer said something to him, and they conversed eagerly together for a moment, but I was almost sure that I was not recognized; when he was on board I was roughly dressed, and, with my hair and beard all over my face, looked a different person from what I looked now. Anyhow, two British men-of-war were anchored close to us, and I had no fear. He asked a leading question—"Where is the schooner Alexander now?" and on my reply that I did not know, but probably she had returned to America, he left me. That was the last time I had any questions asked about my abduction adventure. As you know, my real name became tolerably familiar to them in after years.

I was told afterwards that the Admiral regained his ship in safety about the same time that I arrived in Yokohama, and that the fleet was immediately dispersed in pursuit of me. The Admiral was relieved that same winter and went home, and we never met again.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1592.

The wretched party strife among the Koreans was the cause of their weakness. No sooner did a capable man arise than he became the target for the hatred and jealousy of a hundred rivals, and no trickery or subterfuge was left untold whereby to have him degraded and disgraced. A particular incident will illustrate this. General Sin Gak had been associated with General Kim Myung-wun in the defence of the Han River, but when General Kim fled, after throwing into the river the engines of defence, there was nothing to do but to follow suite. General Sin retreated to a place of safety, but immediately began collecting troops from Kyung-gui Province, and he was also joined by a contingent from Ham-gyung Province. While the Japanese held Sml, large bands of them scoured the surrounding country for booty. One of these bands was trying to make its way across the hills to Ka-p'yung and Ch'un-ch'un, and had got as far as the Kyé Pass in the town of Yang-ju, when they found themselves face to face with the troops of General Sin Gak. A fierce fight took place in which the Japanese, who were probably largely outnumbered, were severely defeated, leaving sixty heads in the hands of the Koreans. This promised to be the beginning of a series of such little engagements in which the Japanese army would be gradually weakened without being able to draw the Koreans into a large general engagement. The more so because the Japanese were dependent upon forage for their supplies.

But note the sequel. While all Kyung-gent was ringing with the praises of the successful general, and the people were beginning to see that all was not yet lost, a swift messenger was on his way southward from Pyeongyang bearing a sword and a letter ordering the instant execution of the traitor Sin Gak. The alleged reason for this was as follows. When General Kim fled from the defences of the Han, in order to cover his infamy, he wrote a letter to the King accusing General Sin Gak of having deserted him in his hour of need. General Yu Hong also recognized General Sin as a powerful rival and so added his prayers to those of General Kim that the traitor Sin be killed. The King knew no better than to comply with this request, preferred as it was by two of his leading generals, and the message of death was sent. But before the day was done came the news of the defeat of the Japanese by the forces under this same Sin Gak. The condemned "traitor" had stood up before a Japanese force and had taken sixty heads. The King was filled with remorse and a swift messenger was sent to stay the hand of the executioner. He took the road an hour after the death messenger and arrived at the camp of General Sin Gak—an hour after that loyal man had bowed his head to the axe of his royal master. Who knows but the feet of the second messenger had been made heavy by the gold of Sin Gak's rivals? History is silent as to this, but the suspicion is inevitable. This wanton act was looked upon by the people with horror and detestation, who saw their first successful champion cut down in the very hour of his success.

But another sword, this time of pure justice, was also prepared for General Yi Gak, who had fled from before the Japanese before Tong-nu. He made his appearance at the Im-jin River, doubtless thinking himself safe from criticism, but in this he was mistaken, for as he was the one who had first set the example of cowardice, he was arrested and put to death.

And now, as the Japanese are revelling in Seoul and the King is resting in Pyeongyang, and the Korean generals are busy massing troops at the Im-jin to dispute the passage of the Japanese, let us turn southward and witness some of the events that are transpiring there, for we must not think that the provinces of Chul-la and Ch'ung-ch'ung are at peace all this time.

When the Japanese army separated soon after leaving Tong-nu, one army division under Kuoda swept like a whirlwind westward across the north-western corner of Chul-la Province and through the entire length of Ch'ung-ch'ung Province on its way to Soul. Yi Gwang, the governor of Chul-la, got together some 8,000 men and hastened north to Kong ju, the capital of Ch'ung-ch'ung Province. Finding there that the King had fled from Soul, he gave up all hope of effecting anything, and, turning about, looked for the south again. But on the way he was met by Pak Kwang-on, who upbraided him severely, urging that if the King had fled northward there was all the more need of keeping on and offering him whatever support was possible. The governor humbly confessed that he had been hasty in his action, and turned about and went back to Kong ju, where he joined the forces of the governors of Ch'ung-ch'ung and Kyung-sang Provinces, who had arrived at that place. There were also General Yi Ok, the military governor of Ch'ung-ch'ung, and General Kwak Yung, the military governor of Chul-la. Each of the provinces had both a civil and a military governor. These three civil and two military governors met, then, in Kongju and joined forces. It is commonly reported that they had between them 100,000 men, but probably about half that figure would be nearer the truth. They formed a gallant array with their flaunting banners, and the people of the adjoining districts caught up arms and came and joined what seemed to them an invincible host. A Japanese force was found to be entrenched on Pui-du mun Mountain and Governor Yi Gwang was for making an immediate attack, but one of his aides said, "We are now so near Soul, there is no use in turning aside to attack so small a force. We had better push on to the defence of the Im-jin River." Pak Kwang-on, who had upbraided the governor for retreating, also said, "The road is very narrow which leads up to this position of the Japanese and the woods are very dense. We had better be cautious." Being opposed thus the second time was more than his temper could endure, so the governor ordered Pak bound and whipped. The latter, thinking that it was an imputation on his bravery, after receiving a severe beating, seized his weapons and rushed headlong up the slope and attacked the Japanese. Many followed and the engagement became general. From morning till noon it continued, but the Japanese could not be driven out of their strong position in the woods. The Koreans began to lose interest in the battle and finally the Japanese, creeping down toward the Koreans in the underbrush and grass, suddenly rushed out upon them and cut them down by scores. Pak and several other notable men fell in the fight, but the main body of the Korean troops under Governor Yi Gwang moved on to Kwang-ryo Mountain, near the town of Su-wun, only eighty li from Soul. Expecting that the day would be a busy one, Governor Yi had his soldiers fed very early in the morning, and when day broke there, sure enough, was the Japanese force ready to engage him, and every few moments one or other of the Japanese braves would rush out from the lines, brandish his weapons and challenge the Koreans to come out and fight. So General Sin Ik, of the province of Ch'ung-ch'ung, advanced with his forces and engaged the enemy. In a few moments the superiority of the Japanese arms became evident. The panic-stricken Koreans fled before them like sheep before wolves. After an hour's time this considerable army, which was to have succoured the King, was thoroughly scattered, but it is probable that many of the soldiers figured later in the defence of the Im-jin River.

At the same time events were transpiring further south which were far more creditable to the Korean arms and which were the forerunner of the final expulsion of the Japanese from the peninsula.

A fleet of Japanese boats, bringing, as is supposed, the reserve of 60,000 men, arrived off the island of Ka-dok on the coast of Kyung-sang Province. At that time Admiral Wun Gyun had charge of all naval matters along the coast of that province. When he saw this vast fleet of ships his heart sank, and without more ado he prepared to scuttle his ships and flee by land, but fortunately there was good advice at hand, for one of his staff said, "Do not abandon all hope at once, but send and ask Yi Sun-sin, the Admiral of Chul-la, to come and aid you." A swift messenger was sent and the message was placed in the hands of Admiral Yi. One of his staff said, "No, let him guard his own coast and we will look after ours. Why should we go and help him?" But Admiral Yi said, "Is not Kyung-sang province as much the country of our King as Chul-la? How can we refuse to go to his aid?" So eighty boats were made ready in haste and sailed away to the island of Han-san, where the two admirals met and joined forces. The whole fleet sailed out of harbour together and made for the island of Ok-po, where the hostile fleet was moored. As soon as the enemy hove in sight Admiral Yi Sun-sin made directly for them and began grappling them. The Koreans had the advantage of the wind at their backs, for they shot fire arrows among the boats of the Japanese and soon had twenty-six of them in flames. It is said the sea was covered with the wreckage and with struggling human forms. So the remaining ships of the enemy turned about and crowded on all sail in flight, but Admiral Yi gave chase and cut down many more and scattered the rest, so that the expedition was an entire failure. This was the first of this great admiral's successes, and it illustrates the fact that the Korean warrior was not a coward when well led. The Japanese armies in Korea were thus cut off from their source of supply and reinforcement and thus a tremendous blow was dealt them. This victory may be said to have been the decisive point in the war.

It is probable that the soldiers in the Japanese army had been accustomed to short though sanguinary campaigns and had spent the intervals of leisure at home. But now this vast army was quite cut off from their home and was among strange scenes. It cannot be wondered at, therefore, that after a time discontent arose in spite of all successes, a discontent which, combined with other causes, finally drove them back to Japan.

Tradition says that about this time Admiral Yi had a dream in which a white-robed man appeared and cried, "The Japanese are coming." He arose, assembled his fleet, and sailed forth as far as the town of No-ryang, where he found a large fleet of the enemy. He used the same tactics as before, burning twelve of them and chasing the rest away. The main reason for his unparalleled successes on the sea was the possession of a peculiar war vessel of his own invention and construction. It was called the Kwi-sun, or "Tortoise Boat," from its resemblance to that animal. There is no doubt that the tortoise furnished the model for the boat. Its greatest peculiarity was a curved deck of iron plates like the back of a tortoise which completely sheltered the fighters and rowers beneath. In front was a hideous dragon's head, erect, with wide open mouth, through which arrows and other missiles could be discharged. There was another opening in the rear and six on either side for the same purpose. On top of the curved deck there was a narrow walk from stem to stern and another across the middle from side to side, but every other part of the back bristled with iron pikes so that an enemy who should endeavour to board her would find himself immediately impaled upon a score of spear-heads. This deck, being of iron, rendered the ship impervious to fire arrows, and so the occupants could go into action with as much security as one of our modern battleships could go into engagement with the wooden war vessels of a century ago. In addition to this, she was built for speed and could easily overtake anything afloat. This made her doubly formidable, for even flight could not avail the enemy. She usually did more execution after the fight commenced than before, for she could overtake and ram them one by one probably better than she could handle them when drawn up in line of battle. It is said that the hulk of this remarkable ship (though others say it is only a façade) lies in the sand to-day in the village of Ku-mung on the coast of Kyung-sang Province. It was seen there by Lieut. Geo. C. Foulk, U.S.N. in 1884. The people of the town have an annual festival in its honour, when they launch a fleet of boats and sail about the harbour in honour of the great Yi Sun-sin and his "Tortoise Boat."

In the engagement last described the Japanese in their flight were so terrified by this strange craft, which pursued them and sank them one by one, that they stamped their feet and cried out that it was more than human workmanship. And indeed it was almost more than human of that century, for it anticipated by nearly three hundred years the iron-clad war ship. In this battle Admiral Yi was wounded in the shoulder, but made no sign. He urged on his men to the very last and finally, when they drew off, weary of slaughter, he bared his shoulder and ordered the bullet to be cut out.

Having thus brilliantly begun, and perhaps fearing last, if he should delay, some jealous rival might induce the King to take off his head, he pushed straight on to Tang-hang Harbour, where he encountered another fleet, among which was an immense three-decked ship, on which sat the admiral of the fleet, clad in silk and wearing a golden head-piece. The intrepid Yi made straight for this craft with his tortoise boat, and when near it called to one of his best marksmen to let fly a shaft at the man in silk. The arrow flew straight to its mark and pierced the man's throat. Seeing the fall of their chief, the whole fleet showed their rudders and made off as fast as they could go, but with the usual result. The next day saw Admiral Yi in Pyok-hang Harbour, where he lay at anchor while he sent out ships to reconnoitre and find out the position of the enemy. If anything was seen of the foe, guns were to be fired as a signal. So long the signal shot was heard far out at sea. The fleet put out in two divergent lines "like a fish-trap," as the Koreans say, and soon on the horizon twenty-six hulls appeared rising and sinking on the swell. As they neared they entered the two lines of the Korean fleet and were surrounded. As the result of this fight every one of the Japanese boats was burned and two hundred heads were taken as trophies. This remarkable naval campaign closed with the destruction of a few remaining Japanese boats that were overtaken near Yung-dong Harbour.

The reputation of Admiral Yi Sun-sin spread over the whole south and his praises were on every lip. His followers would go anywhere with him and scarcely seemed to know what fear was. Ere long the report of these splendid victories came to the ears of the King, and though Admiral Yi was not without detractors at court the King conferred upon him a lofty title.

In the fifth month the Japanese resumed active operations on the north and east. A powerful force was sent to the province of Kan-wun, which was straightway overrun. The governor, Kim Je-gap, hastily collected all the soldiers that could be found, and arms and ammunition, and went to the almost impregnable fortress of Yung-wun. The natural defences of this place were unexcelled by any in Korea. On three sides the approach was almost precipitous and a handful of men could hold an army at bay. Here the governor collected provisions in abundance and dug a well. Stones were piled on the top of the wall to be thrown down upon anyone who should attempt to scale the height. The Japanese recognised the strength of the position and tried to get the governor to surrender without a struggle. A letter was sent up the steep slope and handed over the wall. It said, "You are doomed. Even if you hold out for two months you will then be taken. You must come out and surrender at once." The only answer was the headless trunk of the Japanese messenger rolled down the precipice before the eyes of the invading army. The next day the assault began. The besiegers swarmed up the sides of the slope, so that, to use the Korean figure, "the mountain-side was clothed with them." The garrison, though only 5,000 strong, found no difficulty in driving them back. That night the Koreans, wearied by the labours of the day and deeming it impossible that the Japanese should try to attack at night up those steep slopes, failed to set a guard; and in the early morning, before light, a little band of the enemy worked its way up the face of the precipice and reached the base of the wall. A few stones were displaced until a small aperture was made and the little band effected an entrance. They rushed into the camp with a terrific yell, cutting down the half-awakened and wholly terrified garrison. The gates were thrown open and in an hour the victory was complete. Governor Kim Je-gap refused to do obeisance and was cut down.

And now all eyes were turned toward the Im-jin River, where the King and people fondly hoped to be able to stop the invading host. Troops had been coming continually and massing on the northern bank of the stream at the point where the main road from Seoul to P'yeng-yang crosses it by ferry. Its great strategic importance was due to the fact that it was the only good place for a large force to cross. The troops massed here were nominally under the command of General Kim Myung-gun, who had so promptly deserted the defenses of the Han, upon the arrival of the Japanese. The Koreans had everything in their favour. The southern bank where the Japanese must embark is a high bluff pierced only by a narrow gully which would allow of only a few hundred approaching the immediate brink of the water at once, and consequently the army would have to cross little by little. The opposite bank, on the other hand, is a long flat stretch of sand, an ideal place for drawing up a defensive force, and every boat-load of the enemy would be the mark for a thousand arrows.

The Korean forces were numerous enough, they were brave enough, and their leaders were individually capable enough; but note the sequel. All the boats had been brought over to the Korean side, and so, when the Japanese arrived on the southern bank and looked down the high bluff, upon the assembled hosts of Koreans, and marked the difficulty of embarkation, the swiftness of the current, and the utter absence of boats or craft of any kind, they found themselves for the first time completely checked. An hour's resistance was all they had ever met before, but here was evidently a serious obstacle.

For ten long days these great armies sat facing each other across the waters of the Im-jin. They were ten days of exultation for the Koreans, and every day that passed raised the courage, or rather the self-confidence, of the Koreans, who forgot that it was nature and not they who held the foe in check. They did not dream for an instant that the Japanese were about to make them the instruments of their own destruction. When the eleventh morning broke something was seen to be going on among the Japanese, a great running about and carrying of bundles from place to place. In a short time the reason became apparent. The Japanese had given up further advance and were preparing to retreat toward Seoul. Smoke and flame showed that they were burning their camp, and soon the whole force was seen to be on the move back toward the south. To imagine the revulsion of feeling in the minds of the Koreans we should have to realize the deep humiliation to which they had been subjected, the heaps of slain they had seen, the losses in property, in homes, in relatives, in friends, which they had sustained at the hands of the ruthless invaders. Instead of being pursued they were to pursue. They would dog the footsteps of the retreating army, cut off the stragglers, worry the life out of the "dwarfs," as they called the Japanese, and finally give them a farewell kick as they left the port of Kusan on their ignominious homeward flight. Such must have been the common thought and purpose of the Koreans, and the thirst for revenge was simply unbearable. And here again comes to the front the fatal weakness of the Koreans. We have before remarked that the rise of the political parties lay at the bottom of the failure of the Korean arms against the Japanese. It has already been illustrated in the case of General Sin Gak, who was executed through jealousy on the very day of his great victory. Here again it is to become apparent. While General Kim Myung-gun was nominally in charge of the defenses of the Im-jin he was far from being in full command of the troops massed there. A number of other generals were there, and each held his own troops in hand and each wished to distinguish himself and so step over the heads of the rest into the good graces of the King. This would mean pre-emption and wealth. There was absolutely no supreme command, there was no common plan, there was nothing but mutual jealousy and suspicion. A young general, Sin Gil-i, who knew nothing of war, was sure that the enemy had decamped, and he wanted to cross immediately in pursuit. But this was so manifestly absurd that even the common soldiers cried out, "You had better examine carefully and see whether the enemy has actually gone." For answer the young general had a few heads struck off, which shows he was something of a disciplinarian if nothing more. Then Gen. Yu Guk-yang expostulated with the young man, warning him that it was surely a trick to lure them across, but the young fellow drew his sword and made a lunge at the old general and charged him with cowardice. This no one could endure, so the aged general said "Coward, am I? Well I speak only for the good of my King; but I will be the first to cross and fall into this trap, and when you see me fall you will know that my advice was sound." So calling his soldiers, he ordered them into the boats and, throwing all caution to the winds and forgetting the best interests of his King for a petty vindication of his own bravery, he dashed across the river and up the heights. The young Sin Gil-i could do no less than follow, and when he had gained the heights beyond he found the words of the aged general true. A short distance away a half-dozen naked Japanese were dancing on the border of a wood, but when the Koreans rushed at them a countless multitude of Japanese who had lain concealed in the wood poured out, and in an instant the Koreans were surrounded. The aged general, having thus proved his claim to bravery, or rather foolhardiness, sat down and said, "Now has come the time for me to die." And die he did. It was of himself that he thought, and it was this all-prevailing selfishness bred of party strife that neutralised every good quality in the Korean army. It was not because they were not brave, nor because luxury had sapped the vitality of the noble class, but it was because no one would work with anyone else. It was because they saw in war nothing but the chance of personal advancement. And so each one deplored the successes and rejoiced in the failures of the other.

When the old general fell, the Koreans found themselves again, as in the battle in which General Sil Yip fell, between the Japanese and the river. Back they rushed, only to find that some of the boats had drifted away and others, being overcrowded, had sunk. Hundreds were driven into the water, while many, preferring a soldier's death, presented their necks to the swords of the Japanese.

But even yet all was not lost. A little wisdom and care might still have left the day unwon by the Japanese. They had a few boats to be sure, but not enough to be of any use in the face of the still large Korean force on the opposite bank. But here occurred the greatest mistake of all. The generals on the northern bank, witnessing the terrible slaughter of their confederates, not stopping to reckon the chances still remaining of successful defence, mounted their horses and gave themselves to flight. This was not mere cowardice. It was thoughtlessness and carelessness in large part, and it there had been one man in command of the whole defensive force who could witness the loss of a large fraction of his troops without losing his head, the Japanese would still have been as far from the northern bank as ever. The moment the soldiers saw the flight of their generals they raised a decisive shout, "The generals are running away," and forthwith they followed the example, as they had a perfect right to do.

The Japanese leaders, seeing the defenses of the river broken up by their successful stratagem, immediately crossed with their entire force, which Korean accounts reckon at about quarter of a million. The Korean accounts tell us nothing about the rivalry of the two Japanese leaders, Kato and Konishi, but among the Japanese it was notorious. It was impossible for them to march together for any length of time. It was this rivalry which had made them take different roads to Seoul, and it was now necessary for them to part again. This jealousy was another of the potent causes of the final failure of the Japanese. Had these two men worked together they could have marched straight on to the walls of Nanking without meeting an enemy worthy of their steel. As it was they separated and scattered over the country, dissipating their power and thus frustrating the great design of Hideyoshi, the conquest of China. They cast lots as to their routes, and fortune favoured the younger man, Konishi, who drew as his lot the straight path north, where glory lay if anywhere. Kato had to be content with a dash into the province of Ham-gyung in the north-east. Another general, Kuroda, led a force into the western part of Whang-ha Province. All this took place in the fifth moon.

The King was resting secure in P'yeng-yang, trusting in the defence of the Im-jin River, when a messenger rushed in breathless, announcing that the Im-jin had been deserted and that the invaders were coming north by leaps and bounds. The town was thrown into a panic of fright, and, as the Koreans truly put it, "No man had any colour in his face." General Yi Li came hurrying in from the seat of war disguised as a coolie and wearing rough straw shoes. The King put him in command of the forces guarding the fords of the Ta-dong River, which flows by the wall of P'yeng-yang.

We must note in passing a trifling success on the part of Captain Wun-ho, who had been in charge of the ferry across the Han at Yo-ju. He had been called away into Kang-wun Province, but returned just in time to form an ambush at Yo-ju and spring out upon a company of Japanese whom he routed, securing some fifty heads. The Koreans say that from that time the Japanese avoided the Yo-ju ferry.

BRITISH POLICY.

The Duke of Devonshire, speaking at the London Chamber of Commerce, stated that the Government does not desire to participate in the crisis in China. It is endeavouring to secure a due share over unoccupied parts of the world and desires to draw closer the ties between the colonies and Britain. Hence the paramount duty is to make the Army and the Navy strong enough to defend not only Great Britain but the colonies and foreign possessions.

SCENE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

London, April 22.

A slight scene occurred in the House of Commons arising out of the discussion over the Indian Sugar Duties. Lord G. Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, replying to Mr. J. M. MacLean (Conservative member for Cardiff), stated that the exportation of Sugar from Great Britain to India averages 900 tons. Thereupon Mr. MacLean began reading figures traversing this and the Speaker ruled him out of order. Mr. MacLean persisting, a great uproar followed, during which he took a seat on the Radical benches. He afterwards quitted the House.

And Max Lange announced mate in five moves, which, Reichen says, must be considered one of the finest announced mates extant.

ZIG-ZAG PUZZLE.

By W. A. SHINKMAN, Grand Rapids, U.S.A.

White to move and capture the Black Knight with the King in 27 moves. The pawns and the Knight are not to be moved; the King must not pass over the central square commanded by the Knight; and the pieces are to be played according to the laws of Chess governing their movements.

NOTES.

The Yokohama chess season is now closed, but, as last year, the Secretary has set a room apart for play at his residence, No. 156-a Bluff, where members of the Y. C. C. will be welcome every Thursday evening from 8 o'clock.

Another match, of five games up, is in progress between Janowski and Showalter. Before beginning play in the fifth game of the series on Saturday, March 19, Janowski and Showalter agreed, as the score was two wins each, to play six games instead of five. At the time the mail left five games had been played with the following result; Janowski, 2; Showalter, 3.

The programme for the international chess congress, to begin in London May 30th, was issued recently. It provides for two tournaments, one a double round for the masters, not more than eighteen nor less than sixteen to compete, and the other a single round tournament for those not competing in the principal event. The prizes in the latter will be $1,250, $825, $500, $325, $250, $200, $150 and $100. In the main tournament the prizes will be $350, $250, $150, $100, $75, $50 and $25. In the main event non-prize winners will receive $10 for each game won from any of the three first prize winners, and $5 for every other winning game. An entrance fee of $25 is demanded in the two-round tournament, and both events will be conducted under the same rules and regulations which have governed similar contests in the past.

As the invitations will be issued only to masters of acknowledged reputation and prize winners in recent tournaments, the entry list will probably be made up something like this: America will be represented by Pillsbury, Steiner and Showalter; Austria-Hungary by Chigorin, Schlechter and Maroczy; France by Janowski; Germany by Lasker, Tarrasch, Walbrodt and Lipke; Great Britain by Blackburne, Burn, Mason and Teichman; Gumburg is not likely to play; Russia by Tschigorin, Aapin and Schiffer. Substitutes may readily be found in Maceo of Vienna and Cohn of Berlin, the latter an account of the fine score he made at Cologne last summer.

Sir Georges Newnes proposes to start a movement for a national chess testimonial to Blackburne to commemorate his victory over Pillsbury in the recent international cable chess match and his long service with the British Chess Club. Sir George announced the subject at a university chess dinner, at which the members of the British Chess Club, including Blackburne, were present.

A number of Chess enthusiasts at Boston, Mass., have formed a "Blindfold Chess Club," to encourage the study and practice of play sans voir.

German Universities are very strict, and seem to come down sharply on negligent students, chess players though they be. The Riga Tageblatt says that the world's chess champion, Emanuel Lasker, who during last term had taken up his mathematical studies at the Berlin University has just been struck off the lists of that University because he has not shown proofs that he has carried out any private reading during the winter. If the report be correct, says Black Bishop of Hongkong, it is not very creditable to the authorities. It is far more important to the world that Lasker should play chess than that he should read up Differential Calculus or produce a thesis on the Indivisible Concomitants of any number of Binary Quantics.

Mr. Lyons, secretary to Senator Deboe, of Kentucky, related recently an experience of Lasker when he played a "simultaneous" in Cincinnati. One of the players had secured a book of openings on his knees under the table, and when Lasker moved on his board and panned along he would hunt up the answer. Lasker had both eyes open and took in the situation. "What is this you have?" asked Lasker, peering over the table. "Ah! Cook's Analysis," and, making an odd-looking move, he ejaculated: "See if you can find an answer to that!"

IMPORTS.

The market for yarns is absolutely dull and lifeless, and not a single transaction is to be recorded. Grey shirrings present the same aspect, and fancy cottons and woolsens also show no sign of movement. Raw cotton is dull, Japanese buyers awaiting a further fall on the other side.

TEA.

The Columbia took 25 piculs of new season's tea to America. There have only been a few arrivals, and it is too early yet to judge of quality, though it may be said that the tea this year is certainly no better than last. The prices, however, are lower.

A further rise of 1/2 in the London price of silver startled folks to-day, but rates on China have felt the effect only by a slight decline, whilst all gold rates have continued unaltered and very firm.

MARRIAGES.

On the 15th April, at Christ Church, Yokohama, by the Rev. E. Champneys Irwine, M.A., EDWARD BRANWELL CLARKE to JESSIE, eldest daughter of J. L. O. EYTON, of Yokohama. (No Cards).

On the 19th instant, at H.B.M.'s Consulate, and afterwards at Christ Church, by the Rev. E. Champneys Irwine, M.A., GEORGE CONEY MURRAY, eldest son of the late Colonel Murray, of the Ordnance Store Dept., to MARY (May), daughter of Edwin Wheeler, M.D., of Yokohama.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE Japan Railway, by official sanction, will raise its fares from May 1st.

THE torpedo destroyer Yugiri is stated to have arrived at Port Said on the 18th inst.

MR. DROSS is now on a visit to Nagoya, Kyoto, Osaka, and other places in the neighbourhood.

THE cruiser Akashi, built at the Yokosuka dock, has gone through its trials with exceptionally satisfactory results. The officers gave a banquet on the 16th instant on board to celebrate her completion. Admiral Ito was present.

MR. PROUNDER, of Kobe, is said to have petitioned the authorities for naturalisation as a Japanese subject.

THE Hongkong authorities have hoisted the British flag at Taipo-fu, after some resistance on the part of the population.

THE agitation which has been fomented in several Tokyo journals against the Foreign Office has apparently subsided.

ON Wednesday, Count Kawamura gave a delightful garden-party at his Tokyo residence to celebrate the recent marriage of his son.

THE trouble in Siam between England and America on one side, and Germany on the other, is on the way to being adjusted.

A DISPATCH from Utsunomiya states that on Saturday morning a down train on the Ryomo line was derailed and several persons were injured.

THE persons who had the honour to be invited to the Imperial Cherry Party numbered 1072, of whom 231 were foreign ladies and gentlemen.

A VERY pretty wedding was celebrated in Yokohama on Wednesday, when Miss Wheeler and Mr. G. C. Murray were married at Christ Church.

SEVENTY or eighty cetties of tea were sent abroad by the American steamship City of Peking on Wednesday as the first tea exports of this year.

A VERY successful "social" conference has been held this week at the Imperial Hotel at which the Rev. W. Imbrie made a telling speech.

DURING last month the Kanagawa Prefectural Office issued 176 passports for 234 foreigners (travelling inland). There were 100 English and 84 American.

TRAINING is steadily proceeding for the race-meeting next month, and the entries have already been announced. They are up to the average in number.

THE Spring Athletic Meeting of the Y.C. & A.C. promises to be very successful, considerable enthusiasm having been evoked during the training of the athletes.

COUNT OKUMA is touring the North-Eastern provinces, speaking at Sendai and other places during the week. "Retrenchment" is the watch-word of his party.

THE election of Deputies has taken place in Spain. The Government's majority will be 150. Sanguinary riots took place at Bilbao, Valencia, and Tortosa.

THE main office of the Formosa Bank will be opened in Taipei in October, and branch offices will be established in Amoy, Keelung, Tainan, and Kobe.

ON Monday, Mr. Sim's yacht Snowflake ran on a rock near Miyajima, Inland Sea, and sank. She was refloated later in the week and found to have sustained little damage.

THE whole number of applicants throughout the country for space for exhibits at the Paris International Exhibition is 1,934. Tokyo takes the lead with 337 applicants, Kyoto comes next with 386, Osaka with 154, Ishikawa Prefecture with 118, and Aichi Prefecture with 109, the number in other prefectures ranging from 76 downwards.

MR. SHIMOSAKA FUJITARO, Secretary of the Finance Department, and Mr. Yagie Kazuyoshi, ex-director of the Yokohama Post and Telegraph Office, have been appointed organizers of the Formosan Bank.

FOREIGN travelling theatrical companies have not been seen in Yokohama for nearly a year, but the announcement is made that the Vivienne Dagmar Variety Company will appear at the Public Hall next week.

THE Czar has presented Mr. Asada, Governor of Kanagawa Prefecture, with the Cordon of the Order of St. Stanislaus, and Mr. Takehisa, the then Chief of Police, with the 3rd Cordon of St. Anne in connection with Prince Cyril's visit to Japan last year.

COLONEL UYEHARA, Captain Sakamoto, and Mr. Ariga, who have been instructed to attend the Peace Conference, left Shimbashi on Friday morning for Europe. Viscount Enomoto, Baron Ozaki, and high Civil, Military and Naval officials, numbering about 300, went to the station to see them off.

IMPERIAL Ordinance No. 154, promulgated on the 19th, provides that the faculty of the Police and Gaol Schools shall be composed of a president of chokunin rank, five instructors of sonin rank, a manager of the same rank, and four clerks of kannin rank, and that the Vice-Minister for Home Affairs shall hold ex officio the post of president.

A THIEF named Tanaka Kokiichi (34), was, a few days ago, arrested in Saitama Prefecture. He has been living at Chitose cho, Yokohama, and has perpetrated a number of crimes of a more or less nefarious nature both in Yokohama and Saitama Prefecture. In one case he entered the godown of a dyer at Shichichome Ishikawamachi, and secured clothing worth over yen 700.

THE Japanese Tea Traders' Union is to set up a tea-house, tea-store, and a museum in the International Exhibition to be held at Paris next year. It will be subsidized to the extent of yen 25,000 by the Japanese Government, and will receive a similar sum from the Formosan Government. Premises for the purpose are reported to have already been leased.

THE new building within the enclosure of the Department of Communications has been completed. This edifice is intended for a museum where European and American stamps, postal cards of every description, and all instruments and statistics relating to mail services will be exhibited. The authorities are now collecting the exhibits from various foreign Governments. The institution is to be thrown open to the public during the coming summer.

IN the British Budget as presented to the House of Commons, the estimated expenditure is £112,927,000, against a revenue of £110,287,000. It is proposed to reduce the annual fixed debt charges from 25 to 23 millions; to impose a stamp duty of five shillings per cent. on foreign and colonial stock; to increase the duties on the capital of companies; to impose a six penny stamp duty on letters of administration; and to increase the wine duties. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach stated that the increase of expenditures is mainly due to increased armament, and that if the increase in armament be continued the country must face a large increase in taxation.

ATTACKING THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

April 17.

We have alluded more than once to the attacks made by the press on the present holder of the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. Tokyo journals have had a great deal to say on the subject. They speak about the Premier's want of confidence in the present management of foreign affairs; about Marquis Ito's similar uneasiness; about the discontent of the Liberals; about friction between the Vice-Minister and the Minister; about a compromise involving the retirement of both; about the Satsuma folks desiring to have Baron Nishi appointed; about the Choshu statesmen wanting Baron Ito; about the Liberals wishing the portfolio to be given to Mr. Hoshi, and so on.

Naturally the Opposition journals are conspicuously vehement in their criticisms, but the curious feature of the campaign is that not one of the critics has any specific charge to prefer against Viscount Aoki. In that respect the incident is unique. Nothing has happened. Japan has not suffered any humiliation. Her friendly relations with foreign States have not been impaired. Her interests have not been injured through diplomatic blundering. Her prestige has not been lowered. No defeat has been inflicted on her in negotiation with a Western Government. There is absolutely no platform of facts to support the artillery which the Minister's assailants train upon him, and they themselves make no attempt to show that their guns are loaded with anything but blank ammunition. Yet the discharge continues incessantly. It is infinitely discreditable to the assaulting journals' intelligence and to their sense of responsibility. We are glad to think that it would be quite impossible for such a thing to occur in England. No section of the British press could be induced to combine in attacking a Minister of the Crown without any tangible complaint to advance against him. But of course the Cabinet, not Viscount Aoki, is the object of the campaign. The Kokumin Shimbun justly reminds the critics that the policy of a Foreign Minister is not his own: it is the policy of the Ministry to which he belongs. Certainly it is, and the complaining journals are perfectly cognisant of the fact. Their onset is against the Cabinet. They turn the points of their weapons towards Viscount Aoki simply because they think that he represents the line of least resistance. We trust, for the credit of the Yamagata Cabinet, and of Japanese Cabinets in general, that this attack will not succeed. If men are to be driven out of office solely because a few hostile newspapers choose to raise an empty clamour against them, there can be no such thing as Ministerial stability in Japan.

April 19.

Rumour continues to be busy with the name of the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs. The Tokyo newspapers—or, at least, several of them—insist that the portfolio will soon change hands, and opinions are divided between Count Inouye and Baron Ito Miyoji as Viscount Aoki's probable successor. Mr. Hoshi Toru is no longer spoken of. He is said to be unwilling to enter the Cabinet at present, and the Constitutional Party is therefore supposed to be advocating Baron Ito's appointment. The Yomiuri naturally seizes the occasion to foster distrust of the Cabinet. It points out that ever since certain members of the Liberal Party preferred malicious charges against Count Inouye in the Lower House, the relations between the Party and that statesman have been strained, and that if the Count were now to assume charge of the Foreign Office, the Liberals could scarcely continue to cooperate with the Ministry. That is a strange assertion in the face of the fact that the Liberals co-operated with the last Ito Cabinet, in which Count Inouye held the portfolio of Finance.

April 20.

The talk about a change in the holder of the portfolio of Foreign Affairs is becoming less audible. In fact, it is now plain, as we surmised from the first, that no idea of making any change was ever entertained by the Cabinet, and that the rumour had its origin solely in a desire on the part of the Opposition to embarrass the Ministry.

As to the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Tsuzuki has apparently made up his mind to resign, but the idea that Mr. Akabane would succeed him does not seem likely to be realized. Things now point, it is said, to the nomination of one of the officials serving as Minister Plenipotentiary in a western country.

April 21.

Caricatures are the order of the day at present in the Tokyo world of journalism. Nearly every newspaper of importance has a political cartoon of some kind. As a rule the drawing is crude and clumsy, and the likenesses are miserable. A brilliant exception is the Fiji Shimpō. It has managed to secure a caricaturist of considerable power, who produces really capital likenesses of the statesmen and politicians whom he depicts. Still, it is all very embryonic. One would suppose that with so many artists available at small rates of remuneration Tokyo ought to be a paradise for pictorial journals; but either the clever draughtsmen will not undertake such work, or else—which is not improbable—the art of caricature is still undeveloped in Japan. Lying before us as we write is a picture evidently intended to represent Viscount Aoki sitting in the Foreign Office chair—"chair" (isu) is the expression used in this country as the equivalent of "portfolio"—and two figures, Baron Ito Miyoji, and Mr. Hoshi Toru, are hauling with their strength on a rope fastened to one leg of the chair. Without the annexed text it would be quite impossible to discover what the drawing means.

At all events, the cartoon is obsolete, for the Foreign Office incident is closed. The agitators have had their clamour for their pains. It seems probable, however, that considerable changes will be effected in the staff of the Department. The resignation of Mr. Tsuzuki, the Vice-Minister, has been accepted. He is appointed a member of the House of Peers, and Mr. Takahira Kogoro, now Japanese Representative in Austria, is expected to be his successor at the Foreign Office. Other alterations also are spoken of, but there is no definite information about them.

To receive an Imperial nomination to the House of Peers is now a very valuable prize. It means an income of 2,000 yen a year for life.

"THEY DON'T KNOW US."

A cry which periodically makes itself heard in the columns of Japanese journals is that foreigners know nothing about the Japanese, and are prejudiced against them through ignorance. One of our Tokyo contemporaries, recently discussing this theme, compared the average foreigner's acquaintance with Japan to the average Japanese's acquaintance with Turkey or Egypt, and the Fiji Shimpō now suggests that Japan should send some one to London to familiarize the British with her affairs and to correct all misrepresentations appearing in London journals about this country. Such a suggestion implies that the Fiji Shimpō does not know much more about London than Londoners, according to its view, know about Japan. An agent despatched to London for a purpose of the kind might effect something—every resolute and industrious man has it in his power to accomplish something under all circumstances—but the result of his efforts would scarcely be perceptible, and would, at any rate, be a mere drop in the ocean compared with the work already doing, and being daily done, to familiarize the people of Great Britain with things Japanese. Book after book is published in England about Japan; letter after letter discussing Japanese affairs is printed in leading British journals; the Japan Society of London are constant diffusers of information; numerous fine collections of Japanese art objects are to be seen in private houses and in public museums—very much finer collections than one can see in Japan—and Englishmen visit Japan in considerable numbers every year, taking home with them experiences and observations which subsequently serve us useful educators. We have no hesitation in saying that at least as much is known about Japan in England as the Japanese in Japan know about England.

AN INVISIBLE AGITATION IN YOKOHAMA.

It appears that the Yokohama community has held a meeting and resolved to petition for a postponement of the operation of the Revised Treaties, on the ground, first, that there is no proper accommodation for foreigners in Japanese prisons; secondly, that the preliminary examination of accused persons is held in secret; and, thirdly, that the Japanese Government is only now sending officials abroad to investigate matters which ought to be fully understood before jurisdiction is assumed over foreigners. These meetings and this resolution on the part of the community have entirely escaped the observation of the community itself, and, though smoke is generally accompanied by fire, we can not discover so much as a spark in the present case. The interest of the incident is enhanced by the facts that the Japanese Government is greatly perturbed about the attitude of the community, and that a section of the Opposition press declares the Government itself to be more or less responsible, because it has made so much fuss about the operation of the Treaties as to convey an impression that it looks forward to the event with considerable uneasiness. Any stick does to beat a dog. This is about as frail a stick as could be conceived, for the procedure attributed to the foreign community is wholly imaginary.

THE NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

The much-talked-of new political party seems likely to see the light of day after all. It came to the birth some months ago, but apparently there was not strength to deliver, and the public began to regard the project as a fiasco. Then a seemingly well-founded rumour was circulated that a principal plank in the party's platform would be the fostering and promotion of Japan's old-time creeds, Shintô and Buddhism. Of course such a project evoked strong condemnation in journalistic quarters, and it became pretty plain that the promoters must either abandon their religious tendencies or make a failure in their political enterprise. They chose the former alternative, and have now issued a manifesto in which no reference whatever is made to the religious question. But, indeed, it would be misleading to say that anything of any kind is definitely referred to in the manifesto. It is a beautifully invertebrate document, capable of being twisted into a shape to suit future convenience. Probably that kind of elastic drafting was necessary. Until the party holds its initial general meeting on the 1st of July, it will not be in a position to make any clear exposé of motives.

HANYANG IRON MINE.

There seems to be very little doubt that the much-talked-of Hangyang iron mine has been placed at Japan's disposal, and that supplies of ore will be drawn from it for the uses of the new Foundry. We can not locate the mine exactly from Japanese accounts. It appears to be situated at a place called Taiya, or Taiyan. The main point, however, is that it has been found to possess a practically inexhaustible supply of excellent ore, and as it is only 1050 miles by water from Chikuzen, where the foundry is to stand, whereas the Kamaishi mine is 1100 miles, the advantage is slightly on the side of the Chinese mine in the matter of accessibility. Rumour says that the Government is to spend 2 million taels on the purchase of the mine, and that the money will come out of the sum appropriated by the Diet last session for the purposes of the Iron Foundry, over and above previous grants. Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, writing in the Keisai Zasshi, strongly traverses the project, and asks how it can be claimed that the establishment of a foundry in Chikuzen will make Japan independent in the matter of iron manufactures, if she has to draw her supplies of metal from China. On the other hand, the Yomiuri Shimbun supports the scheme, but its principal argument is that, China having approached Japan and asked her to use the mine, the incident is differentiated from the acquisition of mining and railway concessions by foreign Powers in China, these being obtained virtually by force majeure in despite of China's objections. But, of course, that manner of reasoning does not touch the kernel of the question, namely, that, so far as Japan self-supplying faculty is concerned, it makes very little difference whether she obtains her supplies of iron from China and manufactures it at home, or whether she imports it from Europe or America in manufactured form.

On Saturday the Fiji Shimpô denied that any measures had been taken to purchase or lease the Taigan iron mine from China. It is to be worked, our contemporary said, under the superintendence of Japanese experts, and this country is to obtain from the mine whatever supplies of iron are required for supplementing the ore from Kamaishi or other home sources.

On Sunday the same journal retracted the above statements, and explained that the Japanese Government has undoubtedly agreed to lend two million taels on the security of the mine. Taotai Shêng originally applied for the money, and, after some hesitation, the Treasury decided to advance it out of a sum of 4½ million yen which remains unappropriated from the Indemnity. The rate of interest will be 5 per cent.; the loan will run for 20 years prior to redemption; the money will be paid through the Bank of Japan and the Shanghai branch of the Specie Bank and the Peking Government is to become guarantor. Mr. Wada, who proceeded recently to China, had instructions to conclude the agreement, subject, of course, to ratification by the Tokyo Authorities.

FUKUSHIMA-YONEZAWA RAILWAY.

The State railway between Fukushima and Yonezawa has at length been completed. It was commenced in 1893, and the distance is only 26 miles, but the difficulties of construction are quite unprecedented in Japan. There are no less than 19 tunnels, one over a mile long, and there is a gradient of one in thirty. The total cost of construction has been 4,820,000 yen, or over 185,000 yen a mile, the heaviest outlay ever involved in building a Japanese line. Locomotives of special power will have to be used. The road has been officially tested, and, everything having proved satisfactory, it will be opened to traffic from the 15th of next month. As to its usefulness great things are predicted. Yonezawa is the central manufactory of a celebrated stuff known to haberdashers as Yonesawa tsumugi, and this will now be brought within easy reach of the principal cities. Moreover, communication between Fukushima and Yonezawa, which is impossible at present in winter, will now be open all the year round. Whether the line will prove a financial success may be doubted, however.

CASTLE GATES IN TOKYO.

It is stated that the Tokyo Police and the Municipal Authorities are considering the advisability of removing the old castle gates of Tokyo. The gates, as many of our readers know, are double, the inner being at right angles to the outer. They thus constitute a great danger to wheel traffic, for the solid and lofty masonry of their piers completely hides the intervening space from approaching vehicles. Many collisions and more or less serious accidents have occurred, and constables are now permanently posted to direct the streams of traffic. It would certainly be a great advantage from a purely practical point of view to have these obstructions removed altogether, for their original purpose has disappeared. But they have great archaeological interest, and for that reason there is talk of preserving the Sakurada gate, the Wadakura gate, and perhaps one other.

SPECIAL CAPITAL RESERVE.

Concerning the Special Capital Reserve of 50 million yen proposed by the Government and voted by the Diet last session, there is a good deal of discussion at present. The Reserve, which consists of money taken from the Indemnity, is divided into three portions, namely, 30 millions on account of the maintenance of the Navy, 10 millions for Education, and 10 millions for natural calamities. These sums are to be regarded as capital, the interest alone being regularly available for the purposes here indicated. But in case of emergency the capital also may be employed, provided that it is replaced from the general revenue with all possible expedition, so as to keep the fund at its original total, 50 million yen. In fact, the leading idea of the arrangement is to have a sum of at least 50 million yen always at hand as a war chest, and to use the interest on it, if necessary, for replacing worn-out battle-ships, relieving distress caused by natural calamities and assisting education. The question now under debate is, how can the fund be utilized so as to pay interest, and, at the same time, remain in the form of hard money suitable for defraying war expenses. The former condition could be satisfied by purchasing Japanese loan-bonds, but the fund would thus be converted into paper. If, again, the money be invested in British Consols, it would preserve its hard-money quality, but would not earn more than 2½ per cent. The French Rentes—of which there are 3 per cents. and 3½ per cents.—return a better rate of interest, and have not been subject in recent times to fluctuations so large as those suffered by British Consols. But it does not seem to be thought altogether satisfactory to invest the money in any foreign country. The tendency is to convert it into Japanese securities, and to trust to the possibility of floating a domestic loan in case of emergency.

AN EXPONENT OF JAPAN'S FOREIGN POLICY.

We have awaited with curiosity some expression of opinion from the Fimmin as to the foreign policy which Japan ought to pursue at the present juncture, for, although the Fimmin may not be the recognised organ of the Liberal Party, it is the only source from which we can derive an idea of the views entertained by the Liberals. It has just concluded a series of articles entitled "An analysis of Occidental policy." From a literary point of view they are not admirable articles by any means, and as specimens of conciseness they leave much to be desired. But the conclusions formulated by the writer are plain enough. He does not consider it possible that the much-talked-of agreement between England and Russia will be concluded in such a manner as to embrace the affairs of the Far East. The two Powers are barely able to remain at peace in Europe, Africa, and Central Asia, and it is inevitable that their conflict of interests in the Far East should ultimately involve them in strife. This is the era of parleying, but Japan would commit a fatal blunder if she shaped her course in accordance with the idea that the conferences will have a permanently amicable ending. Neither should she repose any faith in the hope of an alliance with some strong Power. Alliances are not possible in practice except when a common enemy is in sight. Who is Japan's prospective enemy? She may regard a certain country in that light. But is it also the probable enemy of her would-be ally? She will certainly be hurt by the vivisection of China, however it takes place. She will suffer if Russia takes Manchuria. She will suffer if England takes the Yangtze Valley. She will suffer if Germany takes Shantung. The newspaper organs of public opinion in Japan are like persons afflicted with intermittent fever. They have regularly recurring accesses of apprehension, and on each occasion they renew their outcry about preserving the integrity of China or forming alliances with foreign States. But the plain truth is that Japan herself began the vivisection of China in 1895. Not only did she appropriate Formosa and try to appropriate Liaotung, thus setting an example to other nations, but she also demonstrated China's incapacity to resist being cut up. China's doom is sealed. If England has abandoned all hope of saving her, Japan also must resign herself to the inevitable. Of course the ultimate responsibility for the catastrophe does not rest with either England or Japan. It rests with China herself. "The ruin of Shin is the work of Shin," says the old proverb. Japan has nothing to do but to develop her strength and be prepared for every eventuality. She must rely on her own resources alone, and not look to any foreign Power for aid.

Side by side with these comments we may place the view of an eminently practical journal like the Shogyo Shimpō. It declares that China has already one foot in the grave, and that any attempt on Japan's part to save the huge empire's life would be like trying to arrest the fall of a big edifice by means of a single prop. There is nothing left for Japan except to follow the example of Western Powers. It is very unpleasant to her to see her neighbour cut up, but she must not shrink from swallowing a slice herself when the feast is spread.

NEW COMMERCIAL CODE.

Our readers have doubtless observed that the new Commercial Code, having passed the Diet in its 13th session, has been promulgated, and will become operative from the 16th of next June. A translation of this Code was prepared by Dr. Lönholm the year before last, on the supposition that the Code would be endorsed by the Diet in its 12th session and although that forecast proved erroneous, Dr. Lönholm nevertheless published his translation, believing that the Code would undergo little, if any, further amendment, and that the sooner it came into the hands of the foreign community the better. But on comparing the Code now promulgated with the Code submitted to the Diet in the latter's 12th Session, quite a number of changes are apparent, and Dr. Lönholm has considered it advisable to embody these alterations and additions in a pamphlet, which he proposes to distribute gratis to every one that purchased a copy of his original translation. It is a very considerate act on Dr. Lönholm's part, but we greatly doubt whether it will have any practical utility, for the changes, though several of them can scarcely be called material, are very numerous, and no one will care to take the trouble of making repeated references to the pamphlet for the purpose of correcting the Code. Fortunately Dr. Lönholm has also published, an amended translation of the revised Code, and by procuring the volume business-men will be able to know exactly how the law stands.

YOKOHAMA AND KOBE.

There is a great deal of talk in the columns of the Fimmin about the prospects of commercial and industrial rivalry between the north and the south of Japan; in other words, between Yokohama and Kobe, for our contemporary regards these as the business centres of north Japan and of south Japan, respectively. What conclusion the Fimmin will ultimately come to we can not tell, for it has thus far published only one article of a series, but its first showing is unfavourable to Yokohama. It regards cotton and silk as the two chief factors in determining the condition of the two places, cotton for Kobe and silk for Yokohama. Now the figures showing the growth of the cotton-spinning industry are these:—

1893	381,781	88,889,533
1897	970,567	221,295,791

On the other hand, the figures for silk are:—

Year.	No of koku of cocoons.	Produce in lbs.
1889	1,184,680	11,480,608
1897	2,124,238	18,057,800

It is seen from these tables that, whereas the production of cotton yarns increased nearly eight-fold in the nine-year period 1889-97, the increase in the produce of silk increased only 58 per cent., and on this difference in the rate of development of the two industries the Fimmin founds an assertion that Kobe promises to outstrip Yokohama as a business centre. To us the estimate seems very misleading, since it takes no account of the monetary values of the two productions. When we consider values, the case stands thus, adopting the Fimmin's basis:—The industry of which Kobe is the centre produced goods the value of which rose from 7 million yen to 55 millions in the nine-year period 1889-97, and the industry of which Yokohama is the centre produced goods the value of which rose from 68 million yen to 108 millions in the same period. Moreover, there is no prospect of any growth of the cotton-spinning industry, for the present, at all events, whereas sericulture develops steadily, and would find a certain market for its produce if only the methods of reeling were improved.

NEW JAPANESE SETTLEMENTS IN CHINA.

Negotiations have been going on for some time with China for the purpose of obtaining allotments of land to form special Japanese Settlements at Foochow, Newchwang, and Amoy. In the cases of Foochow and Newchwang, sites have actually been fixed upon, but the Amoy area is still under discussion. The Foochow Settlement, we read in a vernacular contemporary, is on a low-lying space of a hundred thousand tsubo by the side of the river Min, and the Newchwang site is an extension of the present Foreign Settlement.

THE ERA OF BRIBES.

Some of the Japanese newspapers are more than vehement in their attacks upon Mr. Hoshi Toru for his alleged statement that, Japan being now in the era of bribery, and having no choice but to pass through it as England did in the days of the Georges, members of the Diet should take as many bribes as are offered to them. We deem it very unlikely that Mr. Hoshi used any such language, for, though he is a singularly outspoken politician, never hesitating to call a spade a spade, he must have appreciated that an admission of the kind would constitute a deadly weapon of attack against him. Apart from the question of truth or falsehood, however, there is interest in criticisms like those of the Osaka Asahi as illustrating the most caustic methods of Japanese political controversy now-a-days. The Asahi declares that "moral depravity can go no farther, and that it becomes a problem to determine whether the utterer of such sentiments is a human being or a monkey. Naturalists might find the question decidedly interesting. Then there is the point of heredity. Mr. Hoshi is reported to be the son of a robber, and that would perhaps account for the peculiar views he takes of bribery. He does not reflect, apparently, that if this is Japan's era of the Georges, Marquis Yamagata must be the Walpole of the country, nor does he observe that the responsibility of rendering politics corrupt is thus placed on the shoulders of the Clan Statesmen. The Asahi concludes, however, that the responsibility ultimately rests with society, which has not strength or resolution to eradicate these evils."

That is pretty strong speaking. It reminds one of the celebrated passage of arms between Disraeli and O'Connell when the "Liberator" called the future leader of the Conservatives "a lineal descendant of the impenitent thief on the cross." Mr. Hoshi Toru probably regards it all with supreme indifference. He hits his adversaries with unmerciful strength whenever they give him an opening, and he takes their counter-strokes with indifference.

NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA.

A tone of some exultation is shown by Tokyo newspapers in announcing the fact that the steamers on the European service of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha are to call henceforth at London on their return journey. They have hitherto called there on their outward voyage only, and have avoided the place on their homeward trip by receiving their passengers and cargo at Southampton. But it appears, if our contemporaries are rightly informed, that the Company has been admitted to the Conference, and that its vessels will hereafter work in coöperation with those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, a P. & O. boat alternating with a N.Y.K. one. The fact of the Japanese company's admission to the Conference is what affords so much satisfaction to the Tokyo journals. They regard it as the first public recognition of the Japanese people's competence to navigate the high seas side by side with Occidental experts—her début upon the "white-wood stage" (hinoki butai), which is the highest histrionic plane in Japan.

GARDEN PARTY IN TOKYO.

A very pretty garden party was given in Tokyo on the 19th instant by Count and Countess Kawamura at their Mami-ana villa. It need scarcely be said that the Satsuma element of society was largely represented, Prince and Princess Shimazu, Count Matsukata, Count Kuroda, and many other high officials of Satsuma extraction being present, together with a large number of naval and military officers, civil officials, prominent business men, and other leading residents of Tokyo, Japanese and foreign. The special occasion celebrated by the party was the wedding of Mr. T. Kawamura to Miss Okubo, daughter of General Okubo; but to this cause of congratulation were added the facts that Count Kawamura had attained his sixty-fourth year and his mother her eighty-first. Weddings in Japan are usually celebrated within the family circle only. There is no great gathering of acquaintances and friends to witness the ceremony itself, nor is it immediately followed by a breakfast and reception. The custom is to give a party at some later date—perhaps a month, perhaps two months subsequently—for the purpose of introducing the young couple to society. Such was the motive of Wednesday's party. The weather was perfect, just warm enough to enable the house and the garden to be thrown into one another, and there remained enough of cherry bloom to make a delicately tinted foreground to the noble prospect of city and sea which the villa commands. On the lower terrace of the ground the naval band played, and refreshments were served by a bevy of little maidens wearing picturesque costumes in bright colours, while in the building above, Japanese classical dances and music were performed.

Count Kawamura may be called the father of the modern Japanese navy. Though serving in the Imperial army at the time of the Restoration, when he distinguished himself so signally in the campaign against the Aizu men, maritime affairs seem to have attracted his attention from the first, and, shortly after the Meiji administration had been organized, he was transferred from the post of Vice-Minister of the War Department to be Minister of the Navy. In those days there were no political parties to keep everything in a ferment. Good men had opportunities to work out their useful ideas without fear of being driven from office before their projects had passed the stage of inception. Count Kawamura directed naval affairs for eight years, and laid the foundations of the fine service which now does Japan so much credit. Speaking to his guests on Wednesday, he described the circumstances under which the first band for performing foreign music was trained in Japan. On the occasion of a visit to an English war-ship in Yokohama harbour, the Count heard a band play, and was so much impressed by the music that he resolved to introduce something similar in his own country. That led to the engagement of Mr. Fenton, band-master of Her Majesty's Xth Regiment, which was then stationed in Yokohama, and in a few years the Naval Department had a band of competent musicians. A direct result of this enterprise was that Japan came into possession of her national anthem, Kimigayo, which may now be said to form a part of the people's every-day life, and Count Kawamura remarked, with some emotion, that he never heard the strains of the Kimigayo without recalling the old days and the chequered circumstances amid which were born so many institutions now promising to attain a ripe manhood.

The party was in all respects an eminent success and the guests carried away a delightful impression of the old and the new picturesquely blended.

FINANCE.

The Treasury is understood to hold between 50 and 60 million yen worth of securities which have been purchased with funds taken from the Indemnity, and must therefore be sold, sooner or later, to meet outlays which would otherwise have been defrayed from the Indemnity. This account, according to recently published figures, stands thus:—

War Bonds purchased by the Bank of Japan in 1890 to ease the money market	34,495,000
Public Undertakings and Railway Bonds bought in by the Government	19,679,000
Debentures of the Industries Bank	2,461,000
Total	56,635,000

In addition to the above there are 20 millions yen worth—face value—of Chinese Loan Bonds, purchased as part of the last instalment of the Indemnity. Twenty millions have doubtless been transferred to the Imperial Estates Bureau, in accordance with the vote of the Diet, but there still remains a large volume of securities to be converted into cash. The sale of 5 million yen worth, just made to the Bank of Japan, seems to be a very natural transaction under the circumstances, but it is condemned by some critics, who maintain that such operations were not contemplated by the Diet when it increased the note-issuing capacity of the Bank from 85 million yen to 120 millions. The Diet's object, they say, was to place monetary facilities within reach of the mercantile and manufacturing classes, not to assist the Treasury in the management of its affairs, and they express surprise that, when seven or eight per cent. can be easily obtained for money in the open market, the Bank of Japan should be willing to purchase five per cent. bonds. For our own part, these criticisms appear to us to be the only strange part of the incident. It is quite certain that if the Bank found a demand for money on tolerably good security at seven or eight per cent., it would not lend its funds at five. But the point is that no demand of the kind appears to exist within the sphere of legitimate banking operations. There is a great and growing outcry for loans on the security of real estate and immovable property, but the Bank of Japan does not make loans of that nature, and the fact is that whereas it has a residuum of note-issuing capacity to the extent of some 35 million yen, no satisfactory means of investing the money present themselves. It is all very well to say that the Bank should assist merchants and manufacturers, but if merchants and manufacturers are not in a position to contract loans on negotiable terms, the Bank must look for some other method of employing its notes. By purchasing 5 million yen worth of Government Bonds, it makes a net annual profit of 1½ million yen; a sufficiently satisfactory transaction.

ART LOTTERY IN TOKYO.

An exhibition and lottery of Japanese drawings and paintings is announced to take place at the first meeting of the Ushigome Fine Art Association in Tokyo on Sunday the 23rd instant, from 8 a.m. There are to be 300 prizes, in the form of pictures by modern artists, which will be distributed by lot. We have not seen any of the pictures to be distributed, and are consequently unable to speak of their merits, but the affair seems to be bond fide, being modelled, apparently, on the lotteries held periodically by fine art societies in London. There will also be an exhibition of "rare works of ancient distinguished artists," and pictures will be painted in the presence of visitors at their request. The lottery takes place at 2 p.m., and the name of the salon is the Yoshikuma-ro, in Tansumachi, Ushigome. We imagined that such affairs were illegal in Japan. Certainly a great many foreigners retain unpleasant recollections of the national exhibition of 1891, which ended in a lottery that drew numerous subscriptions but was never itself drawn.

It appears that the idea of the exhibition announced by the Ushigome Art Society for the 23rd instant is not a lottery, in the ordinary sense of the word, nor is it suggested by the lotteries of similar Associations in Europe. What the promoters contemplate is to present to each visitor a souvenir of the occasion in the form of a picture painted by a modern artist. It is evident, however, that there must be devised some method of distributing the pictures, without consulting the choice of those who are to receive them, and for that purpose lots will be drawn, so that every one will have an equal chance of obtaining a choice drawing. The scheme is attractive, and as the tickets of admission are to be 2 yen each, the attendance is not likely to be inconveniently large.

INDIVIDUAL MORALITY & STATE MORALITY.

It is amusing to find the Japanese beginning to comment in very strong terms on the difference between the morality of individuals and the morality of States in the Occident. The individual European or American considers himself bound by a code of strict integrity in his dealings with others. He lays down very beautiful theories about the sphere of each person's rights and the obligation devolving upon each not to trespass on his neighbour's sphere. He is also courteous and considerate in his demeanour, and he subscribes to many sociological doctrines which make for the federation of mankind and the brotherhood of nations. But from the moment when his moral obligations cease to be personal and are shared by his nationals in common, all these fine principles are discarded, and the practical creed of the robber and the pirate is embraced. Moreover, he has one law for foreign States; another for himself. Thus, when Japan acquired Liaotung by conquest, three of the Great European Powers preached a sermon to her about the impropriety of her act, and about its danger to the integrity of China. She had to surrender the territory, and immediately one of three appropriated it. What had been wrong and vicious on her part became right and virtuous on theirs. Their conduct towards China is another example. Why are they all so anxious to lend money to her? They place no faith in her promises. Her credit stands about as low as a great nation's could be. Yet they compete with each other to furnish funds for her use. The reason is that they thus establish a sort of reversionary interest in her possessions. They hope, in short, to make a great profit in the day of her partition. They are governed by motives exactly analogous to those of the usurer who lends money to a sick man, and will seize the very lid of his medicine pot when he comes to distraint the debtor's goods. The only remnant of conscience they possess is shown in their selection of euphemisms to disguise the nakedness of their methods. When they encroach upon the territories of another country and destroy its integrity, they pretend that they are "colonizing," whereas in reality they are simply stealing.

We take this pretty indictment from the columns of the Asahi. The trouble is that it cannot be gainsaid.

"THE FLORAL ART OF JAPAN."

We observe that Mr. J. Conder is about to publish a second edition of his beautiful work on the floral art of Japan. This book is a monograph. It has no rival, nor is likely to have one. Messrs. Kelly and Walsh invite subscriptions, offering the work at the singularly cheap rate of 12 yen a copy to those who subscribe. We do not understand how such a volume can be sold so cheaply, but presumably the cost will be much larger for buyers who fail to take advantage of the subscription rate. The prospectus of the second edition says:—

PROSPECTUS.

The author, in response to the demand for a second edition of his work "The Flowers of Japan and the Art of Floral Arrangement," now issues an enlarged and amended volume under the title of "The Floral Art of Japan." The original coloured illustrations have been replaced by others from the designs of Ogata Gekko, a leading painter of the Ukiyo-e (popular) School, executed with an attempt to preserve the soft and harmonious colouring for which the colour prints of Japan are famous. A considerable addition has been made to the outline plates to illustrate new floral designs of the Ikenobo and other styles. The text has been carefully revised and fresh matter introduced with the object of more fully explaining the details of the art treated of. The original form of paper binding has been given up on account of its liability to become soiled and frayed, and because of the difficulty of opening back a volume bound in this manner. The author has adopted instead a cloth binding of simple and tasteful design, the result being a volume both handsome and durable. The important changes and additions in the present addition make it a desirable acquisition to those already possessing the first edition.

To Subscribers the present edition is offered at Twelve Yen, but the cost will be increased after publication.

MR. DIOXY.

Mr. Dioxy has been entertained at the Shiba Detached Palace by the Minister of the Imperial Household and Baron Sannomiya, the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs being among the guests. Another leading Tokyo journal has added its voice to the chorus of persons that urge the advisability of giving a hearty welcome to Mr. Dioxy, and we entertain no doubt that he will carry away with him a very appreciative conception of Japanese hospitality.

NEW TORPEDO DESTROYERS.

Some particulars of the race between the two torpedo-destroyers, Shinonome and Murakumo, are published by the vernacular press, but, inasmuch as there appears to be great uncertainty whether the vessels really engaged in a race, the event does not possess much interest. The Murakumo, with her Japanese crew, seems to have been making her way out leisurely when she was overtaken at Aden by the Shinonome, with an English crew. The Murakumo made very bad weather in the Indian Ocean, rolling through an angle of 34°, and getting some of her iron-work so hot that hands could not be laid on it. She reached Colombo on the evening following the Shinonome's arrival there, and left two days ahead of her competitor, but seems to have been quickly overhauled by the latter, for when she entered Singapore the Shinonome was leaving it. The Shinonome made Hongkong several days before the Murakumo, but was detained there owing to some trouble which involved a trial in the Law Court, the master being summoned by the German Consul for drawing a pistol on him. A fine of $25 or a month's imprisonment was the result. The Shinonome ultimately left Hongkong on the 9th instant, and was followed by the Murakumo on the 10th, but it is claimed that the vessels were together when passing Chusan, and the Murakumo entered Saselo on the afternoon of the 14th, while the Shinonome reached Yokosuka at 5 a.m. on the 16th. It thus appears that the Shinonome can at least claim the credit of having made the journey in much less time than the Murakumo, but, on the other hand, it may be pleaded that honours are divided, since neither vessel gained any decided advantage over the other after racing openly commenced, assuming that it commenced at all.

It is said that the condition of the new torpedo-destroyer Shinonome did not prove at all satisfactory. She came out in charge of an English crew and reached Yokosuka at 5 a.m. on the 15th instant, but the Japanese Naval Authorities hesitated to take delivery of her, finding she had been treated very badly on the way out. We learn this from the Fiji Shimpō. The statement is couched in mysterious language. Reference is made to bad time made by the vessel between Hongkong and Yokosuka, as proving that she had sustained some damage, and naval experts are reported to have come to the conclusion that it is bad policy to have ships brought out by foreign crews, since they take no real interest in the vessel's condition. A strange notion, in our opinion. Any competent Englishman—and assuredly only a competent man would be chosen for such a purpose—can be relied on to bestow the best possible treatment on a ship entrusted to his care, whether she belongs to his own country or to a foreign state. If there has been an exception in the case of the Shinonome, it is an exception: that is all that need be said. The Japanese may certainly claim to be the most fastidious people in the world if they are not content with British seamen's management and care of vessels. Probably the Fiji Shimpō's version of this affair is greatly deficient in accuracy.

The Yokosuka naval authorities have formally denied the report published by several newspapers to the effect that the Shinonome had been so badly treated by her British crew on the voyage from England as to make it difficult for the Japanese to take delivery. The delay of two days in taking over the ship was inevitable, the authorities say, and must have occurred under any circumstances. Tokyo journals are not altogether satisfied by the denial. Naturally they are reluctant to admit that the sweeping general deductions they drew as to the unwisdom of employing foreigners to bring out Japanese men-of-war were entirely groundless.

JAPAN TEA IN CANADA.

There is considerable indignation and excitement in journalistic circles because the Canadian Government is about to discriminate against certain Eastern teas, by imposing a duty of 2 sen per lb. on Japanese or Chinese green tea and 4 sen on Chinese black, whereas Indian and Ceylon teas will be admitted duty-free. The Yomiuri Shimbun makes use of this event as a stick to beat the Foreign Office. It declares that the Japanese tea trade is about to experience a serious set back in consequence of the incompetence of the country's diplomatists, and in proof of its charge it explains that if England's applications for an alliance with Japan had not been rejected, this misfortune would not have occurred. We do not wish to be impolite to our contemporary, but truly such talk appears to be mere persiflage. England has never sought an alliance with Japan, and consequently Japan has never been in a position to reject her overtures. Whether the existence of such an alliance would have affected Canada's fiscal policy is more than doubtful, for Canada in these matters thinks first of her own convenience and secondly of the mother country's interests. It is only within very recent times that she has adopted a comparatively liberal policy towards imports from Great Britain, and, if the British Government found itself for many years quite unable to influence her, the Japanese Government can hardly be blamed for failing. In truth the Yomiuri only invites ridicule when it advances such propositions; especially when it talks of England's having repeatedly sought an alliance with Japan. England is not in the habit of begging for alliances, and she has yet to experience a refusal such as our Tokyo contemporary alleges Japan to have given.

Of course this tax looks like a serious matter for Japan. It means an impost of 27 per cent. The green tea, pan-fire and basket-fire, sent by her to Canada every year aggregates 5½ million lbs., in round numbers, and its average price at the port of shipment is 20 sen per lb., or, say, 22 sen in the Canadian market. But will the consumption of the staple be seriously affected by an addition of 6 sen, or a penny half-penny, to the cost of each pound? Probably not. Canadian tea-drinkers are not likely to be greatly deterred by so paltry an increase of price.

A Canadian telegram was received yesterday by a Yokohama tea firm in the effect that the Canadian tea dealers are using their utmost efforts in favour of the imposition of a heavy duty on Japanese tea, and it is striking what immense expenses Ceylon tea dealers are incurring for the attainment of their object.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Count Okuma has paid his long-talked-of visit to Sendai, and has addressed a meeting of some two thousand persons. He was accompanied by Viscount Miura, who also spoke, and the chairman of the meeting was Mr. Kono Hironaka. The Count's Party have now definitely committed themselves to the policy of reduced taxation. That was the gist of the speeches delivered at Sendai, and it was also the drift of the solitary resolution adopted by the meeting:—

Without development at home there can be no expansion abroad. In an era of great affairs like the present, the husbanding of the country's strength is essential. But those in power pursue a merely temporizing policy, adopt no helpful measure, heap tax upon tax, and threaten to exhaust the national resources. Therefore, having regard to domestic and foreign conditions alike, we hereby resolve to make it our prime object to effect large economies in all the Departments of State.

Newspapers opposed to Count Okuma denounce the above platform as obsolete and entirely out of touch with the times. They ask how taxes already imposed are to be remitted, and what substitutes the Progressists propose to find if they cut down the revenue by reducing taxation. But, so far as we can see, what the Progressists advocate is the diminution of administrative expenditures. That is always a popular card to play, and it will make a strong game by-and-by in Japan.

On this northward trip of Count Okuma's there was an alarm that a plot had been formed to assassinate him. From the accounts published by Tokyo newspapers we can not discover exactly whether the Count's programme was changed in consequence of the discovery of the plot. The story is that a friendly gathering was arranged to be held at Otawara, in the Nasu district, and that Mr. Kimura, a member of the Party, proceeded to Utsunomiya to meet Count Okuma, and rode thence in the train with him as far as Otawara. Count Okuma did not alight at the latter place, however, and Mr. Kimura went alone to the meeting, where he received a telegram warning him of the plot and telling him to adopt every precaution. The telegram came from the office of the Party's Shimotsuke branch. Mr. Kimura at once wired the intelligence to Fukushima and Sendai, and a great deal of commotion ensued. From this story it would seem that the scheme—if, indeed, there was a scheme—had been planned with a view to the Otawara meeting, and that Count Okuma's accidental failure to attend the meeting dislocated the arrangements.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

In addressing the meeting of Local Governors now assembled in Tokyo, the Prime Minister gave the first place in his remarks to matters connected with the operation of the Revised Treaties. His Excellency did not speak with any explicitness. He confined himself to pointing out that, in the sequel of investigations made by the Committee organized for the purpose, various measures had been framed and passed by the Diet last session, so that the legislative preliminaries might now be regarded as complete. The successful application of these laws must depend, however, on the intelligence shown in enforcing them. Marquis Yamagata consequently exhorted judicial, police, and jail officials to bring the greatest possible care to the discharge of their functions, and reminded the Local Governors that by intelligent administration on their part there might be created in the minds of foreigners a feeling of security which would tend materially to promote the smooth working of the new system.

The spirit of these remarks is, of course, precisely what might have been expected in any instructions issued by the Prime Minister. But it has often occurred to us of late that too much importance is shown officially with regard to the operation of the new Treaties. Quite an exaggerated mood has been educated among the people. They look forward to July as the inauguration of a new era, and are persuaded that a sensible effect will be at once produced on the market value of all property. There does not appear to be any definite idea how the appreciation is to be brought about; but that a number of foreigners will come upon the scene and compete keenly for land and houses, is now an article of established faith though the purpose of the competitors is quite obscure. In Tokyo the influence of this forecast is very palpable. Owners of land talk of yen where they formerly spoke of sen only, and house-holders not only ask enormous rents, but regard themselves as so completely masters of the situation that they scorn the notion of discharging the obligations ordinarily devolving on landlords. There will be a rude awakening. No tide of pent-up energy waits to flow out of the Settlements when the ancient barriers are broken down. The Japanese will find all things jogging along in their well-worn grooves without the slightest symptom of a novel departure.

DIFFICULT TO PLEASE.

The Fiji Shimpō is certainly in a rather captious frame of mind at present. The other day it had a strong article, complaining that Japan is not known or understood by Englishmen; that her credit is consequently mediocre; and urging that some one be despatched to London for the purpose of correcting this state of affairs by voice and pen. But now, referring to the telegraphic news of last Thursday that The Times, in a leading article on Japanese finance, had expressed confidence in Japan's ability to repay any loan she might require, our contemporary opines that the great journal's utterances will not produce any considerable effect on the prospects of Japan's loan. What would satisfy the Fiji, we wonder, if The Times does not satisfy it? It then goes on to repeat statements which were published in these columns two years ago, and have been repeated again and again since that time, namely, that the important measures to be taken for rendering Japanese securities popular in Europe is to lengthen the period prior to redemption as well as the period of redemption, or, still better, to make redemption depend upon the convenience of the holder, as is the case with British Consols. Japanese financiers understand these things perfectly well, and understand also, what the Fiji does not mention, that some security should be given against the taxing of the bonds.

FOREIGNERS IN JAPANESE PRISONS.

It has been definitely settled, we understand, that pending the transfer of the provincial prisons to the Central Government and the re-organization of prison administration, foreigners held under warrant of arrest or incarcerated for offences after July next will be lodged in the consular jails at the open ports, which buildings will pass into the possession of the Japanese Government by purchase on the abolition of extraterritorial jurisdiction. Some of the Japanese prisons are much finer and more commodious edifices than the old consular jails, but, on the whole, it seems to be thought desirable that the latter should be employed for this purpose, as they have always served for the imprisonment of foreigners, and no exception can justly be taken to their arrangement and accommodation.

THE TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

Attention is called by the Shoggo Shimpō to the fact that the law authorizing the Government to extend the tobacco monopoly to all imports of the staple will become operative from the 15th of September next. There has been some uncertainty whether, in carrying out this new arrangement, the Finance Department would employ its own staff, or whether it would farm the monopoly to two or three great dealers. The latter course seem to have been decided upon, in view of the fact that the Government officials and employés are without the necessary experience. The point made by the Shoggo is that all the tobacco imported by private dealers may be refused entry, unless it has passed the customs before September 15th. Any cargo coming to hand after that date will have to be re-exported unless it has the good fortune to be taken over by the official monopolists.

METAPHYSICAL LECTURES AT THE IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY.

Professor Ladd, of Yale University, one of the most distinguished of modern philosophers, has been engaged to come to Japan and deliver a short course of lectures—covering one month, we believe—at the Imperial University in Japan. The prospect is alluded to in enthusiastic terms by the Fimmō, which claims that America now leads the world in the science of psychology, and that Professor Ladd is one of the three greatest Americans in that field. Those propositions might be challenged, perhaps, especially the former, but there can be no doubt that Professor Ladd is one of the most eminent men of the time.

A correspondent writes:—"It is too much to say that Professor Ladd has been engaged to come to Japan. That would be a big expenditure for the purpose. But he is coming on a second visit to Japan, on his own account, and he has been engaged to lecture for a month on psychology."

THE "CHITOSE."

The 2nd-class cruiser Chitose, which has been constructed at San Francisco, arrived at Yokosuka on Thursday. She left San Francisco on the 21st ultimo, and came via Hawaii.

JURIDICAL PERSONS AND LAND OWNERSHIP.

WE find the following in an exchange:—

A nine years' resident writes from Japan to Engineering on a note that appeared in that journal on the criticisms of the Japan Mail on the memorial to Lord Salisbury by British residents in Kobe. After dealing with these he proceeds:—

Your contributor goes on to draw attention to Dr. L. LÖNHOLM's "Digest" on the condition of foreigners under the new treaties, and congratulates the author on the clearness of his explanation and his successful avoidance of technicalities. These excellencies I readily admit; but I do not admit that he is altogether a safe or trustworthy guide, and I would strongly advise those of your readers, whose interest in the subject is sufficient to prompt them to the wearisome task, to verify every statement of that "Digest" (which, by the way, cost the International Committee of Yaku-hans some 3,000 yen) from Dr. Lönholm's own translation of the new Civil Code, not forgetting the earlier laws which govern it.

For example, Dr. Lönholm states that "a partnership or company created in Japan under the Japanese law and duly registered becomes a Japanese juridical person, distinct from its individual members, even though some or all of its members are foreigners. . . . Thus, although John Doe and Richard Roe as individuals cannot hold land separately or jointly, the firm of Doe and Roe organized under Japanese law might do so. The consequence is that any foreign firm established in Japan under Japanese law may own land like a Japanese subject, but a partnership or company organized in a foreign country under foreign law, even though it has established a branch office in Japan, would not be allowed to own land." (The italics are Dr. Lönholm's own.)

Now, what does the Code say? Article 36, "The existence of foreign juridical persons other than States administrative districts and commercial companies is not admitted, but this does not apply to such foreign juridical persons as are admitted by law or treaty. Foreign juridical persons admitted under the provisions of the preceding paragraph have the same rights as the same classes of juridical persons existing in Japan; but this does not apply to such rights as foreigners cannot enjoy, or so far as special provisions are made by law and treaty."

And what does the law say? Article 2 of the Regulations relating to Mortgage and Hypothecation of Land. Notification No. 18 of the sixth year of Meiji (A.D. 1873), prohibits the sale or hypothecation of land to a foreigner. Is not this one of the "rights that foreigners cannot enjoy?"

Until a test case has actually been tried, I, for one, shall regard Dr. Lönholm's dictum with reserved respect, and shall not, even as a "juridical person," invest my money in Japanese land.

This "nine years' resident" writes in a manner which strongly recalls the style of the Kobe Memorial. Just as the drafters of the Kobe Memorial, on the strength of a supposed discovery that an act of bad faith had been committed by Japanese officials fifteen years ago, did not hesitate to declare that the Japanese Government's fulfilment of its pledges depended chiefly on the precautions observed to hold it to them, so the Kobe "nine years' resident," having discovered, as he imagined, an inconsistency between Dr. LÖNHOLM'S translation of the Civil Code and Dr. LÖNHOLM'S digest of it, recommends that, before accepting the accuracy of the digest, every statement contained in it should be verified by reference to the Code itself, "not forgetting the earlier laws which govern it." That is a fine wholesale method of impugning Dr. LÖNHOLM'S competence, and of course we are prepared to find that the author of such sweeping verdicts himself furnishes an example of the faults he detects in others. It might have occurred to him, had he considered the matter with even a modicum of the attention required by such questions, that a skilled jurist, having undertaken to prepare a digest of a body of laws, was not likely to commit himself to a statement diametrically opposed to the clear provisions of one of those laws. He might have conjectured that, whereas the privileges granted to foreigners by the Code are plainly differentiated from privileges interdicted by law or treaty, Dr. LÖNHOLM was not likely to explicitly include among the former a privilege clearly falling within the latter category. But he does not seem to have reflected at all, and the result is that he commits himself to a blunder of such dimensions that, taking it in conjunction with the confident method of the statement, his readers are treated to quite a quaint spectacle. He quotes an article of the Code relating solely to "foreign juridical persons" and complacently applies it to Japanese juridical persons! "Foreign juridical persons admitted under the provisions of the preceding paragraph," says the Article quoted, "have the same rights as the same class of juridical persons existing in Japan; but this does not apply to such rights as foreigners can not enjoy, or so far as special provisions are made by law or treaty." Now individual foreigners, as "Nine Years' Resident" justly points out, are forbidden to acquire land in Japan by purchase or hypothecation, and his inference is that "foreign juridical persons" are consequently subject to the same veto. But has Dr. LÖNHOLM, has any competent authority, ever hinted that a foreign juridical person will possess the right of owning land in Japan? Of course not. There never has been any question of foreign juridical persons. Dr. LÖNHOLM has pointed out a privilege enjoyed by Japanese juridical persons, and has asserted his opinion that since individual foreigners are permitted by the new Codes to organise themselves into Japanese juridical persons, and since from the moment of their registration as such, the nationality and even the individuality of their members are entirely merged in their legally acquired juridical capacity, therefore they become entitled to all the privileges granted by law to Japanese juridical persons. A foreign juridical person—that is to say, the juridical person designated in the article which the Kobe writer quotes—is a certain kind of personality constituted in accordance with the provisions of foreign laws and registered in a foreign country. Among such foreign "persons" the Japanese Code provides that recognition shall be given in Japan to three kinds only, namely, States, administrative districts, and commercial companies. Any one of these organizations, though not originally registered in Japan or constituted in strict conformity with Japanese law, can obtain recognition in Japan for business purposes, can sue or be sued before Japanese tribunals in its capacity of a juridical person, but can not become a Japanese juridical person. If any one is sufficiently credulous to imagine, as the Kobe critic imagines, that the Civil Code of Japan is drafted so carelessly as to mean Japanese juridical persons when it speaks of foreign juridical persons, he will do well to read Art. 49 which says:—

The provisions of Art. 45 (3), 46, and 48 apply where a foreign juridical person has established an office in Japan; but as to facts arising in foreign countries, the period for registration is computed from the time when notice thereof is received.

When a foreign juridical person first establishes an office in Japan, third persons need not recognise the existence of such juridical person, until registration has been effected at the place of its office.

This Article will probably help the Kobe writer to understand that a foreign juridical person is not a Japanese juridical person, and that provisions explicitly referring to the former are not necessarily applicable to the latter.

What we have thus far written is sufficient to show that in quoting Dr. LÖNHOLM'S translation of the Code as contradicting Dr. LÖNHOLM'S digest, "Nine Years' Resident" has simply made his own mistaken interpretation of the former the basis of an erroneous criticism of the latter. As to the main question itself, namely, whether a Japanese juridical person composed of foreigners may own land in Japan, the difficulty which evidently stands in some people's way is that if Smith or Brown separately has no right to own land, Smith plus Brown collectively can not have it. But the fact is that, so soon as Smith and Brown combine to form a partnership, and register themselves as a juridical person, there is created in the eyes of the law a new entity absolutely unconnected with the units constituting it. By referring to the Civil Code it will be seen that the names of the individuals forming a juridical person are not among the matters registered. The law, in fact, knows nothing about the individuals. It knows only the names and domiciles of the managers, who may or may not be members of the association constituting the juridical person. Consider, for example, the case of a partnership or company organized in accordance with the sanction embodied in the diplomatic note accompanying the German Revised Treaty. It is laid down in that note that the presence of foreigners in a partnership does not invalidate the latter's right to own land as a juridical person. Nothing whatever is said as to the proportion of foreigners to Japanese: there may be a dozen foreigners to one Japanese. Does the land-owning right of the association depend solely on the presence of one Japanese among its members? If so, the juridical person is constituted by the one Japanese member, a plainly absurd conclusion, for, according to law, an association for purposes of profit or public utility can alone become a juridical person, and it goes without saying that one individual can not be called an association. Hence, since an association of one Japanese with several foreigners derives its title to the status of a juridical person from the presence of the foreigners, it certainly is not debarred by their presence from enjoying the rights of a juridical person. Or, again, it is easy to conceive a purely Japanese association employing foreign managers only. Then, if such an association acquired the ownership of land in its capacity of juridical person, the only names of individuals appearing in the register of ownership would be those of the foreign managers, for the managers represent the juridical person vis-à-vis the law. The broad fact is that a juridical person exists in the eyes of the law quite independently of the individuals composing it. Whatever rights it possesses are derived from its recognition and registration as a juridical person, and have nothing whatever to do with the personality or nationality of its members. The first point which people sharing the views of "Nine Years' Resident" have to demonstrate, in order to establish their proposition, is that foreigners alone can not constitute a juridical person in Japan. Nothing of the kind can be demonstrated. Any association of foreigners formed in Japan for purposes of profit or public utility, in accordance with the laws of Japan, can be registered as a juridical person and thereby becomes an entity which the law distinguishes altogether from the units composing it, and which acquires, in its capacity of a legal entity, rights entirely independent of its members as individuals. Land-ownership is among those rights. If these assertions do not carry conviction, we invite attention to the three conclusions involved in their negation; first, that foreigners associating themselves in Japan with the object of gain or public utility can not obtain legal recognition as a juridical person; secondly, that a juridical person legally recognised in Japan acquires no rights except those already possessed by its individual units; and thirdly, that the law differentiates juridical persons in respect of their units. Perhaps if sceptics like "Nine Years' Resident" would employ their own recipe, namely, to verify every one of their statements by reference to the new Civil Code, they would begin to perceive that this problem of juridical persons shares the fate of superficies in being obscured solely by its novelty.

SUPERFICIES AND BRITISH SUBJECTS.

THE Japan Times, reverting to the above subject in an interesting and carefully reasoned article, traverses the arguments recently advanced by us, and arrives at conclusions which, however ably stated, do not appear to be fairly deducible from our contemporary's data.

There are two points at issue. The first is, whether British subjects are entitled, under the provisions of the Revised Anglo-Japanese Treaty, to enjoy in Japan the form of land-tenure legally designated "superficies;" the second, whether, supposing that such a privilege is 'not secured for British subjects by that Treaty, it accrues to them, as most-favoured nationals, under the German-Japanese Treaty.

The former question is purely one of interpretation. In the English text of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, it is laid down that British subjects may "lease land in Japan for residential and commercial purposes." Now, as the writer in the Japan Times justly says, the tenure of land by superficies and the tenure of land by lease are distinguished in Japanese law. The former is the greater privilege, and since the minor can not contain the major, the right to be a lessee is not capable of being extended so as to cover the right to be a superficies. Leasing, therefore, is the only form of land-tenure secured to British subjects by the strict terms of the Treaty.

We quite admit the force of that line of reasoning. Let us follow it a little more closely, however. And first let us abide by the English language in construing the Treaty, conceding, of course, to the term "lease" its widest significance in that language consistently with the laws of Great Britain. Now in England land may be obtained, and is constantly obtained, on building-leases, which run for very lengthy periods, the commonest being 99 years. Such a form of land tenure is plainly brought by the Treaty within reach of Japanese subjects in Great Britain. Again, as our contemporary truly notes, the Treaty is reciprocal. In other words, its British negotiators were entitled to assume that, whatever privileges of land-leasing it conferred on Japanese subjects in Great Britain under British law, corresponding privileges would be conferred, as far as possible, on British subjects in Japan under Japanese law. Superficies is the form of land-tenure in Japan corresponding, for all practical purposes, to the English building-lease. It may, indeed, correspond exactly to the latter, since a superficies may be simply a hirer of land for a lengthy but fixed term of years in consideration of paying an annual rent. But he may also differ from an ordinary lessee, since he can acquire the right to own land by payment of a lump sum at the outset. We recognise the difference. We recognise that, in one of its forms, a superficies is more than a lease. But we recognise, also, that it is absolutely distinct from ownership, and that it fulfils the essential character of a lease since it secures the reversion of the land to its owner after a fixed term of years.

Now, with these facts before us, what we ask is this:—Can it be justly claimed that, whereas the Treaty confers on Japanese subjects in Great Britain the full rights of land tenure provided by British law for building purposes, the corresponding rights provided by Japanese law for the same purpose are not conferred on British subjects in Japan, simply because Japanese legislators happen to have employed a terminology ampler than, though in no fundamental sense different from, the British terminology? We do not think that such a claim can be justly advanced.

Suppose, in the second place, that we agree to abide by the Japanese language in construing the Treaty. Then the case becomes even worse for our contemporary. For if we have to interpret the Treaty by the exact provisions of Japanese law, we have a right to expect that the terminology of the Treaty will be in strict accord with the terminology of the law. But there is no such accordance. The law uses two terms to express land-tenure as distinguished from land-owning. They are chijō-ken (superficies) and chintai-shaku (lease). The Treaty uses neither. Its term is kari-ukeru, the common every-day expression for "obtaining on hire." Have we any right to assume that the Japanese drafters of the Treaty intended to refer to chintai-shaku as distinguished from chijō-ken when they employed neither the one word nor the other, and that they expected the Treaty to be interpreted in the most explicit and restricted sense of the law though they made no attempt to identify their own phraseology with that of law? We do not think that any such assumption can be justly made.

Then, there is another phase of the argument. The British Treaty secures to the subjects of the contracting parties the right to "own or hire and occupy the houses, manufactories, warehouses, shops, and premises which may be necessary for them." It appears to us that if the ownership of a house or manufactory be limited to a term of 20 years—as would be the case were its so-called owner unable to obtain any longer title to the land on which it stands—, then the privilege of ownership becomes almost illusory. Most assuredly no sane person would think of investing capital in the construction of a factory if he could not certainly look forward to retaining possession of it for more than 20 years, and since the only way of extending his title beyond that limit is to obtain a superficies of the site, we are forced to conclude that the framers of the Treaty never contemplated the denial of the right of superficies. Our contemporary contends that commercial business may be, and is, successfully conducted in premises rented under leases of even less than 20 years' duration. We fully admit the fact. But our argument was not directed to the possibility of carrying on business in temporarily occupied premises. Our argument was directed to the significance of the explicit Treaty privilege "own houses, manufactories, warehouses, &c." We do not claim that the ownership of buildings is essential to the transaction of trade business. What we claim is that to promise the privilege of owning buildings under laws which restrict the period of ownership to twenty years is almost an abuse of terms, and that, since superficies is the sole device explicitly provided by the laws of Japan for giving practical value to the ownership of buildings by securing to their owner a lengthy tenure of the site on which they stand, the privilege of becoming a superfiary of land is virtually included in the privilege of owning buildings. If, when the time came for putting this Treaty into operation, it was found that British subjects could not legally own buildings in Japan for more than 20 years, the bona fides of the Japanese negotiators might be called in question. It might be said to the Japanese Government:—"You promised that British subjects should enjoy the privilege of owning houses, as distinguished from hiring them. You subscribed an Article providing that they might 'own or hire' houses, factories, and other buildings. Yet it appears that, for the purpose of implementing this Treaty, you sift your laws so as practically to reduce ownership to mere hiring."

It is not our intention for a moment to query Japan's right of modifying or rescinding her laws as she pleases. There we are at one with our contemporary. We endorse its words:—"No one would think of denying the absolute right of Great Britain to do away at any moment with any of her land titles of a higher dignity than leases, notwithstanding the provisions of Art. III. of her Treaty with Japan, and our contention is nothing more than that Japan enjoys the same liberty of action in respect of superficies." If that be indeed our contemporary's only contention, there is no difference of opinion, for our own unique claim is that so long as superficies exists in the laws of Japan British subjects are entitled to become superfiaries under the Treaty and throughout its duration. If no such form of land-tenure as superficies were created by the laws of Japan, its creation would certainly not be necessitated by her treaty with Great Britain. But since such a form of land tenure has actually been created by the laws of Japan, is not denied to foreigners by any of those laws, can not—as we think—be shown to be excluded from the purview of the Treaty, and is manifestly consistent with the spirit of the Treaty, we are constrained to count it among the Japanese institutions which the Treaty brings within reach of foreigners.

In admitting Japan's right to modify or rescind her laws as she pleases, we add the proviso that she is bound by good faith not to change them in such a sense as to render her treaties illusory.

All this, it will be observed, concerns the rights directly secured to British subjects by their own Treaty. There remains the independent question whether they are entitled to share in the right of superficies secured to German subjects by the German Treaty. The most-favoured-nation clause seems to supply an affirmative answer. It provides that, in everything concerning commerce and navigation, British subjects shall enjoy any privilege, favour, or immunity granted to other nationals. It appears to us that since the land-tenure mentioned in the Treaty is explicitly stated to be for commercial purposes, and since the Treaty itself is "a treaty of commerce and navigation," it would be fair to assume that any expansion of the privilege of land-tenure may be classed as a privilege that concerns commerce. The writer in the Japan Times takes a different view. His contention is very interesting. We quote it:—

The proper functions of the new most-favoured-nation clause are merely to secure participation in privileges relating to commerce and navigation which have been granted to a third Power, but which have not been specifically provided for elsewhere in the Treaty itself. The clause is precautionary only, and so far as privileges and immunities are secured by direct engagements it is without value or effect.

We cannot admit that the right to lease land for commercial or any other purposes is a matter of commerce within the meaning of Article XV. of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. But, that point apart, the right to lease land is already specifically and fully provided for by Article III. which assures national treatment, and to admit that the right, under such circumstances, comes within the purview of the most favoured nation clause, would consist as little with the recognized rules of interpretation which give preference to special over general engagements, as it would with the views which Her Britannic Majesty's Government frankly expressed some years ago on this subject.

We frankly admit that this view is quite new to us, and we are not at all sure that we apprehend it correctly. Our contemporary's assertion seems to be that the most-favoured-nation clause relates only to matters which are not specifically provided for in the treaty. Even on that hypothesis there appears to be an inconsistency. For if, as our contemporary contends, land-lease is quite distinct from superficies, and land-leasing alone is contemplated by the Treaty, then surely it follows that superficies is an independent privilege, and, as such, should fall within the purview of the clause? Would it be within the competence of Japan to grant exclusively to French or Italian subjects the privilege of owning land for the specific purpose of erecting silk-filatures or silk-weaving factories? If not, we can not see how it is within her competence to grant exclusively to German subjects the privilege of superficies for commercial purposes. And if, again, because the question of land tenure is specially provided for in the Treaty, it is de facto excluded from the general engagement contained in the most-favoured-nation clause, would it not follow that all expansions of the privileges definitely guaranteed by the Treaty are beyond the purview of the most-favoured-nation clause, and may consequently be granted to other nationals but withheld from British subjects? This doctrine enunciated by our contemporary seems to involve serious perplexities. As to the point that the leasing of land for commercial purposes is not a matter of commerce, we presume that the writer in the Japan Times has authority for his statement, but to us it appears that to lease land and a warehouse for storing goods is as much a matter of commerce as to keep a shop for selling them.

THE MINISTER FOR HOME AFFAIRS AND THE LOCAL GOVERNORS.

Marquis Saigo, Minister of State for Home Affairs, addressed the following suggestions to the local Governors in conclave on the 17th instant:—

1. The various sections of the Police Department have hitherto lacked uniformity of nomenclature. Definite designations ought to be given to them as follows:—Section of Police Affairs; Section of Peace Police; Section of Sanitation. In cities and prefectures where it is necessary to establish a separate section for the management of high police affairs, measures may, of course, be adopted to that end.

2. As mixed residence will surely be productive of incidents involving foreigners, it is advisable that steps be taken by the Police Department or by principal police stations, to distribute, at the charges of the locality, constables entrusted solely with the duty of interpreting, so as to obviate practical inconvenience.

3. In special ports of export or other places where incidents connected with maritime matters may be expected to occur frequently, it may be necessary to extend the sphere of the watch-places or out-offices hitherto in existence. Suitable arrangements should be made in future with that object.

4. Police affairs in general require the utmost celerity in their management, and police duties have no limits of time for their discharge. Officers of police should therefore be required to establish their abodes in the vicinity of the stations to which they belong, in order that their services may be immediately available in emergencies. The superintendent of a station, in particular, should consider it an absolute obligation to live within its compound or in its immediate vicinity, so that, by placing himself in a position to attend to affairs under his control without distinction day and night, he may secure the utmost celerity in the discharge of his functions, and be prepared at all times against loss of time in any matter which presents itself for his decision.

With this in view official residences may be provided for the Superintendents of the main and branch stations in so far as local finances permit, and, as for the other members of these stations, lodging expenses may be granted them to secure the propinquity of their residences to their offices, thus enabling them to be expeditious in the discharge of their respective functions.

5. In districts where the services of special experts are liable to be required for inspecting locomotives, steam engines, buildings, or engineering works, the police department may find it necessary to appoint such experts permanently, and suitable arrangements must be made for that purpose. Should a city or prefecture find it financially impossible to adopt measures of the above kind, provision should be made for obtaining the services of experts as a temporary measure, so as to avoid inconvenience in practice.

6. The buildings now used for detention or preliminary enquiry are various in form and construction and their appointments are far from being complete or uniform. These differences are quite incompatible with the uniform treatment of prisoners. Reforms are absolutely indispensable with regard to arrangements as well as furniture in general. Moreover, accused persons or defendants are sometimes examined in the superintendent's office, no steps being taken to provide a separate room for such a purpose, although, the police enquiry being conducted after the manner of a preliminary examination of criminals, it is absolutely necessary that the superintendent's office should be distinct from the place of trial. In police stations where courts for preliminary examination have not yet been established, steps should be taken for their establishment.

7. The necessity for telephonic communication in police affairs admits of no question. Measures have at last been taken to secure the installation of telephones in several places, but this advantage is not yet universally enjoyed. Arrangements ought to be made in every police station with a view to securing greater efficiency.

8. Some police ordinances may in certain localities be found incompatible with the actual condition of the country, while there may be a great many which will require to be re-issued in different form. Measures therefore should be taken at this juncture to investigate their nature, and take necessary steps to adapt them to existing conditions.

9. As affairs relative to judicial police were originally meant to be adjusted by police inspectors, they should in no case be entrusted to ordinary policemen except in the absence or illness of the former, or in other unavoidable circumstances. In the selection of policemen performing duties on behalf of inspectors the utmost discretion must be exercised.

10. Great caution must be observed to guard against abuses of power in summoning persons, and any indiscretion of this description will render the officer responsible liable to official censure. When summonses are necessary, the parties directly involved only shall be called on to appear, so as to prevent interference with the liberty of the subject as far as possible.

11. After the operation of the Revised Treaties no difference can be made between natives and foreigners in the execution of laws and ordinances, but since through the difference in their language and customs many foreigners may unwittingly violate laws and regulations, the police must treat them with urbanity in the case of minor offences and explain to them in what respect they are in error. Instructions on this point shall be given to all the officials and men under their control.

12. As foreigners are allowed, by virtue of their treaties, to enjoy the privileges of buying their own nationals in suitable or convenient places established in conformity with their own religious customs, arrangements shall be made to secure that they shall suffer no inconvenience whatever in this respect after the Revised Treaties go into operation.

13. In landing places, railway stations, public gardens, and all other places likely to be frequented by foreigners, policemen who understand foreign languages should be stationed.

14. The Japanese language shall be used for all public announcements issued by the executive authorities, except in the case of notices, placards, &c., which may have a direct relation to foreigners. Directions and precautionary notices on road sides or in the parks or other public places shall be written in foreign as well as Japanese characters.

15. As complaints with regard to the malpractices of coolies frequenting foreign vessels are heard from time to time, suitable regulations for their control must be established.

16. It is not improbable that the custom still exists of demanding unreasonable fares for vehicles or sampan. Proper steps must be taken to correct such abuses.

17. In the neighbourhood of thermal springs in the country it seems impossible to prohibit altogether the mixed bathing of men and women, but this point should not be overlooked in future with a view to the strict maintenance of public morality. Foreigners, in particular, are likely to regard the practice as an evidence of social degradation, and can hardly avoid being disgusted; and this is especially important as foreigners coming to Japan in most cases visit the hot springs in the country. A policy of gradual reform must be adopted.

18. With regard to the control of newspapers and of public morality, instructions have already been made by the Superintendent of the Police Bureau after conference with the judicial officials, and if the existing regulations be rigorously enforced the publication of matter dangerous to public morals may be effectually prevented. Upon the receipt, in future, of an intimation in favour of prosecution from the Superintendent of the Police Bureau, steps shall be immediately taken to confer with the Public Prosecutor, in order that the utmost discretion may be observed in the proceedings.

19. Japan having joined the International Union for the Protection of copy-rights, the translation, reprinting, or publishing of foreign works belonging to any country connected with the Union must be regarded as an act tantamount to false publication, except in the case of books for which a definite period of grace has been secured by procedure in accordance with Articles XLVIII., XLIX., and L., of the Law. The countries belonging to the Union at present are as follows:—Germany, France, England, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Haiti, Luxemburg, Monaco, Montenegro, and Tunis.

With regard to procedure prescribed in Articles XLVIII., XLIX., and L., of the aforesaid Law, an ordinance shall be issued by the local authorities in the sense of ordering the use of an official seal or the grant of certificates permitting the reproduction of books, or the use of machines or utensils for that purpose, or for translation or republication. In Tokyo the Metropolitan Board of Police, and in other places the Police Department, is required to carry out the provisions as above indicated, and it is therefore necessary for local Governors to adopt preliminary measures in connection therewith.

Instructions with regard to Local Government Bureaux and the Prison Bureaux are also shortly to be issued.

MR. HOSHI TORU'S SENDAI SPEECH.

In England great importance is attached to speeches made in provincial towns by leading politicians. The chief London papers invariably obtain special reports of these utterances. Taking the year through, it is found that country speeches supply far more information as to the policy of the Government and of the Opposition, when the latter, as of old, is fortunate enough to have a policy, than all the Parliamentary orations put together. The Japanese seem to be very excited about politics and hold any number of huge political meetings in various parts of the country, but neither the Tokyo journals nor the provincial newspapers make any attempt to furnish a full report of the speeches delivered by men of learning and eminence on these occasions. The important meeting of the Ketsui to be held in the Sendai za, the largest theatre in Sendai, on the 20th instant, which was attended by some 2,500 persons and lasted six hours, was dismissed in a most summary fashion by the local press. We should like to be able to present our readers with a translation of a verbatim report of Mr. Hoshi Toru's Sendai speech, not only for the sake of the opinions which were stated and traversed by it, and the light it threw on a number of modern political questions, but for the sake of showing how extremely lucid, concise, and telling the discussion of apparently dry subjects may be made when the speaker has such a command of language as that possessed by Mr. Hoshi Toru. As we listened to his flowing sentences, we understood what induced him to give up diplomatic life and take to political oratory. For the latter role he is in every way eminently qualified. His utterance is unusually distinct, his pronunciation is free from any provincial shortcomings, his style is just suited to the platform, since he only resorts to learned terms when no others can be found and even then explains them to his hearers as he goes along. He understands oratory. He understands politics, and, what is still more important, he understands the spirit of the times and all that is involved. He is eminently qualified to be a party leader, because he is full of party spirit and is prepared to denounce his opponents in the most unmeasured language. The ardent partisan banishes courtesy and philosophy from his thoughts. His opponents are incompetent, unpatriotic, benighted, factions, servile, covetous, and so on. Whether a man of Mr. Hoshi's education and experience actually believes all that he told the Sendai people on the 20th about Count Okuma and the leaders of the Shimpo is a question we need not discuss. There are said to be two classes of partisans: one has faith in its own utterances; the other knows those utterances to be more than half untrue, but is content to employ them for the sake of their effect on a gullible public.

Mr. Hoshi Toru was preceded by eight speakers all of whom emptied their quivers in shooting at the same target, the opposition party, the Shimpo to. It may be well to say in passing that the latter party is far more popular in Sendai than the Ketsui to, or the Fryu to, as it used to be called. So that during a part of the proceedings the obstruction and noise were something tremendous. An unusually strong police force was present, owing to a report that the Soshi, who, Mr. Hoshi says are by no means defunct, meant to interfere with the proceedings. Some say that the Ketsui to had taken their own precautions against violence. Among the speeches prior to that of Mr. Hoshi Toru, Mr. Nomuro Juko's was of considerable interest and elicited great applause. Mr. Hoshi's subject was, "The main purpose and raison d'être of the Ketsui to." He commenced by inviting opposition. He said he expected the Shimpo to adherents to be noisy. It was a peculiarity of empty things like drums to make a big noise. He had been told they had Soshi ready to further their efforts. Let them come on. He was ready for them. The policy of the Party could be stated in a few words. It was to maintain the integrity and independence of the Empire—an Empire that had never submitted to a foreign yoke. It was to oppose by every lawful means in their power the men who were doing their best to make these islands an easy prey for greedy loas. The charges he had to bring against Count Okuma and his party were too numerous to be exhausted in the hour which had been allotted for his speech, but he would be able to give them an idea of the heinousness of the crimes committed by the Party he had come in to oppose. Zokutsu (the rubber party), or Gwaishoku to (the Pro-foreign party) were suitable names from it. The nation had to thank for temporarily rendering party government in this country a fiasco. Who broke up the Coalition Cabinet? The Shimpo to, by its treachery and greediness. The crimes which he had to lay to the charge of the Shimpo to were seven in number. (1) There was the Ozaki speech in favour of republicanism—a form of government. What more awful in its possible consequences could be imagined than a member of the Japanese Cabinet giving publicity to such sentiments? Of all the sacred things in this country the throne is most sacred—yet against this was the shaft directed. (2) There was the question of Ohigashi's responsibility. (3) There was the action of Count Okuma in reference to the appointment of Mr. Inokai. (4) There was the despotism of Count Okuma in reporting the Ozaki affair to the Emperor without consulting the Cabinet. (5) There was the gross breach of contract of which the Shimpo to was guilty when it formed a part of the Government. "They promised us that they would act with us in everything, but instead of this they worked in their own interests all the time." Under the 6th and 7th headings the speaker went into a number of small details connected with taxation too technical to be reproduced here.

In speaking of the increase of taxation, Mr. Hoshi said that no political party pretending that the Empire could be maintained without increased taxation was worth listening to. The increase of Japan's armaments could not be postponed for a single day with safety. There were various industrial enterprises which were most urgent and which would involve increased taxation. The question of taxation had to be met and dealt with in a fair manner. It was absurd to expect that any Government could be always putting off the settlement of the question as to what occupations, what commodities, or what properties were to be taxed. They must be guided by what is done in the countries with which they were competing. He might take it for granted that the Sendai people would not agree to hand over the country to foreigners.—(Cries of "Never!") Then they must be prepared to pay for its defence, and defence that was not adequate was no defence at all. Experts alone could know what was required, and they should be given a tolerably free hand. He would come to the question of the remuneration of members of the Diet—a subject that had caused a great deal of sore feeling and on which the opposite party had made some very high-sounding but utterly hollow professions. The Shimpo-to had pretended that they were opposed to the increase in the allowances for members. What were the facts? At first he did not mean to disclose them, out of regard for the pain that it would cause the audience. But the meeting had been noisy and deserved a little disciplining. After the dose he was about to administer certain persons in the assembly would no doubt feel subdued. "Now listen well," said Mr. Hoshi, "after all the grand talk about doing nothing to increase the burdens of the poor oppressed taxpayers, no less than 37 members of the Shimpo-to connected with N. Eastern districts voted for the increase. Their names are all in my possession, and any of you are welcome to them. I will mention a few that are well known to you." Hereupon names were given, and some part of the audience seemed very much astonished. When Mr. Hoshi saw this, he slowly remarked: "I thought so. Many of you have joined this Shimpo-to what knowing what you were going in for. It is the case of buying a pig in a poke. I pity your ignorance of affairs and will help you if you are really sorry for what you have done. There is one thing you may be sure of in the Yiyu-to, and that is that as a party we mean what we say and say what we mean. We are not in the habit of pretending to be anti Government during the day time and stealing to the houses of the Cabinet Ministers under cover of night, as some of the leaders of the Opposition party have habitually done. It is reported that we are connected with the present Government. Undoubtedly we are. If you call us a Government party you will not be far wrong. We recognised before the session of the Diet commenced that, unless we supported the Government, endless confusion and inconvenience and what is more serious, even danger to the State, owing to the critical condition of affairs in China, would ensue, and so we promised our support to save the country from a dissolution of the Diet and all its far-reaching undesirable consequences. What have the men who condemn our policy to say in favour of their own? Nothing worth hearing."

"You have been told that Count Okuma is coming to this city and that he will make a speech explaining the policy of the Shimpo-to. I am not given to prophecy, but I venture to predict that he will do nothing of the kind. The first reason for thinking so is that he is no speaker—to write a speech out of a man who hasn't it in him to make one is beyond your power. The second reason is that he has nothing to say. Of what policy is he the author that is capable of defence? Can he defend his failure to get the Treaties revised? Can he defend his proposal to employ foreign judges in this country in the highest Courts of the land? Can he defend his violation of Art. 63 of the Constitution in giving a Government guarantee for a loan to an American connected with the Korean railway without the consent of the Diet? Can he defend his vacillation in reference to the land tax, his blowing hot and cold in turn? Some of you think that Count Okuma is well versed in foreign affairs. How can a man that speaks no foreign language be versed in foreign affairs? It is because most of you are so profoundly ignorant of foreign affairs that you are easily induced to believe that a man who has several times been Foreign Minister must know something about foreign affairs. Dismiss the delusion from your minds. I know enough about foreign affairs to be aware of how little Count Okuma knows about them. I have been instrumental in helping him out of several scrapes into which his ignorance had betrayed him. It seems a very easy matter to deceive you provincial folks. I have come up here to try and undeceive you. The great work the Yiyu-to has set before it has been the overthrow of despotic government, whatever form it has assumed. To this work we still keep. If at times we have had to resort to some rather rough measures it was because the times were such that no other methods were available which would have enabled us to accomplish our purpose. . . . It is said that you North-Easterners are far behind the South-Westerns, and, rude though it may be to say so, I am inclined to believe that it is true, and that is one reason why the Shimpo-to has hitherto been so prosperous up here. Its principles suit your backward condition. But try and work up a little ambition, and rise higher in the scale of politics than to adhere to a party that has done its best to betray the country to its foes. . . . The difference between this party and the Shimpo-to is that, while our policy in administration, finance, education, commerce, and industry is positive, that of our opponents is negative. It puzzles me to know how people can be satisfied to be found in the ranks of such a party as the Shimpo-to, but there is no accounting for tastes."

This is popular political oratory full of sophism and plausibility, often very inaccurate, with not a little suppression veri and suggestio falsi, but racy and hence taking. One gross inaccuracy in the speech ought not to be passed unnoticed. Mr. Hoshi classed English members of Parliament and American members of the House of Representatives together, and said they were paid for their services to the State. After making this observation he added that in England the expenses of the election of a member were often subscribed by his friends and supporters, and this apropos of the regular payment of members of the Diet by the Japanese Government. Could a remark be more misleading in the connection in which it occurred? Mr. Hoshi may have been thinking of the allowances received by Irish members of Parliament under the special arrangement, but he had no business to allude to such a fact in the context of a thesis on payment by the State. It is announced that Count Okuma and other prominent members of the Shimpo-to are to hold a great rival meeting in Sendai on the 19th instant, and Mr. Hoshi suggested in his speech that the Count be asked to reply to his attack.

More than half of the audience consisted of low class people who, with mouths wide open, sat astonished at the steady flow of language, evidently comprehending next to nothing of the real import of the speech. It is a great pity that students are not allowed to attend these meetings. Such speeches would be fully appreciated by them and give them hints as to how they should comport themselves before an audience. For in gesture, delivery, and choice of language Mr. Hoshi is an adept. It is a ridiculous notion that any harm could come of students' attendance. They read and talk about everything that is going on in politics and take the keenest interest in political contests. Surely the time is past for the Japanese Government to adopt the coddling policy, to fear exposure to the outside air for its subjects. Students must take care of themselves in the political world and the more they know and hear both for and against the Government the better will they be able to judge where the weight of evidence lies. We trust the day is not far distant when all restrictions on Government school students as regards attendance at political meetings will be removed.

MISS WHEELER'S WEDDING.

Seldom has there been a more remarkable demonstration at a wedding in Yokohama than that which attended the nuptials of Miss Mary Wheeler, who was married on Wednesday to Mr. G. C. Murray, of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank. The popularity of the bride and the great esteem in which Dr. and Mrs. Wheeler are held in the community to which they have so long belonged were attested by a huge congregation, which more than filled Christ Church, many being quite unable to gain bare admittance, while the fortunate ones who obtained seats were but a small proportion of the whole. The interior of the church had been elaborately decorated, and the appearance it presented was extremely pretty. The altar was set off with vases of beautiful white flowers, and the chancel screen was swathed with greenery, setting off the delicate pink of the double cherry blooms with charming effect. The font, pews, windows, gas pendants, and other parts of the building were also appropriately treated, and handsome pot plants were grouped round the entrance to the chancel. The weather was beautiful, and if there is any truth in the old adage concerning the happiness of brides on whom the sun shines, the bride and groom of yesterday will have as full a measure of bliss as their most fervent well-wishers can desire.

* This was evidently an allusion to the employment of Soshi by the party leaders at various times.

The wedding was fixed to take place at 2.30 p.m., and shortly after that hour the tones of the organ announced the appearance of the bride. She entered the church on the arm of her father, Dr. Wheeler, who gave her away. Mr. J. T. Griffin, who was at the organ, played a spirited piece of his own composition as the bridal party proceeded up the aisle and took their stations near the altar.

The bride was attired in a handsome dress of white satin, with a very long court train, quite plain, with chemisette of white chiffon, and a long white tulle veil and orange blossoms. She carried a beautiful shower bouquet of double cherry blossom. She was attended by Miss Thomas, Miss Rice, Miss Nina Smith, Miss E. Poole, Miss Dorothy James, Miss Madeleine Mullison, and Miss Winnie Mitchell as bridesmaids. They were dressed in pale green satin trimmed with white chiffon, the skirts plain, with draped bodies and puffed chemisette, and sashes at the side of white chiffon. They wore Leghorn picture hats trimmed with white plumes and chiffon, and they carried white shower bouquets of orchids and roses, and wore gold brooches of shamrocks and thistles, emblematic of the bride and bridegroom's nationalities, artistically intertwined with a true lover's knot. These brooches were the presents of the groom. There were two small pages dressed in Highland costume, Masters Clarence Parsons and Ewen Steele. Mrs. Wheeler wore a green satin gown striped with tiny threads of gold, cream satin chemisette, and green bonnet with turquoise blue trimming. The groom was attended by Mr. W. Reid as best man, and the groomsmen were Mr. F. J. Lias, Mr. H. W. Fraser, Mr. J. MacArthur, and Mr. F. J. Hall.

The ceremony was conducted by the Rev. E. Champneys Irvine. On the bridal party entering the vesty, for the signing of the register, Mr. Griffin played the Wedding March from "Lohengrin," and at the conclusion of the ceremony the well-known strains of Mendelssohn's Wedding March were heard.

A reception was afterwards held at the residence of the bride's parents, and the newly married couple left later in the day for Nikko, in which neighbourhood the honeymoon is being spent. The presents were very numerous, and of a handsome description. The groom's gifts to the bride included an emerald and diamond ring.

A SOCIAL EXPERIMENT.

A great social meeting—promoted by Baron Ishiguro, Mr. K. Okura, Mr. Ohashi Sahai, the Hakubun-kun, and others—of natives of Niigata Prefecture now resident in Tokyo and Yokohama, was held at Maple Club, Shiba, on the 16th inst. It was a great success, and was attended by upwards of 900 persons, including such personages as the ex-daimyo of Takata, Nagaoka, and Murakami. The most notable feature of the gathering was that almost half the company were ladies, the presence of women at such a function being quite unprecedented in Japan, though common in the west. The Niigata gentlemen are entitled to credit for setting the example of admitting ladies to such gatherings.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

A general meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held at the Parish Buildings, No. 54, Teukiji, on Wednesday, the 29th March, 1899, at 3 p.m., the Vice President of the Society, Dr. D. C. Greene, being in the chair.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been taken as read, the Chairman called upon Sir Ernest Satow to read his paper on.

THE JESUIT MISSION PRESS IN JAPAN.

Sir E. Satow gave a short account of two works printed at the Jesuit Mission Press in Japan between the end of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th centuries. One of these entitled, "Epitome of the Tai-hei-ki," was printed with movable types in Chinese characters and Hiragana, and consisted of six volumes, without date or place. From the imprimatur of the missionary Manuel Barreto and the Bishop of Japan, which appeared on the first page of five out of the six volumes, it must have been printed between 1598 and 1610. Of this book no other copy was known to exist in Japan. The second was a summary of Christian Doctrine, also in the Japanese language but printed in Roman type, and bore on the title page the date 1600. This latter work the Society had undertaken to reproduce in facsimile in a forthcoming number of its Transactions. It was the same work as the catechism in the Bibliotheca Casanatense at Rome, printed at Nagasaki in that year, which he had described some years ago in a pamphlet entitled, "The Jesuit Mission Press in Japan." The copy, which had been lent to him by the owner, had suffered greatly from book-worms and was in a very bad state of preservation, many words being missing and others undecipherable; but his acquaintance with the Chinese edition had fortunately enabled him to supply the missing portions of the text. The existence of two copies, one in Chinese and the other in Romaji, was probably explained by the fact that the one was intended for the use of native converts, while the Romaji copy was for the use of missionaries who were not familiar with Japanese writing. A perusal of the catechism showed that the language in which it was written differed in many respects from that of to-day. For the information of readers he had therefore prepared a glossary which would be published as an appendix to the work. It was interesting to observe that 300 years ago a beginning of romanizing the language had been made, though without success, just as had happened again about twenty years back with a similar result.

Dr. Dryas congratulated the Society on having papers from such old and distinguished members as Sir Ernest Satow and Prof. B. H. Chamberlain, and on the large attendance at its meeting which this had brought about. One fact of interest, already noted by the author of the paper, was that the attempt to replace Japanese characters by Roman letters was a very old affair instead of having been only attempted in the present period of Japan's development. It had failed then as it had failed apparently now, and he did not regret the fact. Another point of interest was the possibility afforded by the old romanized text of comparing the pronunciation of the time with that which prevails at present. It was rare to find such an opportunity in the history of languages.

The CHAIRMAN, on rising at the close of the discussion, called attention to the importance of this contribution to the history of the early Christian press of Japan, which the honoured President of the Society had made in his interesting paper. It was much to be regretted that information upon this subject was, and apparently must remain, so meagre. The movement with which that press was associated had left a far deeper and more permanent impression upon Japanese life and thought than was commonly supposed. While men of almost every social stage shared in that movement, owing to the greater inertia of the lower classes, it was natural to expect to find clearer and more distinct traces of its influence among them. That such traces do exist, he thought a careful study of almost any of the irregular Shintō sects would show. He believed that a careful analysis of the teaching of these sects would some day be made and would convince the world that Xavier with his associates and successors had not only introduced a beneficent, but also a strong and permanent force, into the life of Japan—a force which had materially modified the general attitude of mind toward ethical and religious questions. In conclusion he again emphasized the indebtedness of the Society to the President, Sir Ernest Satow, for the pains he had taken to reproduce this valuable book for its Transactions.

He then called upon the Rev. A. Lloyd to read on behalf of the author, who was absent, a paper by Mr. B. H. Chamberlain entitled

NOTE ON A LONG-TAILED BREED OF FOWLS IN TOSA.

It was stated in this paper that the origin of the breed in question was not known but was believed to be at least 100 years old, and that the general term—Shinowara to—by which these fowls were known, was derived from the village of Shinowara some three ri to the east of the town of Kochi. The different varieties of the breed were described and details were given as to the length of the tail feathers, and their rate of growth, and regarding the methods of keeping, feeding, and transporting the birds.

The CHAIRMAN observed that the Society were glad to receive the information contained in Mr. Chamberlain's paper on the subject of this rare breed of fowls, and requested the Corresponding Secretary to convey the Society's thanks to the author.

The meeting adjourned at 4 30 p.m.

BASEBALL MATCH IN SENDAI.

It will be remembered by some of our readers that on April 13th last year an interesting Baseball match took place in Tokyo between the First and Second Higher Schools, resulting in a victory for Tokyo by three points. The return match was played in Sendai on the 10th instant, when the Sendai team more than made up for its defeat last year, winning the match by six points and an innings to spare. The contest has caused no small amount of excitement in the two schools concerned. More than a hundred students belonging to the Tokyo school went to Sendai to be present at the match, or to take part in the fujitsu events that came off the following day. Numbers of old pupils of the Sendai School who are now in the University made a point of being present on the gala day. The ground on which the ever-increasing buildings of the Second Higher School stand is very large, well supplied with trees, and has the most picturesque surroundings. In anticipation of the match the ground was put into first rate order and a fine day was all that was desired to make the affair a success. The weather was perfect—a clear cloudless sky and bright sunshine, and the air keen enough to be invigorating.

Long before the time appointed for the match to begin the marked-off field was surrounded by a black mass of eager students. It was a quarter past one when the Umpire, Mr. Y. Kamimura, made his appearance and set things in motion. The Tokyo men wore white caps and the Sendai men red. Tokyo went in first and scored 5 points right away. Mabuchi, the Sendai pitcher, had not got his hand in, and the Tokyo lads sped over the ground at a rate that astonished the easy-going Sendai folks and kept up their reputation for base stealing. The Sendai lads did nothing in their first innings and it was predicted by many that the Tokyo team was going to have an easy walk over. But when the whites went in for their second innings the superior fielding of the Sendai fellows began to tell and Mabuchi's pitching had improved that the visitors only scored 2 points. This score was doubled by the Reds in their Second Innings; the running of Yamada and Tanakamoto, the winner of the 800 metre race in the School Sports last year, was equal to anything Tokyo had to show. It was in the third innings, if we remember rightly, that Mr. Motobara made the most brilliant catch of the day. He was standing at third base. The ball was so far beyond him, but the height to which it went and the rapidity with which he travelled over the ground brought him to the right spot at the right moment. The ball was taken sideways, the catcher rolling over and over without dropping it. The turning point in the game was the third innings of the Sendai team. When they went in the score of the Tokyo men stood at 10 against Sendai's 4. There are some fine hitters among the Sendai men. Tanaka, Yamada, Tanakamoto, and Baba are all such. Feeling that they must do something special to turn the tide of fortune, the Sendai students went in for hard hitting. The Whites fielded badly, lost their heads, dashed the ball about here and there when they saw base after base stolen in the most surreptitious manner, the final result being that the Reds scored 12 points in this one innings, running their score up to 15 against Tokyo's 10. After this the Whites settled down to very cautious fielding. Their pitching was excellent throughout. But the Reds felt they had the game in their hands. Their fielding was superior to that of their adversaries, and in striking they surpassed them. Some pretty catches were made by the Tokyo lads, but they also missed some very easy balls, as did the Reds for that matter. It took the Whites some time to recover from the effects of the third innings of their opponents; for they began with a duck's egg, and then only added one point to their score in their fifth innings. In their sixth they made 4 points. But in the last 3 innings they did nothing. The Reds made 3 points in their fourth innings, 1 in their fifth, nothing in their sixth, 2 in their seventh, and 1 in their eighth.

At the conclusion of the match the Sendai students were about to cheer their comrades when one of the teachers of the Sendai School suddenly and opportunely hushed them, and, in the place of applause that would have greeted on the ears of the boys who had travelled 215 miles to suffer a defeat, there rent the air the shouts of six hundred voices, Dai-ichi Koto Gakko Bantai, "The First Higher School For Ever."

The following are the members of the teams with the places they occupied in the field.

It may not be a suitable occasion for saying so, but we cannot but feel some regret that baseball should be so far on the way to becoming a national game with the Japanese to the total exclusion of cricket. To outsiders there is, we think, no comparison in point of interest and sustained excitement between the two games. The number of foul balls and unfair balls in baseball and the strictness of the rules as regards scoring make it a very dull game to spectators during quite half of the time it is watched, whereas in cricket the interest never flags. The action of the batter and that of the bowler are alike a study to the practised eye, to say nothing of the general fielding. Cricket would become popular enough in Japan if some enterprising foreigners in Tokyo would only begin it. The Japanese student taken to a new teacher. The obtaining of a suitable ground may be a difficulty. But it is not insurmountable. Good baseball players would soon be turned into good cricketers and thus the two great national games of the Anglo-Saxon race would vie with each other in helping to train a class of hardy athletes that would be equal to any kind of strenuous physical exertion.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A REPLY TO "OBSERVER."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Your correspondent "Observer," after quoting Professor Huxley's comparison of the position of English professors of theology to that of professors of astronomy who should be required to sign "Ptolemaic articles," goes on to add:—"It is not only the occupiers of Chairs of Divinity at Universities that are required to echo the Shibboleths of their sects or give up their perquisites, but every Minister of the Gospel all the world over is no otherwise situated."

If we substitute for "Shibboleths of their sects" some more accurate term, and for "perquisites" put, say, "stipends," the statement is quite true. But your correspondent seems not to see that the application of this principle is much wider than he here makes it. I think it is not too much to say that it applies practically to all persons who are paid by anybody to teach anything. Mr. Huxley indeed, as quoted by "Observer," speaks of Holland and Germany as countries in which "professors of theology are to be found whose tenure of their posts does not depend upon the results to which their inquiries lead them," and it may be that this is true as regards the particular class of opinion which Mr. Huxley had in mind when he wrote. But even the freedom of these happy Dutch and German professors has its limits. If, for instance, "the results to which their inquiries lead them" should be the materialistic atheism of Buchner or Haeckel, they would probably soon find that the tenure of their posts depended very much upon those results. And so with teachers of other subjects. A professor of astronomy who believed in "Ptolemaic articles" would quickly discover that his salary depended after all on his orthodoxy, and that he was really in the same boat with his brother-professor of theology. A professor of Latin who should think that the "hog Latin" of mediæval monks was better than Cicero would not keep his chair very long, and so in every case. The freedom may be very wide,—wide enough for all practical purposes. But there is always a limit somewhere. So I think we may say that it is the general opinion of that part of mankind (certainly the most enlightened part) that pays stipends to teachers, that there should be a limit somewhere to the liberty of all teachers who are paid by other people. The only really open question is, where is it reasonable to place this limit.

I may possibly misinterpret both "Observer" and Mr. Huxley in supposing that they fail to see this principle. "Observer" can speak for himself. Mr. Huxley unfortunately can not. But Mr. Huxley, it seems to me, fell into this error from trying to prove too much, or at least too much at once. His illustration of the professor of astronomy who has been compelled to sign "Ptolemaic articles" is a stone aimed at two birds at the same time. One is the idea of restricting the liberty of teachers. The other is the XXXIX. Articles. If he had left the Articles-bird for a second shot, he might perhaps have got a closer look at the other bird, and concluded that it did not quite deserve killing after all.

As to the Doshisha, "Observer" seems to me very unfair, and yet I believe there is a kernel of truth in what he says when he ascribes the Doshisha difficulties to "uncertainty and vacillation" on the part of the missionaries of the American Board. I do not know of any "vacillation," certainly not as to essential principles, but there certainly seems to have been on all hands a great deal of "uncertainty" as to the limits of the freedom intended to be given to those who had the control of the Doshisha, much more indeed than "Observer" seems to realise, for he apparently makes the uncertainty to lie simply between "the doctrine embodied in the creed of American congregationalists" on the one side, and the kind of doctrine that chose to call itself "Christian" on the other. I am sure that many, if not all, of the American Board missionaries believed that there was a common faith of Christians which was neither the one nor the other of these things, and that it included at least two things, belief in "One God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth," and belief in "One Lord Jesus Christ, the Only-begotten Son of God." Some of them, I believe, thought that the Doshisha trustees were within their rights so long as they maintained these two things. All of them, I venture to think, believed that the limits of rightful liberty were exceeded when in the Doshisha the personality of God and the divinity of Christ were denied. But there seems to have been nothing to determine what the limits of freedom in this case really were, no creed, confession, or contract to which reference could be made, nothing but the one word Christian, which from the beginning was applied by general consent to the Doshisha and its aims. Hence the uncertainty which was the root of the whole difficulty. This, however, is something very different from the "trimming and make-believe all around" which "Observer" charges.

But leaving the Doshisha question to more competent hands, and turning again to the more general one of the limitations of liberty on the part of paid teachers of religion or theology, "Observer" not only fails to see that the principle involved is the same as that involved in all paid teaching, but he seems so entirely convinced that what he regards as rational Christianity is the only kind that has any real claim to be called so, and that all else, including the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, which has always been and is still held by the great body of Christians throughout the world as of the essence of their faith, has been "scientifically shown to be untenable," that he fails also to see how large is the liberty that is possible to paid teachers of creeds that are neither Japanese nor German, nor yet "Occidental." I have myself been a teacher of theology in a mission Divinity School in Japan. The professors in it differed radically on many points, points much more important than those which separate a good many denominations of Christians, say, for instance, the Presbyterian and the Methodists. Yet we all held the ancient creeds of the Church, the Nicene and the Apostles', and found within them all the liberty we desired. If I had wanted more liberty than I had, I should, I think, at the same time have quite ceased to feel any interest in teaching theology at all. I mention this simply as an illustration that endowing the teaching of theology, even outside of Germany and Holland, has no necessary connection with the obligation to maintain such elaborate systems of doctrine as the Westminster Confession, or even the XXXIX. Articles.

It is an interesting picture which "Observer" draws of the free-thinking Japanese Christians whom he places in contrast with the paid supporters of "endowed Occidental theology" (Does he really think the doctrine of the divinity of Christ is "Occidental theology?") I take off my hat with great respect before these hard working students who have read "all that the Germans and others have said against orthodox doctrine." But it seems a little hard on the doctrine that they should have "deliberately and conscientiously rejected it" when they have presumably had no time to read what has been said for it. Yet "Observer's" description of them, allowing for some slight exaggeration, coincides quite remarkably with my own independent impressions of some free-thinking Japanese Christians, who, in common with some other freethinking persons, seem to have "deliberately and conscientiously rejected" a good many things that they knew very little about.

In contrast with these gentlemen, what a stupid person that Protestant Missionary is who does not know what to say to these freethinkers when "they have followed the lead of reason and it has led them to regions that are far removed from the haunts of typical Occidental Christians." The only answer he can think of, "You have no business to reason, Christian belief and reasoning are incompatible," he does not make, because he knows that the distinguishing point of Protestantism is "the authority it gives to reason as a means of discovering truth." Why couldn't the stupid fellow say to them, "You are quite right in reasoning, but you have not reasoned correctly, especially when you have 'conscientiously and deliberately rejected' a fundamental point of primitive Christianity as 'Occidental theology' which has been 'scientifically shown to be untenable.'"

Was it perhaps because these freethinking readers knew beforehand how stupid the orthodox Protestant Missionary was that they spent their whole time in reading "all that the Germans and others have said against orthodox doctrine?"

Very truly yours,

MUSIC IN YOKOHAMA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—How true it is that one must go abroad to hear the news! In the Musical Times (a monthly journal published in London) of 1st March, 1899, No. 673, p.194, is the following "foreign note":—

"YOKOHAMA.—The recent first performance 'here of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' deserves to be recorded, the executors being a company 'of musicians on tour, reinforced by local amateurs.'"

This short note contains a fair amount of errors; I wonder where the Editor of the Musical Times can have got his information?

Yours truly,

X.

Yokohama, 15th April, 1899.

DISLOYALTY TO THE EMPEROR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Much has been said and written concerning the disloyalty of the Christians of this land to the Emperor. However, not much has been heard concerning the opposite side of the question—the disloyalty of some who oppose Christianity. That loyalty finds its truest expression in obedience to law, in willingness to give up life for the defence of one's country, and in keeping pace with the spirit of progress, no one will deny. Judged by these criteria, no class of citizens in Japan are more loyal than Christians. They are law-abiding; they fought with the bravest in the late war; and they are all proud of the present progress, and desirous of assisting in the advance.

Contrariwise, those who have not caught the spirit of progress, of which His Majesty is the embodiment, and those who even in spirit are behind any of the liberal enactments which His Majesty has graciously granted, such in truth are the really disloyal people of the land. It pleased His Majesty to grant religious liberty, and from every word and enactment concerning this subject which has emanated from the Imperial Palace, we are led to believe that this is the sincere purpose and wish of His Majesty. Even in this day, however, on the very eve of "Mixed Residence," when this subject will be of vital importance, we find many disloyal to the Emperor in this regard.

A case in point has just occurred in this (Ishikawa) prefecture. A young man, a graduate of a Mission School, having served with different foreigners as personal teacher for several years, and having acquired a knowledge of English valuable in these days, was recently called before the head teacher of a higher middle school for employment. His attainments were quite satisfactory. In the consultation, he was asked concerning his belief in Christianity, and informed that it was difficult to employ Christians, because of their attitude toward His Majesty's portrait and the Imperial Rescript on Education. He was told that it was his duty to give up Christianity for the cause of education. Although assured that the attitude of Christians in this respect was, in no wise, different from that of all other intelligent people in this country, the young man was told that he could have the position only on one condition—namely, that he abstain from attendance upon Christian services. The matter finally came before the prefectural authorities, and the head teacher was advised to be less severe, but—the young man was refused the position, because he would not comply with the illegal and unjust terms.

It is respectfully submitted, not in the spirit of controversy, but in the spirit of justice, and with a desire for the real good of Japan, that this head teacher is a disloyal subject of His Majesty, inasmuch as he is violating in spirit and in letter, an article of the Constitution—an article surely of equal force with the rules regarding His Majesty's portrait, or the Receipt on Education, and, inasmuch as he opposes the wishes and pleasure of His Majesty, and is not keeping step with the spirit of progress, should hold no such position as head master in an important city.

"HOPEFUL."

LOGIC.

A DIPLOMATIC ABSURDITY IN AN INDEFINITE NUMBER OF ACTS (OF DOUBTFUL MORALITY).

Argument.—Negotiations are in progress between Count Muraviev, Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Yang-ju, Chinese Minister to St. Petersburg, with regard to the alleged Russian murder of Chinese in Kin-chow. The Russian Minister is said to have declared that, though the Chinese Government send its Navy to the Baltic or its Army as far as St. Petersburg, he would not yield in this matter. This decision was telegraphically reported to the Empress Dowager, and the latter in great indignation ordered the ambassador to renew his negotiations. —Vide Press.

SCENE.—FOREIGN OFFICE AT ST. PETERSBURG.

Count Muraviev (to his Secretary)—Scratchoff.

Scratchoff.—Yes, your Excellency.

Count Muraviev.—Here is a despatch from Peking: "Rumoured that three small Chinese boys in Go Hang, Slap Bang Province, blew a tin whistle derisively at a Greek Church Missionary, Russian subject. Very properly the missionary, catching a boy, beat him severely about the head till he was quite pulpy and submissive. The boy struggled at first, and the Father received a slight scratch on the left temple. What action am I to take? Surely it ought to be good for a port, any way."

The Foreign Minister strolls up and down his sumptuous room in deep meditation. At length he speaks. Scratchoff!

Scratchoff.—Yes, Excellency.

Count M.—The atlas—the latest one, mind; otherwise I may go claiming something we've got already; it's difficult to keep all these small transactions in one's head.

The atlas is brought, and Count M. studies it for some moments.

Count M.—It's tempting, but I suppose it can't be done. England might object, and she has a few ships left still, though Mr. Stead assures me that the great heart of the nation is for peace at any price, that they rejoice to see Russia pursuing the path of civilization, and so on. What a droll of a man he is, that dear Mr. Stead. But I'm afraid England won't stand us taking the Yang-tze, however Exeter Hall might rejoice. So I must give that up for the present—it will do ten years hence. But if I take these ten degrees of latitude from here to here (pointing to atlas) it won't be noticed. Area 1,400,000 square miles; population 120,000,000. Hum! That will hardly cause comment now-a-days. Here, Scratchoff.

Scratchoff.—Yes, Excellency.

Count M.—Send this to Count Grabearth-seandaky at Peking (dictates).

"Present note to Tsungli Yamen as follows: 'The deplorable event at Go Hang proves that your Imperial Majesty's Government is unable at the present moment to exercise that strict control over your Majesty's less enlightened subjects which is so essential to the progress of civilisation and the spread of humanitarian principles. I am instructed by my Imperial Master to make you the offer of his assistance in preserving the integrity of your Majesty's dominions, unhappily threatened by the frequency of these occurrences. My Imperial Master proposes to occupy the ports of My hai and Bung-kum, and, with a single view to preserving the unity of your Majesty's dominions, demands the cession of territory lying between Lat.—N. and—N. and Long—E. and—E. His Majesty the Czar entertains no doubt that the Son of Heaven will at once recognize the justice of his claims, and the manifest advantage to China of so powerful an ally as the Government of Russia. I am to add that if the Son of Heaven should be an ill advised as to refuse the demand of His Majesty the Czar, His Majesty the Czar will not be in the least perturbed by the circumstance, but will at once proceed to take, with that charming grace which is so characteristically Russian, twice the number of ports and twice the amount of territory which His Majesty the Czar is now pleased to make the subject of a friendly request wholly in the interests of the Chinese Government."

That will do, I think. A very pretty piece of work, though I say it as shouldn't. Architecturally perfect, I should say. Stay a moment, Scratchoff. Just tell him to draw the Tsungli Yamen's attention to the Russian Army and Navy List for 1899, and to point out how nicely those latest Armstrongs work.

Attendant announces His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador, Mr. Li Free li. The usual salutations are exchanged, and the diplomats then proceed to business.

Mr. Li.—I am instructed by Her Imperial Majesty the Empress Dowager—excuse me giving her full titles, Excellency, but I don't want to keep you all the morning—to call your attention to a little affair at Kin-chow. It's nothing to speak of, you know, and we don't want to make ourselves disagreeable, especially to you, my dear Count. But they tell me a few hundred people have been killed by your Cossacks—five fellows they are, did it in their light-hearted fun probably—and of course there are funeral expenses, compensation to families, &c. I have to ask you for that. If you could hang a Cossack or two, to show good feeling, we should appreciate it, and to boil the leader of them in sardine oil, if that is consistent with your ideas, would be a real pleasure to us. But those are merely details. I need only insist on compensation.

Count M. (with Spartan firmness).—Nothing can be done.

Mr. Li.—But really, my dear Count, be reasonable. Our playful people kill a missionary here and there, and you get whole provinces and ports out of us. I don't think we have a port to speak of now. You surely don't object to a few thousand dollars for this.

Count M. (impressively).—Your Excellency, tell the Son of Heaven this is my answer: "China can send her fleet to the Baltic (how it is to get there I can't imagine), she may ravage the Black Sea shores, she may bring fire and sword to the very gates of St. Petersburg, but we will never yield. No, sir, Russia has put hand to the plough, and she will not draw back. Not even the terrors of a war—with China—will divert her from the strait path of duty. It is Russia's peculiar destiny to advance the cause of civilisation in the dark places of the earth. She will take the helpless Asiatic races to her maternal bosom, and watch over them with tender care, as she does with the Jews at home. If these Chinese at Where-is-it were killed, as you say, they were killed entirely for their own good, and for the progress of the human race. Nothing further need be said. I may fall a martyr to the cause; the battalions—Chinese—destined to crush us may be forming now; but nothing—not even your fleet in the Baltic—can deter us.

Mr. Li.—I am sorry, your Excellency, as much, I must admit, on my own account as on China's, for, truth to tell, our dear Empress Dowager is a peppery little thing, and I shall probably be cut asunder in the waist—to say nothing of losing my yellow jacket —when I get back to Peking, for not succeeding in this. But there's another little matter. It was so trifling I had almost forgotten it. The Son of Heaven understands that the populations of European States are in a condition of degraded superstition and ignorance. He understands that few even of your upper classes believe in Buddha or Confucius, while the lower strata of society have never even heard of their names. The Son of Heaven is truly pained at this, and, thinking that a knowledge of the ancient religions of the East cannot fail to redound to the benefit of your nationals, he has decided to propose some steps with that end in view. He would therefore be obliged if you would lease him—at a pepper-corn rent—the ports of Odessa, Sebastopol, and Archangel, with their fortifications, and a few places in the interior, such as Moscow and Nijni Novgorod. I may add that we are asking Lord Salisbury for London, Glasgow, Liverpool, Southampton, Hull, Bristol, and Cardiff; France for Havre, Marseilles, Cherbourg, and Toulon; Germany for Bremen and Hamburg; Italy for Genoa, Naples, and Venice; Austria for Trieste; and Belgium for Antwerp. I trust your Government will see its way to grant the trifling request of my Imperial master.

Count M.—If this is a little joke, Mr. Li, it is an excellent one. Are there comic papers in Peking? If so, I might suggest that your Excellency is more fitted for journalism than diplomacy.

Mr. Li.—I am quite serious. These are the very plausible propositions you use when you take our ports and our territory. It is only logical on our part to apply them to you.

Count M. (with a beatific smile).—Ah, my dear Mr. Li, you have much to learn still. There is no logic in diplomacy. Good morning, Excellency. Now, Scratchoff, get ready your typewriter for that Peking despatch.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. W. J. Kenny, till recently British Consul-General and Commissioner at Hawaii, is appointed to the Consulate at Hakodate.

A case of disease resembling cholera is reported at Furocho, Yokohama. The patient, who is an aged woman of 70, is under medical treatment at the Contagious Diseases Hospital.

Mr. Iio Jiro has been appointed Chief of the Yokohama Quarantine Inspection Station; Mr. Yokoyama Shincho, Chief of the similar office at Nagasaki; and Mr. Katayama Sachio, Chief of the Station at Kobe.

The by-election for the highest tax-paying member of the House of Peers for Kanagawa Prefecture took place on Wednesday, resulting in the return of Mr. Umi Ghei with 8 votes, against six for Mr. Otani Kahei.

The Chuo Shimbun has retracted its statements concerning Murai Brothers' Cigarettes, to which we referred in a recent issue; and also has apologised for saying that the firm had sold its plant.

Mr. R. G. E. Foster, British Pro-Consul at Yokohama, left for England on Wednesday by the P. and O. steamer on a year's leave of absence. He carries with him the good wishes of all his nationals. Mr. Hampden, of Kobe, will take up the duties for the present.

A Boston telegram to The American (Manila), dated March 28, reads:—Rear Admiral C. C. Carpenter committed suicide here to day. Deceased was on the retired list and at the time of his death was a resident of Portsmouth, N.H.

In response to the telegram sent to the Governor General of Canada by Mr. Otani Kahei, President of the Central Tea-dealers' Society, asking him to use his efforts against the Tea Tax, the Governor's Private Secretary wired from Ottawa, under date 14th inst., to the following effect:—"Your telegram, dated 12th, as regards tea duty, is to hand, and will be submitted to every Cabinet Minister for consideration."

Recent birth statistics in Berlin indicate that the German capital is the home of large families. One Berlin mother has given birth to her twentieth child; there are five mothers with 19 children, nine with 18, and nine others with 17; 138 mothers have seen their sixteenth child born, and 215 families are composed of 12 children.

An earthquake shock, not very severe in its nature, but of rather long duration, visited Yokohama about 7.30 on Saturday evening. No damage is reported in or near the port, but from the telegrams which appear in another part of to-day's issue it would seem that the shock extended over rather a wide area.

The Odesski Listok states that the directors of the Russian Volunteer Fleet intend to build a new line of steamers in order to cope with the large and increasing traffic with the Far East. The Nijni Novgorod left Odessa on March 20 with a number of the "watchmen" for the Eastern Chinese Railway and a cargo of 2,000 tons of rails and 2,000 tons of material for railway bridges, platforms, &c.

We understand that early in December E. Leopold, of Charing Cross Road, W.C., and brother of Charles Emil Leopold, now undergoing sentence in H.M.'s Gaol at Yokohama, was declared a bankrupt in the London Bankruptcy Court. He, however, appealed, and brought evidence which secured him the reversal of the judgment on January 13th, when the appeal was heard.

This letters of Admiral Cervera, published by the Epoca, form a damaging indictment against the Spanish Naval authorities. Two years before the actual outbreak of hostilities naval officers of all ranks had protested against the condition of their Navy, but all protests were disregarded. According to Admiral Cervera, the Spanish Fleet was less than half the tonnage of the American, and its artillery was greatly inferior. And yet this gallant sailor is to be put on his trial by the very people who allowed him to go into action without any conceivable prospect of victory.

A collision of a slight nature occurred on the 5th inst., reports a Shanghai morning contemporary, off Pootung point between Messrs. S. C. Farnham & Co.'s steam launch Lilli and the Japanese steamer Yamashiro Maru, resulting in the former having her starboard bow stove in above the water-line. A Russian engineer who was on board the launch at the time, fearing a disaster, jumped on the anchor of the steamer and from there was hauled on board whilst the launch proceeded to the Old Dock. But for the alertness of the chief officer of the steamer the Russian gentleman would have had a wet surprise, as the order had been given from the bridge to let go the anchor to which he was clinging.

We have received a visit from Signor Brandini, who set out in 1890 to visit on foot all the capitals and important cities of five continents. When he left Paris he was penniless. He has now tramped through Africa, North and South America, and Europe. His last big walk was from Elsinora to Vladivostok, which he accomplished in 20 months, crossing Siberia in the depth of winter. Signor Brandini, who looks the picture of robust health, hopes to return to Paris in time to lecture at the 1,900 Exhibition.

The fourth and last concert of the Junker Choral and Orchestra Society is expected to take place very shortly, only a few more rehearsals being needed for what must be considered easy work for our talented amateurs in comparison with their previous achievements. A number of items which most pleased the audience at previous concerts will be repeated, the remainder consisting of chorus or orchestra pieces of a particularly bright and popular character, to satisfy the demands of the majority of concert-goers. The soloists, we believe, will be Madame Henckler (soprano), and Senhor Canaan, of Tokyo (violin).

Professor Junker's third chamber concert will be held early next month, and will, our readers will regret to learn, be the last of the season, owing to Professor Junker's engagement with the Tokyo Academy of Music. Apart from the excellent string quartet, the programme will be very attractive, as Professor Von Koerber will appear; and the rare opportunity will be afforded a Yokohama audience of hearing Signor Braccialini.

The following American "parable" is reproduced in the Globe:

A Married Woman, whose lover was about to reform by running away, procured a pistol and shot him dead.

"Why did you do that, madame?" inquired a Policeman, snatching by.

"Because," replied the Married Woman, "he was a wicked man, and had purchased a ticket to Chicago."

"My sister," said an adjacent Man of God, solemnly, "you cannot stop the wicked from going to Chicago by killing them."

JAPAN BAPTIST CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the American Baptist Missionary Union in Japan was held this year in Osaka, a city whose fine public buildings, numerous mills and factories, and busy rush of industries give it more the aspect of a city of the Occident than of the Orient.

The sessions began on Wednesday, April 5th, and concluded on Saturday, April 8th.

The officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:

President, Rev. J. H. Scott, Osaka; Vice-President, Prof. E. W. Clement, Tokyo; Secretary, Rev. R. Austin Thomson, Kobe; Executive Committee, Rev. W. B. Parshley, Yokohama, E. H. Jones, Sendai, R. Austin Thomson, Kobe; Statistician, Rev. J. H. Scott, Osaka; Preacher, Rev. C. K. Harrington, Yokohama.

The preacher for the past year, Rev. H. H. Rhees, D.D., of Kobe, delivered the annual sermon before the Conference, the subject of which was "The Kingship of Christ." It was a forceful presentation of a great theme.

The Statistician's report was, as usual, a very interesting one, and showed that the work of the whole mission was in a flourishing condition. There have been over two hundred baptisms during the year, and the church membership is now about two thousand. There are twenty-six organized churches, of which five are wholly self-supporting. The total contributions of the members from all the churches was over yen 2,100.

The Seminary reports good work during the year. It is now one of the finest equipped institutions of its kind in this country, having a fine Recitation Hall, four foreign professors, good dormitories, and a library of over three thousand volumes. The Tokyo Baptist Academy is rejoicing in the prospect of soon occupying its splendid new location in Ushigome, Tokyo. Through the generous kindness of Mrs. Robert Harris, the Duncan Memorial Hall will soon be erected, and the school removed from its present restricted and inconvenient quarters in Tsukiji. The school is making a good reputation for itself, and more students are applying for admission than can possibly be received before removal to larger buildings. We have fine Boarding schools for girls, one each at Sendai, Tokyo, Yokohama, Hemeji, and Chofu, with nearly three hundred boarders and a large constituency of day scholars. In Tokyo we have two kindergartens, and in Kobe one kindergarten settlement with seventy-five pupils. All these schools afford abundant openings for Christian work, more than we can secure workers to follow up.

Substantial work has been done on the Revision of Dr. Brown's Version of the New Testament, and it is sincerely hoped that before another year it will be ready for the press.

A devotional Service preceded each session of the Conference. One of these services took the form of a Memorial of the late Rev. S. W. Duncan, D.D., our beloved foreign Secretary at Boston.

At the close of the A.B.M.U. Mission Conference a united Conference of all Baptist Missionaries in Japan took place. The Rev. W. B. Parshley was elected President, Rev. W. H. Clarke, of Fukuoka, Vice-President and Rev. R. Austin Thomson, of Kobe, Secretary.

Questions of much interest were discussed before this meeting, including the establishment upon a sound basis of a vernacular magazine which would properly represent all our churches and be of real help to all our people. The greatest difficulty hitherto has been the getting practical support for it. A committee of three was appointed to co-operate with three of our Japanese workers in the carrying out of the plans for such a magazine, and it is hoped they will be successful.

A very interesting paper was read before the Conference by Rev. J. W. MacCollum, of Fukuoka, one of the founders of the work of the Southern Baptist Convention in this country ten years ago. It was entitled, "A Historical Sketch of the work of the S.B.C. in Kiushiu."

Another paper was written by Rev. S. W. Hamblen, of Sendai, "Baptists and the present juncture in Japan." This was a very strong paper and elicited a good deal of discussion. Both papers will be printed in the Minutes of the Conference.

The A.B.M.U. Mission regrets the temporary absence from Japan, on account of furlough, of Rev. J. L. Dearing, of Yokohama, Rev. S. W. Hamblen, of Sendai, and their families, who return to the home-land after ten years of service. Also Rev. W. Wynd and family of Osaka, who, after nine years' service, return home for a short vacation, and Miss F. A. Duffield, also of Osaka. We look for all of these workers back in Japan next year, and in the meantime sincerely hope that we shall have the privilege of welcoming some new members.

During the past year Capt. L. W. Bickel came out from home to open up a work among the islands of the Inland Sea. He is having a fine little schooner built at Yokohama for this work. The Rev. W. H. Clarke arrived lately to join the workers of the Southern Baptist Convention in Kiushiu.

KUMIAI CHURCHES CONFERENCE.

The annual conference of the Kumiai Churches was convened in Osaka from the 6th to the 10th April. Besides being the annual meeting for the transaction of business and election of officers, the gathering was made the occasion for celebrating the completion of twenty-five years of the denomination's existence. It happened, too, that for the first time in the history of the Kumiai Churches a foreign missionary was sent as a delegate. The cordial feeling of fraternity with which the innovation was welcomed is significant of what lies deeper than sharp and trying differences. The first two days of the session, morning and afternoon, were given to the transaction of business. The resolutions, whether carried or rejected, showed the spirit of the body in a reassuring light. Attempts to curtail the freedom of the churches and individuals were rejected with a promptness equal to that with which measures were adopted looking to greater efficiency through union without destroying local initiative. Rev. Miyagawa Tsumeteru, who is to visit America soon, was appointed to represent the Kumiai Churches at the Congregational Council in Boston next September. He will also give the greetings of the Churches to the American Board at its annual meetings in October.

The evening of the 6th was occupied in the reading of papers on religious and biblical topics, by Messrs. Imaizumi, Makino, Yuwasa Kichiro, Miyake, and Ebina. Among the subjects treated were:—The Religious Import of Miracles, and The Religion of Mercy, by Messrs. Imaizumi and Ebina respectively. They attracted a good deal of comment and best indicated the trend of thought throughout the meetings, which was one of affirmation of some of the questioned truths.

Saturday, April 8th, was given up to the celebration of the 25th Anniversary. In the afternoon there were appropriate exercises, including extracts from a brief history prepared for the occasion by Rev. Harada Tanike; address by Rev. Miyagawa Tamiyaro, in which the shortcomings of the Kumiai body in recent years and the means for their cure, together with analyses of the causes for past successes, were set forth. A congratulatory response was given by Dr. Atkinson, of Kobe. In the evening Christian lectures were delivered in the same building (Y. M. C. A. Hall) to a large audience, partly young men.

On Sunday, April 9th, the presence of so many prominent preachers in the city was made use of to the utmost both morning and evening by the Churches of Osaka. The afternoon was devoted to a communion service of the Churches of Osaka and the delegates. The service was deeply impressive, being preceded by a very fitting sermon by Rev. Ebina Danjo.

The discussion of the Doshisha affair was relegated to an informal session held during the forenoon of the 10th. Propos of plans for Theological training, much needed for furnishing Kumiai preachers, the Doshisha Trustees asked the advice of the meeting. A good deal of earnest discussion followed, but the opinions expressed were so various that no resolution was adopted.

The rest of the day was socially spent, the Eikwa being the guests of the Osaka Christians at a lunch and entertainment at the Osaka Museum.

Meanwhile the city of Soul was waiting breathlessly for news of a victory by General Sil Yip. The tidings of the horde of half-savage soldiers from the islands of Japan had passed from mouth to mouth, and all, from the King to the humblest coolie, knew that General Sil Yip alone stood between them and that dreaded host. One morning a naked soldier was seen approaching the South Gate on a run. He bore the marks of battle, and as he passed under the great arch of the gate a hundred hands were stretched out to greet him and a hundred voices demanded news of the battle. He cried, "I am one of the followers of Sil Yip and I come to tell the city that yesterday he fell at the hands of the Japanese. I have escaped with my life and I am come to tell you that flight is your only hope." The people were fearfully agitated. The evil news spread from mouth to mouth and a great wailing arose from the multitude that thronged the streets.

It was the last day of the fourth moon, and that night the King, not knowing at what moment the enemy might be thundering at his gates, took up his quarters in a secluded part of the palace, "the Old Palace" as it is now called, and gathered about him all his courtiers and officers and held a great council. The only question was, "Where shall we go?"

Yi San-ha, the Minister of War, said, "The Court should remove to Pyeng-yang," but Yi Hang-bok, an official who was destined to figure prominently in the war, said, "It will not be enough to go to Pyeng-yang. We must send and ask aid of China." On the other hand, Kim Gwi-yong and a host of other officials, said, "No, the King should stay right here and defend his capital." The King himself, after listening to all that had to be said, agreed with the majority that it would be best to stay and defend the city. He said, "The ancestral temple with all the tablets of my illustrious ancestors is here. How can I go and leave them? Let the Minister of War immediately detail troops to man the walls." But it was just here that difficulty arose, and it showed clearly why the Minister of War had counselled flight. The city wall has thirty thousand battlements and each battlement has three embrasures, but in the whole city there were only seven thousand troops. This was not a tenth part the number that would be required to man the walls. This lack of soldiers was due to the fact that in the long centuries of peace it had become customary for the government to receive a money equivalent in place of military service. As a result only the very poorest of the poor were enrolled in the army, and the service consequently suffered. This had custom, while it argues corrupt practices among the officials, does not prove the absence of courage or faithfulness among the people, and we shall find that the people were as a rule true to their duty when they were properly led.

To add to the difficulty of the situation, on that very night there was an overwhelming exodus of the people. High and low, rich and poor, young and old, thronged out of the city by every gate and made for some place of fancied safety in the country. The great bell at Chou-no remained silent that night for lack of someone to ring it. Very many took refuge in the palace enclosure, and men and women, horses and cattle, and goods of all kinds were mixed together in indescribable confusion. Wailing and shouting and crying on all sides added to the confusion. The King could do nothing to quiet the disturbance; so he sat down in his private apartments attended by two eunuchs. Meanwhile the lawless element among the people were trying to make capital out of the confusion, and all night long the palace was being looted by these vicious characters, while palace women fled half naked and screaming with terror from room to room.

The King's relatives all gathered at his doors, and begged with tears and imprecations that he would not go and leave them. An order went forth from the palace that all the straw shoes and sandals that could be found should be brought in. When the officials saw these they said to the King, "This great pile of straw shoes looks as if flight were being prepared for. We had better take them and burn them all and then shut the city gates so that the people cannot escape and leave the place undefended." This advice was probably not followed, for by this time the King himself began to see that flight would be the only possible plan and it was probably at his order that the shoes had been prepared.

Minister Yu Sung-nyong said, "Let us send the two Princes to the provinces where they will be safe and let the different governors be instructed to collect troops and send them on as fast as possible." This seemed sound advice, and the King acted on it. Prince Im-ha, the King's oldest son by a concubine, for the Queen had borne no sons, was sent to the province of Ham-gyong, and Prince Sun-who went into Kang-wun Province.

When night came the King, who saw that it was useless to attempt to hold the city, sent to the keeper of the Ancestral Temple and ordered him to send the ancestral tablets on towards Pyeng-yang. All night long the preparations for departure were pushed, and just at day-break the King called for his horse and, mounting, rode out the Little Gate attended by his personal following, a host of officials, and a crowd of terrified citizens who well knew that his going meant perfect anarchy. The Queen was aided in making her escape by Yi Hang-bok, who under cover of the darkness led her by the light of a torch to the palace gate. She asked his name and being told she said, "I have to thank you, and I am sorry to have put you to this trouble." It is said that he had all along felt sure the Japanese would enter Soul and that he had set for days in his house relishing food and drink. At the end of that time he roused himself and called for food. Having eaten he prepared for a long journey and then went to the palace. One of his favourite concubines followed him and asked what they were to do at home, but he did not answer. She plucked him by the sleeve, but he drew his sword and cut the sleeve off, leaving it in her hands. He felt that his first duty was at the palace. As we have seen, he did good work there in looking after the welfare of the Queen. He secured her a chair at the palace gate and they joined the royal cavalcade on its way northwards.

As the King and his escort passed through "Peking Pass," day was breaking in the east and a last look at the city showed it to be on fire in many places. The populace had thrown off all restraints and had looted the treasure house and the store-houses. In one of the latter were kept all the deeds of the government slaves. Each slave was deeded property, the same as real estate, and the deeds of the government slaves were deposited in the Chang-yé-wun. At that time there was nominally no lower middle class at all. Society was composed of the upper class and their retainers. Almost every man in the lower stratum of society was nominally the slave of some nobleman though in many places it was a nominal serfdom only. At the same time the master had the right to sell them at will and they were in duty bound to assume mourning at his death. It was this class of people, then, that arose and burned the store house which contained the deeds, and thereby secured their liberty. Another building contained the deeds of all private slaves. This, too, was made an objective point the moment the restraint of government was taken off. The royal party also saw the royal granary in flames, where rice, cloth, and money were stored. The King's private treasure house inside the palace grounds was also burned. The Kyung-buk Palace, the Chang-dok Palace and the Chang-nyang Palace were all in flames. It must have been a depressing sight to the King and his court, but there was no time to waste in mourning over the desolation in Soul. No one knew at what moment the enemy might appear over the southern hills; and so the royal party pressed on toward the north. When they arrived at Sok-kari, in the district of Ko-yang, it was raining furiously, and by the time they arrived at Pjok-jé-yék the entire party were dripping wet.

Up to this point the cavalcade had kept together very well, but there were many among them who had not intended to keep on with the royal party, and there were probably many more whose good intentions were so damped by the elements that they gave it up. From this point on the royal escort was much reduced. The King here dismounted, entered a hostelry, and sat down and began to beat upon the ground with his whip and to weep. As the Ministers gathered around him he said, "What shall we do in this terrible haste?" Yi Hang-bok answered, "When we get to Eui-ju, if we find it impossible to stop there, we must push on into China and seek aid from the Emperor." The King was pleased with this and said, "That is just what I want to do." But Yu Sung-nyong said, "Not so, for if the King leaves Korean soil the dynasty will be at an end and Korea will be lost. The soldiers of Ham-gyong province are still to be heard from and those from Kang-wun Province as well; so there is no call for such talk as this about leaving Korean soil." He likewise administered a sharp reproof to Yi Hang-bok, who confessed himself to have been too hasty.

After a short rest they took the road again, ever goaded on by the dead of pursuit, and as they passed Hê-eun-nyong the rain came down again in torrents. The palace women were riding horses that were small and weak, and they could go but slowly. The riders went along with their hands over their faces, weeping and wailing loudly. By the time they reached the Im-jin River it was dark, and a more wretched company can hardly be imagined. The horses were up to their knees in mud and were well-nigh exhausted. All were nearly famished. It was pitchy dark and the party had become scattered. The case looked about as hopeless as it well could; but Yi Hang-bok was a man of tremendous energy, and he realised the gravity of the situation. So, halting the cavalcade, he dismounted and managed after great exertions to collect the entire party once more. It was so dark that it was impossible to think of crossing the river by ferry until some one thought of the happy plan of setting fire to some of the buildings on the bluff beside the river. By this baleful light the sooty and bedraggled multitude somehow effected a crossing and from that point on the fear of pursuit was greatly lessened. By this time food and rest had become imperative both for man and beast. Those who had been accustomed to no greater hardship than rolling on divans in palaces found a ride of thirty miles in the mud and rain, without rest or nourishment, a severe test. When the cavalcade came at midnight to the hostelry of Tong-pa-yok, in the prefecture of Pa-ju, they found that the prefect Hs-jin and the prefect of Chang-dan, Ku Hye-yun, had provided an excellent supper for the King and the Ministers, but before these worthies could get settled in the apartments provided for them, the grooms and coolies and others, rendered desperate by hunger, rushed into the kitchen to find what had been provided for them, and, finding that they had been forgotten, they began to help themselves to the food that had been prepared for the royal table. An attempt was made to stop them, but they were in no mood to be stopped. The result was that the King and his Ministers went hungry. His Majesty asked for a cup of wine, but none could be found. He asked for a cup of tea, but that too had disappeared. One of the servants of the party happened to have a cake of Chinese sugar tucked under his head-band. This he drew out, and it was dissolved in some warm water and formed the repast of the King that night.

In the morning when it became time to resume the journey it was found to the dismay of all that the coolies had all decamped and left the royal party high and dry. But even while they were discussing this sorry plight the governor of Whangha Province and the prefect of Sê-hung appeared on the scene with two hundred soldiers and fifty or sixty horses. They had come expressly to escort the King northward, and truly they came in the very nick of time. They had with them a few measures of barley, and this was doled out to the hungry people. As soon as possible a start was made, and at noon they arrived at Cho-hyun-ch'am, forty li from Song-do, where they found plenty of food, as the governor had ordered it to be prepared. This was the second day of the fifth moon. That night they entered the welcome gates of Song-do, which, almost exactly two centuries before, had witnessed the overthrow of the Wang dynasty. This was the first time the royal party could really breathe freely, for they could be easily warned of the approach of the enemy, now that soldiers were on the lookout. So it was decided that they should rest a day at this place.

The King came out and seated himself in the upper storey of the South Gate, and all the people gathered before him. He said to them "Now that this war is upon us, if there is anything that you would say, say on." Without hesitation they replied "This war has been caused by Yi San-han (one of the Ministers) and by Kim Gung-yang," (the father of a favourite concubine.) The people were very angry with them. They also said "You should recall the Minister Ch'ong." This man had been banished because of factional rivalry. To the latter proposition the King readily assented, glad probably to find some way to please the populace.

It was on this day, the third of the fifth moon, that the Japanese entered S'ul.

It will be necessary for us to pause here and note the method of the Japanese approach to the capital. A glance at the map of Korea shows that there are three great highways leading up from Fusan to S'ul. One is the main or middle road leading by Yang-san, Mi-ryang, Ch'ung-do, Ta-gu, and so on up the valley of the Nak-tong River, over the great Ch'oryung (Pass). The division led by Konishi came up the peninsula at double-quick by this road. It was before this division that General Yi Il had fled. A second road is to the east of this, proceeding by way of Ch'ong-p'yong, Ulsan, K'ong-jin, Y'ong-jin, Sil-yung, Kun-wi, P'ion and Mun-gyung. Kato led the division which took this road, but his forces joined those of Konishi below Ch'oryung and the two crossed it together. The forces of both Kato and Konishi were in the battle which witnessed the massacre of Si Yip's forces in the cul de sac which we have described. After this battle the two rival leaders again separated and hastened toward S'ul by different routes. Konishi kept on by the main road by way of Ch'ung-san and Yung-in, crossing the Han River just below Han-gang and entering the city by the South Gate. Kato took a more easterly road and came via Y'ong-jin and Yang-gung, crossing the Han seventy li above, at Yung-jin. But a third division under Kurada and other generals had branched off to the west at the very start. They proceeded by way of Kiri-ha and U-do, and then, leaving Kyung-sang Province, they crossed over to Ch'ie and Kim-san in Ch'ung-do Province. Then, crossing the Ch'ung-pung Pass, they entered Ch'ung-ch'ung province and made for S'ul by way of Yung-dong, Ch'ung-jin, and so up by the main road.

The reason for the different divisions taking different routes may have been because of the necessity of obtaining forage, but it was also in part due to the jealousy which existed between Kato and Konishi, for each of these men was desirous of getting to S'ul before the other.

This great triple army met with no real resistance on its way to S'ul. The country was utterly unprepared for war, the principal lack being in competent leaders rather than in number of troops. It was the first quick, sharp stroke on the part of the Japanese which seems to have paralysed the Koreans. The banners of the great host of the invaders spread out over a thousand li, and at intervals of twenty or thirty li they built fortifications from which they signalled to each other at night. The only aggressive move on the part of the Koreans up to this time was the effort of Captain Wun Ho to prevent or at least delay the passage of the Han by Kato's forces, at Yang-jin, by destroying all the boats. But the Japanese were not delayed long by this, for the neighbouring hillsides furnished them with logs for rafts on which they soon crossed, and then they hastened on to anticipate the troops of Konishi in the occupation of S'ul.

It was on the fourth day of the fifth moon that the eager forces of Konishi swept down to the banks of the Han River opposite the town of Han-gang. This river is a real barrier to an army unprepared with pontons or other boats, and the Japanese troops might have been held in check for some considerable time. But the whole make-up of the Japanese warrior was calculated to inspire terror, and no sooner did this countless horde show itself on the opposite shore than General Kim Myungwun, who had been put in charge of the river defences, came to the conclusion that he would have more than a mere river between himself and that gruesome array. He therefore threw all his engines of defence into the Han and fled with all his following to the Im-jin river, the next natural barrier between the Japanese and the King. At first thought this flight of General Kim would seem to be an act of pure cowardice, but when we remember that he had only a few hundred men under him, while on the opposite bank over fifty thousand men were clamouring for a passage across, we cannot wonder that he found it necessary to retreat. He did it in proper style by first destroying his military engines lest they should fall into the hands of the enemy.

The King, before leaving S'ul, placed General Yi Yang-wun in charge of the city and its defences, but when he learned of the flight of General Kim from the river he rightly judged that the city could not be held by any such force as was at his command; so he in turn beat a retreat and went north to the town of Yang-jin. The result was that when the Japanese succeeded in crossing the river and pushed on to the gates of S'ul they found only an undefended and half-depopulated city of which to take inglorious possession. It is said that only a few hours elapsed after the entry of Konishi's forces before those of Kato hastened in from the east, disappointed and chagrined to find that they had been beaten in the race; but they were probably consoled by the fact that long before the goal had been reached the prize had taken wing.

Hideyoshi, the General-in-chief of the Japanese forces, took up his quarters in the Ancestral Temple from which the tablets of the royal line had been removed. This was looked upon by the Koreans as an act of sacrilege, and queer tales are told of how, during that first night, while the burning of the city was going on, a Japanese soldier would drop dead every few minutes without visible cause. It is for this reason, as some say, that Hideyoshi removed to the Nam-pyul-gung, known as the place where Chinese embassies have been lodged, and now the site of the Imperial Altar.

Before many days had elapsed the people found out that the coming of the Japanese did not mean universal slaughter, as they had supposed, and gradually they returned to their homes in the city. They reopened shops, and so long as they attended to their own affairs they were unmolested by the Japanese. Indeed, they adapted themselves readily to the new order of things and drove a lucrative trade with the invaders. The latter were strict in the watch of the city, and no one could go out or come in without showing a passport. When the Japanese had exhausted the supplies in S'ul they pushed out into the country and laid the surrounding villages under contribution. Koreans were even found who would tell them where they could go with the hope of finding booty, and acted as guide to them. Among the more loyal citizens a plot was gotten up to assassinate the guard, but it was betrayed to the enemy, and the plotters were seized and burned to death after indescribable tortures. It is said so many perished in that holocaust that their collected bones made a huge mound.

When General Kim Myung-wun fled from the defences of the Han and came to the Im-jin he immediately sent a letter to the King at Song-do telling him of the arrival of the Japanese into S'ul. The King did not censure him, for retreat was the only way open to him; so a messenger was dispatched ordering him to make haste and get together as many soldiers of Kyung-geul and Whang-ha Provinces as possible and make a firm stand at the Im-jin River. General Sin Gil was sent to aid in this work. No sooner were these orders given than the royal party resumed their journey northward in haste, and at night they reached the village of Keum-gyo, in Keum-ch'in district. Here the escort of the King bivouacked in the open air. It was discovered with dismay that the ancestral tablets had been overlooked in the haste attendant upon the departure from Song-do. So one of the King's relatives started back after them and succeeded in bringing the precious relics.

On the seventh of the moon the royal party crossed the Tadong River and entered the gates of P'yung-yang. Here there was food and drink in plenty and all the other luxuries of life. For the first time since the flight began the King enjoyed a season of real rest. The royal cortege was escorted into the city by the governor, Song Wun-sin, who came out with three thousand troops and met them on the way.

Two days later a messenger was seen approaching at a rapid pace. He was swiftly ferried across the river and hurried in the King's presence, where he said "Yi Yang-wun, the defender of S'ul, has fled and the city is in the possession of the enemy."

The King exclaimed "This is bad news indeed, we must appoint some one whose work it shall be to continually attempt to retake the capital." He thereupon appointed General Yu Hong to that arduous and dangerous position. He was to go with three thousand men and do what he could to stop the progress of the Japanese and if possible regain control of the capital. General Yu received the appointment with the worst possible grace. After the headlong flight with all its hardships and privations, to be told that he must go back with three thousand men and meet what he supposed was a blood-thirsty horde of savages, was too much for his patriotism; so he stayed in his rooms and sulked. Two days passed and still he did not start. The King called him up and said "How is it that you let the time slip by like this when you ought to be on the way to S'ul with troops?" The mighty warrior replied "I fear Your Majesty will have to excuse me from this duty, as I am suffering from a boil on my leg." One of the courtiers, Yi Hong-guk, took him to task, saying "How is it that after receiving such favours at the hand of the King you shrink from this duty? You are a coward and are afraid to go. You are like a sulky dancing-girl who refuses either to dance or sing. You are not only not brave but you are not even clever. Do you suppose you can impose on His Majesty with any such story as this about a boil on your leg?" The King was immensely pleased with this well-merited rebuke and laughed long and loud at the discomfited General, but finally said "Well then, since our doughty General Yu cannot go let General Han Eung-jin go instead." The next day General Han started south with 5000 troops picked from the northern border guard, and in good time he arrived at the banks of the Im-jin River midway between Song-do and S'ul. This was the great strategic position that must be held at any cost. It was the key to the north, the gateway to Whang-ha Province and to P'yen-an Province beyond.

Now that the King and the court were in comparative safety an attempt was made to bring together the loose ends of things and make some sort of headway against the Japanese. General Yi Hang-bok, who had so gallantly escorted the Queen from the palace the night of the exodus from S'ul, was made Minister of War. A council was called to discuss the demands made by the people of Bong-do in reference to the punishment of certain officials whom they had accused. The result was that Yi San-ha was banished to P'yung-ha, but the King refused to punish the father of his favourite concubine.

We notice that the military prowess of the Japanese, their thorough equipment, and their martial spirit took Korea by surprise. It caused a universal panic, and for the first few weeks it was impossible to get the soldiers to stand up and fight the enemy, to say nothing of the generals. The troops and the generals were mutually suspicious of each other, and neither seemed to have any faith in the courage or loyalty of the other. But now the time had come when the impetuous sweep of the Japanese was stopped for the time being by their occupation of S'ul. The fall of the capital was looked upon by the King and the people as a great calamity, but in reality it was the very thing that saved the King from the necessity of crossing the border, and perhaps it saved Nanking itself. If the Japanese had kept up that impetuous, overwhelming rush with which they came up from Fusan to S'ul, and, instead of stopping at the capital, had pushed straight for the Yalu River they would have swept everything before them and would have been knocking at the gates of Nanking before the sleepy Celestials knew that Hideyoshi dreamed of paying back in kind the haughty summons of Kublai Khan four hundred years before. The stop at S'ul gave the Korean forces a breathing space and an opportunity to get into shape to do better work than they had done. The people came to see that, instead of painted devils as they had at first appeared, the Japanese were flesh and blood like themselves, and the terror which their fierce aspect at first inspired gradually wore off and in so far lessened the discrepancy between the two combatants. On the side of the Japanese there was only one favourable factor, their tremendous fighting power in battle. There they had it all their own way. But on the other hand they were in a thickly populated and hostile country, practically cut off from their base of supplies and dependent entirely upon forage for their sustenance. Under these circumstances their position was sure to become worse rather than better, and the real strength of the Koreans was sure to show itself. If a Korean regiment was swept off in battle there were millions from which to recruit, while every Japanese who fell caused just so much irreparable injury to the invading army. We shall see that it was the abandonment of the "double quick" that eventually drove the Japanese back across the straits.

SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

A conference of leading workers on Christian lines was held on the 18th instant at the Imperial Hotel, Tokyo, under the auspices of the Japanese Evangelical Alliance. Invitations in Japanese were sent out to about 150 persons inviting business men and men of the higher classes to meet for this purpose. A score or more Europeans were also invited. The meeting, which was held at 2 to 6 p.m. in one of the large dining-rooms of the hotel, was well attended, nearly every available seat being occupied. There were several Christian merchants and missionaries present from Yokohama. The proceedings were opened by a hymn in Japanese, sung by three young ladies of the Tokyo Joshi Gakuin under Miss Gardner's direction. A solo was also sung by Miss Sada Hayashi during the proceedings, Miss Tetsu Sato playing the accompaniment on the organ. The solo in English, "The Holy City," was very beautifully sung. The addresser, seven in number, were all in Japanese, except one, which was delivered by Rev. Dr. Imbrie. The speech, which gave rise to some dissent, or strictures, on the part of one of the speakers—the Editor of the Nippon—gave full satisfaction to his foreign auditory. Several gentlemen afterwards congratulated the speaker on his "rising to the occasion."

The strictures made by Mr. Miyake Yujiru were that it was not necessary in combat the charges of lack of patriotism or loyalty made against Christianity. But they are certainly and persistently made by the great bulk of Japanese writers and religionists. He was also somewhat nettled at the allusion to "the partitioning of China." The critic replied, Poland that was Christian had been dismembered. He did not seem to take into account the difference in size, power, and circumstances of the two countries. The following is the substance of Dr. Imbrie's address.

DR. IMBRIE'S SPEECH.

Some fifteen or sixteen years ago I was in the Fukuage Garden, in company with Mr. Bingham, who was then the Minister of the United States to Japan. It was a beautiful afternoon in the early summer; and the conversation easily turned to Japan and the revision of the treaties. Mr. Bingham was an old friend and spoke with freedom; and what he told me awakened in my mind a new interest in the question. The hopes that he then expressed have now been more than accomplished. The treaties have at last been revised; and Japan is now about to take her rightful place among the nations. Those were the thoughts that occupied my mind on that beautiful summer day, now so many years ago.

To-day once more I am looking into the future with hope. You will pardon me for saying, with a still loftier hope. Your high mountains, your placid lakes, your sparkling waterfalls, are the admiration of travellers from every land. Your art has taken captive the heart of the artist and the decorator. The triumphs of your statesmanship and your marvellous advances in peace and in war have been the surprise of the world. But to me there is still one thing lacking—one thing needful. Japan is not yet a Christian country. The day is surely coming when it will be a Christian country; but that day has not yet come; and until that day does come, Japan to me is what Japan was before Mount Fuji rose above the plain in grandeur and beauty.

But some one may ask, Is there nothing to be said on the other side? Are there no good reasons why Japan should not become a Christian country? I have heard that two such reasons are frequently given.

It is said, I am told, that Christianity will honey-comb and weaken the National Spirit; that the spirit of obedience to Christ and the spirit of patriotism and loyalty can not dwell together in one heart; and that to bring them together is to pour water on fire. That is not true. It is true that in any country—be it England, be it America, be it Japan—in any country, Christianity will condemn what is wrong, and will strive to make what is wrong right. It is true, too, that when there rises in a nation—as there has risen to-day in the Republic of France—a tyrannical false spirit of Nationalism, Christianity will stand before that false spirit and rebuke it to its face. But it is not true that Christianity is the enemy of patriotism and loyalty. Look at England. England is a Christian country; but does any one think that Christianity has banished patriotism or loyalty from the hearts of the English people? England has been a Christian nation for centuries; but does any one seriously think that the people of England are moving down to the level of the people of China? More than that. Does not every one know that to-day if China—with all the might of its millions—were a Christian nation, there would be no talk of partition? Not because Christianity is in itself warlike, but because Christianity is—and ever will be—the inviolate, persistent, relentless enemy of all rottenness. Look also at America. Thirty years ago there was in America a great war. Four long years of terrible war. I shall never forget them. During those four years three millions of young men left their homes for the field of battle; and of those three millions of young men, the very flower of the nation, three hundred thousand lie buried in the national cemeteries; and America is a Christian nation. But come still nearer home. Look at Japan. Only four years ago there was the war with China. In that war there were battles by sea and battles by land; there was the summer's sun and the winter's snow. In the army and the navy that fought that war there were Christian soldiers and Christian sailors; and in those battles by sea and battles by land, under the summer sun and in the snow of winter, they stood shoulder to shoulder with their fellows; but was it ever said that their Christianity had lessened their patriotism or their loyalty? No, it is not true that Christianity honey-combs and weakens the national spirit. Not only is it not true, it does not even rise to the dignity of plausible nonsense.

But there is a second reason given why Japan should not become a Christian nation. Granting, it is said, that Christianity is not injurious to a nation, it still remains true that it is of no practical value. Go to England, it is said; go to America. Walk the streets of their great cities; read what is written in the daily newspaper; listen to the frank speech of the men that know; and what great difference is there between a Christian nation and a nation that is not Christian?

That is the question; and in that question there is something of truth. Go where one will, sin is; go where one will, and there will be found men who smile at sin; and there is nothing that moves a truly Christian man with a truer sorrow than this very thing. This, however, is no new discovery. We have the words of Christ himself for it, that the tares should be seen growing along with the wheat. But, while this is true, it is not the whole truth. The more intimately one comes to know the complex life of a Christian nation, the more clearly he comes to know that side by side with this there is another truth also. If there are pools of stagnant water breathing pestilence, there are streams of living water bringing life. Even in those same great cities, with all their sin and shame, there are mighty moral forces at work. Mighty moral forces making for justice, and righteousness, and humanity, and purity of life in the man and in the nation. And the reason why those forces exist is this: For generations there has been—and to-day there still is—in the midst of those nations a great company of men who have taken Jesus Christ for their Master and are endeavouring to obey his commandments; because in the nations that are called Christian, there is such a company who are Christian not only in name but also in sincerity and in truth. And therefore when I say that to-day I am looking forward with hope for the day that will surely come—the day when Japan shall be a Christian nation—this is what I mean. I am looking for the day when in Japan also there shall be a great company of Christian men and women who shall leaven society as yeast leavens bread. It will give to your magistrates a new sense of personal responsibility; it will give to your school teachers with higher ideals; it will give to your family life a new sweetness, a new joy, a new beauty. Japan will still be—and will ever be—the loyal land of the Emperor; but the loyal land of the Emperor will ever become more and more a fair kingdom of heaven.

We have met together this afternoon, as Englishmen and Americans and Japanese, with the sincere desire to strengthen the bonds of national friendship. But I can not forget that we meet also as men. May I then say to you one word, speaking to you simply "as a man speaking to men." I am sure that Christianity will prove a blessing to Japan as a nation; and I am no less sure that it will prove a blessing to every one who receives it—to every one that believeth. It will cast a new light on the problems and perplexities of life; it will bring comfort in sorrow, and strength in weakness, and hope in despondency. For after all the great question of questions is the question, what is God? We stand in the midst of a vast universe of things and of men; and we know that above and beneath and within that vast universe there is something or some one which we all call God. But, what is God? That is the question. To that question Christianity brings an answer; an answer that for eighteen centuries has fallen on the ears of all those who receive it, like a strain of sweet music. Jesus Christ says: "I am the light of the world. He that hath seen me hath seen God." That answer is an answer of peace, of hope, and of courage. An answer, believe me, worthy of your sympathetic consideration.

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

THE RECENT DISTURBANCES.

Saigon, April 14.

The preliminary examination has been definitively concluded in the affair of M. M. Déroutède and Mercel Habert.

THE SAMOAN DIFFICULTY.

Disorder has reigned for some time at Samoa, where the Germans support King Mataafa, whereas the British and Americans favour his rival Malietoa Tanu. The partisans of Mataafa have caught 200 English and American marines in an ambuscade, and defeated them, killing 3 officers and 4 marines. A German, believed to be the instigator of the affair, has been arrested and carried on board an English cruiser.

Public opinion in London and New York is much excited over these events.

FRANCE AND ITALY.

Saigon, April 15.

Admiral Fournier, Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Squadron, transmitted to King Humbert an autograph letter from President Loubet. The interview between the King and the Admiral was most cordial.

The Sovereigns reviewed the French and Italian Squadrons in the forenoon, and then lunched on board the Admiral's ship Brennus.

FRENCH NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Admiral de Cuverville, Chief of the Naval Head-quarter Staff, has consented to remain in office, at the instance of the Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy.

THE SAMOAN DIFFICULTY.

The trouble in Samoa between England and America on one side, and Germany on the other, is on the way to being adjusted.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Saigon, April 18.

A Deputy, former Minister of the Interior, declared in a speech to his constituents at Oloron that a revision of the Dreyfus case is indispensable. The Figaro publishes the deposition of Picquart. He describes how he came to suspect Esterhazy, and refutes the accusations with regard to the petit bleu.

MINERS' STRIKE.

A strike of miners has commenced in Belgium, and there are fears that it may become general.

SPANISH ELECTIONS: SANGUINARY RIOTS.

Saigon, April 19.

The election of Deputies has taken place in Spain. The Government's majority will be 150. Sanguinary riots took place at Bilbao, Valencia, and Tortosa.

ENGLAND IN SOUTHERN CHINA.

The Hongkong authorities have hoisted the British flag at Taipo-fu, after some resistance on the part of the population.

FRENCH "PATRIOTIC" LEAGUES.

Saigon, April 20.

The Correctional Police have commenced the prosecution of the leagues. Five persons connected with the "League of the Rights of Man" have been sentenced to a fine of sixteen francs.

THE NAVAL VISIT TO ITALY.

The French squadron has quitted Cagliari.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE SAMOAN AFFAIR.

London, April 14.

The British Government regards the conduct of the German Consul, in issuing the proclamation supporting Mataafa's faction in face of the enthronement of Malietoa by the British and Americans, as largely responsible for the present grave situation.

BRITISH PRESS ON THE SAMOAN SITUATION.

The Press keeps moderate, but resents the irritating tone of the German newspapers, accusing Lord Salisbury of dilatoriness.

TWO WAR-SHIPS FOR SAMOA.

The British gunboat Goldfinch and cruiser Wallaroo have been ordered to Samoa from Sydney.

BRITISH BUDGET.

BIG DEFICIT.

London, April 15.

In the Budget as presented to the House of Commons, the estimated expenditure is £112,927,000, against a revenue of £110,287,000. It is proposed to reduce the annual fixed debt charges from 25 to 23 millions; to impose a stamp duty of five shillings per cent. on foreign and colonial stock; to increase the duties on the capital of companies; to impose a six-penny stamp duty on letters of administration; and to increase the wine duties.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach stated that the increase of expenditures is mainly due to increased armament, and that if the increase in armament be continued the country must face a large increase in taxation.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE.

London, April 17.

The Right Hon. the Duke of Devonshire, Lord President of the Council, speaking at Presterghn hinted an early retirement from political life.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Le Figaro's publication (report of the proceedings of the Criminal Section of the Court of Cassation) confutes the striking point of positive declarations by the German and the Italian Military Attachés, that they never had the slightest connection with the Dreyfus affair, by intimating that the German Attaché did receive items, enumerated in the bordereau, from Major Esterhazy.

ENGLAND AND WEI-HAI-WEI.

Speaking on the Naval Estimates, Right Hon. G. J. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty, stated that the Government did not intend to make Wei-hai-wei into a strong fortified base, where battleships could take refuge; if desirable, however, the Government will have a moderate establishment for the convenience of the fleet which is likely to visit the Gulf of Pechili oftener in future.

CAPE ELECTIONS.

In elections in the Cape under the "Redistribution Act," the "Afrikander Bond" obtained an increased majority.

THE SAMOAN EMBROGLIO.

London, April 18.

The Government (British) has ordered the handing over of the German plantation manager at Samoa (recently taken into custody for inciting Mataafans) to the Cruiser Falke for a subsequent trial at the German Consular Court.

BRITISH SQUADRON AT SASSARIA.

London, April 19.

The British Channel Squadron have arrived at Sassari to salute their Italian Majesties, who are now visiting Sardinia. It is hoped that this action may mitigate the ill-feeling aroused in Italy by the Anglo-French convention (re African boundary).

PLAGUE IN INDIA.

The plague is declining in all parts of India, except in Calcutta.

BRITISH BUDGET.

EXCITING POSITION.

London, April 20.

Opposition is growing against the Budget in several quarters. The Australians especially oppose strongly the wine duties.

AMERICAN WARSHIPS FOR SAMOA.

The American cruisers Marblehead and Newark have been ordered to Samoa.

THE KOWLOON AFFAIR.

Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in the House of Commons, stated that the attack (on Mr. May) at Kowloon appeared to have been instigated by secret societies, but that the combatants included uniformed Chinese Militia. The doubtful attitude of the Chinese authorities, he continued, necessitates a careful consideration of the position.

CANADIAN ANTI-JAPANESE LEGISLATION.

The Government of Canada will probably not allow the British Columbian Bill excluding Japanese labourers to become law.

(FROM THE "N.C. DAILY NEWS.")

ANOTHER DEMAND FOR TERRITORY.

Peking, April 7.

The Island of Yangmao (Yangmao tao) near Shanhaikuan, Gulf of Pechili, has been formally demanded from the Taungli Yamèn by a certain Power. Although the Yamèn has refused further cession of territory to any Power, such strong pressure has been brought that there are doubts whether resistance is possible unless by force of arms. General Tung Fushiang has offered to hold the island with his Kansu troops, but up to to-day the Empress Dowager has still refused him permission, owing to the weakness of the Chinese modern fleet.

EXTENSION OF KOWLOON.

Hongkong, April 9.

The British flag is to be hoisted on Kowloon Extension on Monday, the 17th inst., which is to be a holiday.

The administration of the new territory is to be mainly through village committees and tribunals.

The duty on opium going from Hongkong into China is to be collected in future by the Hongkong Government.

INSULT TO COLONEL BROWNE AT MACAO.

Hongkong, April 11.

Colonel Browne, military attaché to the British Legation at Peking, visiting Macao on Monday, did not remove his hat as a religious procession was passing. He was roughly assaulted and arrested, and released on the British Consul's representation. The matter has been reported to Sir Claude Macdonald.

NOTES.

(a) Not the best defence, but, nevertheless, one of the most difficult for the attack to deal with, especially when playing blindfold.

(b) We prefer 6..... P to Q4; and if 7—P takes P, Q to K2 ch; and White cannot then interpose either Q or B, for loss of B takes Kt.

(c) Bad play. Better would be 8..... B to Kt6; 9—Q to B3; Q to Kt4; 10—Kt to B3; B to Kt5; 11—Q takes K B, P takes Q; 12—B takes Q; P takes Kt ch, with about an even game.

(d) Perhaps an exchange of Queens by Q to Kt6 ch would have been safer for Black.

(e) To enable him to play Q to B2 in the event of Black playing B to Kt5.

(f) P to Q5 might have been safely ventured at once.

(g) And now begins what is, considering that White was sans voir, a most remarkable and deep combination.

(h) Threatening 22—Kt to Kt6 ch, P takes Kt; 23—B to R6 mate.

(i) And here White threatens 23—R takes P ch, winning at least the Queen.

(j) This looks good enough at first sight; but, as the play has it, "We shall see more anon."

A FINE ENDING.

The following very pretty position occurred at the Hanley Club. The winning continuation was missed by the White player, but afterwards pointed out by some of the onlookers:—

White played Q takes R ch, and finally lost. He should have announced mate in six moves as follows:—

- | | |
|-----------------|---------------|
| 1—Q takes R ch | 1—K to R sq |
| 2—Q to B8 ch | 2—Kt to Kt sq |
| 3—Q takes Kt ch | 3—K takes Q |
| 4—R to B8 ch | 4—K takes R |
| 5—R to K B6 ch | 5—K to K sq |
| 6—R to B8 mate | |

NOTES.

M. Faure, the late French President, played a fair game at what is known to clubbists as drawing-room chess. Often, when the urgent claims on his time allowed a brief respite, he would visit the Cafe de la Regence in Paris, for a few minutes, to watch an important match game in progress. The late M. Grevy, when President, allocated considerable sums from the public fund to donate prizes for chess, a game which he considered it his duty, as head of the Republic, to encourage as a national pastime. His policy in this respect was discussed by members of his Cabinet, and approved.—Sydney Town and Country.

The funeral of the late Mr. George W. Medley, of 21, Park Street, Park lane, and Winsford Tower, Devon, took place at Woking Cemetery. Many of the deceased's games may be found in old numbers of the Chessplayers' Chronicle, edited by Howard Staunton. He was one of the very few chessplayers of the world, who had the honour of having won a game from Morphy. In the early sixties Mr. Medley had become a most important and active factor in English chess, and he was mainly instrumental in organising the London International Chess Congress, which was held in connection with the Exhibition of 1862. He also, with the co-operation of the late Herr Löwenthal, edited the book of the congress, probably the best edited tournament book extant. Mr. Medley was also at about this period the prime mover in the introduction of a time-limit for the playing of match and tournament games. About three or four years ago he mentioned this fact in a letter to the Daily News. In that letter, after commenting upon the inordinate amount of time consumed by chessplayers prior to the introduction of the time-limit, he went on to say that the reductio ad absurdum was reached, when Hawitz, on one occasion, took half an hour over his first move. We wonder whether Mr. Medley had ever heard of the celebrated game played in New York about 1857, between Morphy and Louis Paulsen, in which Paulsen sat and looked at the chessboard for two hours and a quarter over one move. A gentleman who was present at this famous sitting, informed us that Morphy, who was then a mere boy, laid down on a sofa, with tears of vexation streaming out of his eyes, his patience having completely broken down at what Staunton would have termed, the "intolerable tedium" of his opponent. For having succeeded in inducing chessplayers to play chess under reasonable time-limit, Mr. Medley's memory deserves to be revered by the chessplayers of all generations, and we are not sure that we ought not to build a monument in his honour.

Walter Pulitzer remarks in the American Chess Magazine that great chess faculty always indicates great mental force. Not only is this true, but it is an incontrovertible fact, also, that some of the first minds in history, and in every department of thought, have taken naturally to the royal pastime.

The following reminiscences of De La Bourdonnais, who at one time held the championship of the world will be found interesting reading. The master's chess hours were from noon till midnight seven times a week. He resembled a species of chess automaton, wound up to meet all conceivable cases with mathematical accuracy. When he played his famous match of nearly 100 games with M'Donnell, the hour of meeting being between 11 and 12 a.m., the encounter frequently continued until six or seven p.m., after which M'Donnell would cease playing, exhausted frequently even to weariness; not so De La Bourdonnais. He would snatch a hasty dinner by the side of the chess-board, and in ten minutes be again enthroned in his chair, the hero of the hundred fights, giving rook, or knight, or pawn, as the case might be, to any opponent who presented, fresh as the dewy morn, and vigorous as though 'twere breakfast time. He would play thus long past midnight, smoking cigars, drinking punch, and pouring forth his full soul in even boisterous merriment; dismissing at times his punch in favour of what he termed "Burton alebion," the only fault of which, he was wont to say, was that after three or four bottles he became additionally impatient, if he found his adversary slow. Upon one occasion he played above 40 games of chess at a sitting, with amateurs of every grade of skill; and with all this he had to be at his post to encounter M'Donnell in the morning. The habits of De La Bourdonnais over the board were the very reverse of what would be expected from so profound a thinker; but he appears to be divided into two existences, one of which does the chess, the other the fun. Jokes, songs, and epigrams came in a flood from his lips like those of Lablache. When the jokes and laughs rose highest, La Bourdonnais' position was improving, and he would gradually smother his opponents with mystification and nonsense.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, APRIL 15TH, 1899.

DEATH.

Entered into rest, at Hakodate, on Friday, April 7th, CHARLOTTE, widow of the late R.V. GIBSON DRAPER, D.D., in the sixty-sixth year of her age.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE new Commercial Code will go into operation in June next.

MR. GEORGE COATES has been appointed German Consul-General at Yokohama.

COUNT OKUMA is about to stomp the country on a political tour organized by the Progressists.

A MEDICAL school will shortly be founded in Formosa with the object of training native doctors. Sixty-three students are to be admitted this year.

FOR the convenience of the public, money orders will in future be issued on Sundays as on ordinary days.

HERR JUNKER, the distinguished violinist, has been engaged for four years by the Tokyo Academy of Music.

MARQUIS ITO, who has been on a visit to Nagano, received hearty welcomes at all the towns he passed through on the way.

THE French Mediterranean squadron is visiting Italy and receiving enthusiastic welcomes at all the ports called at.

A good deal of rain has fallen this week and the glories of the cherry-blossoms are already almost things of the past.

DR. OHRT, student interpreter at the German Legation, has been transferred to the German Consulate, Yokohama.

THE ground on which Christ Church and the paragonage stand in Yokohama Settlement, has been purchased for yen 35,000.

THE Yokohama Specie Bank and the Mitsui Ginko have decided not to lower their rates of interest for the present.

THE interminable Dreyfus case still continues to form the subject of most of the press telegrams sent to the Far East from Paris.

THE present Y. U. C. buildings on the Bund, Yokohama, together with the land on which they stand, have been purchased for yen 90,000.

THE bicycle races organized on the Cricket-ground last Saturday by the Sorin Club attracted a good many people, but the racing was rather poor.

MALISTOA TAKU was crowned King of Samoa on the twenty-third of March in the presence of the British and American representatives, the Germans holding aloof.

MATSUDAIRA NOBITOSHI, the Ochanomizu murderer, who was sentenced to penal servitude at the Miyagi Appeal Court, is reported to have appealed against the decision.

REUTER understands that the negotiations between Russia and England extended over other questions besides China, and had in view the adjustment of present or contingent difficulties.

THE Imperial University, the Higher Middle School, the Yusei Kaisha, the Mitsui Bishi, and the Nippon Ginko have held very successful regattas on the Sumida-gawa during the past fortnight.

MARQUIS YAMAGATA, Minister President, and other members of the Cabinet, were entertained at the Oriental Hotel on Monday evening by the Foreign International Committee. Several interesting speeches were made.

A PARTY of English and American sailors have been caught in an ambush on the plantation of a German settler at Apia, and several, together with their officers, were cut down and scalped. The German has since been arrested.

IMPERIAL Ordinance No. 137 has been issued, establishing three Contagious Diseases Inspection Stations at Yokohama, Kobe, and Nagasaki, with a branch Office at Kuchinotsu, in the province of Hizen. The staff is to consist of eleven officials, viz., a chief, an inspector, a medical man, three assistant inspectors, and two assistant medical men.

MR. CONSUL UYENO, of Hongkong, reports, under date March 29th, that the Hongkong Government, has declared Tainan and Aping infected ports, and will impose a quarantine on all ships coming from the island.

MR. YASUO KAZUYOSHI, Director, and Mr. Sugura Seishu, Superintendent, of the Foreign Department of the Yokohama Post and Telegraph Office, have resigned. The latter was well known to foreign residents.

THE number of letters, &c., handled at the post and telegraph offices throughout the country during January aggregated 99,845,512, —an increase of 24,061,530 as compared with the corresponding month of last year.

ON the 19th inst., at the Maple Club, Shiha, officials of the Railway Bureau and others will give a farewell party in honour of Mr. Page, who has been for many years in the service of the Department, which he has now left.

ACCORDING to a Formosan telegram received by the Home Department, a new case of plague and a death occurred on the 3rd inst. in Taipei Prefecture; while in Tainan Prefecture there were 41 new cases, of which 28 proved fatal.

EFFORTS are being made to preserve the Shunpan-ro, at Bakan, the place where the Japan-China peace negotiations were opened. It is considered undesirable that a place possessing such historical interest should remain as a mere hotel.

A DISPATCH from Mr. Uyeno, Japanese Consul in Shanghai, states that Messrs. Jardine, Matheson, and Company, who obtained the concession for the construction of the Canton-Kowloon railway, are about to commence work shortly.

THE Czar of Russia has presented, through the Russian Minister, congratulations to Mr. Sumida, former director of the Metropolitan Police Bureau, and a few other police officials in recognition of services they rendered to Prince Cyril when on a visit to Japan last year.

THE Department of Communications has a scheme on foot for the establishment of over 100 new post and telegraph offices. Investigations are now being made as to the sites, and it is hoped to have 40 or 50 new offices in working order by June or July next in localities where their necessity is most urgently felt.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha receives an annual subsidy of yen 916,600; viz., yen 594,600 on the Formosan line, yen 125,000 on the Southern China line, yen 172,000 on the Mukpho and Chinnampho line, and yen 150,000 on the Yangtsiekiang line. It also enjoys a navigation encouragement allowance amounting to yen 30,000 per year.

IN the recesses of the mountainous district of Ishibetsu, Hokkaido, a party of foreigners have been living since 1896. How they came to reside in such a place and how they supply themselves with daily necessaries, remain quite a mystery. Among them are English, French, Germans, and Dutchmen, and they are all males. They number 17 in all, and are supposed to be fishermen and sailors. The Hakodate Gendarmerie has sent officials to make investigations into the matter.

JAPAN AND CHINA.

On the whole it may be affirmed that the Japanese press shows more excitement about foreign affairs at present than it showed on any previous occasion since the retrocession of Liaotung. The fact that the Fiji Shimpō lends its columns to the agitation is suggestive, for the Fiji generally adopts a conspicuously sober and conservative line. Indeed, the only journal of importance which resolutely taboos the notion of taking any strong step in foreign politics is the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. Some newspapers maintain marked silence. That is the case with the Yammin. As the representative of Liberal views its estimate of the situation would be interesting, but it evidently hesitates to say anything which might be construed as an expression of the Party's policy.

There is no gainsaying the sound sense of the Nichi Nichi's arguments though they must be decidedly unwelcome to every Japanese Jingo. The people of this country, according to the Nichi Nichi, are at one moment hysterical, at another indifferent. If they see a foreign country make itself busy in China, they want to have their own country do ditto, without pausing to consider whether the result will be a mere flourish of trumpets or a substantial gain. In fact, the conclusion formed by a level-headed observer of their career during the past four years is that pageant not profit fills their thoughts. Japan is sometimes called the England of the East, but it is hard to see how the name can be justified. The pre-eminent characteristic of England is that she never throws away her opportunities. If she expands in new directions, it is because she possesses, and is at once prepared to employ, all the resources necessary to utilize her expansion. The pre-eminent characteristic of Japan is that she does nothing of the kind. She is within a stone's throw, so to speak, of the huge Chinese empire. There do not exist between her people and the Chinese any of the marked differences that make such a wide gulf between the inhabitant of the Middle Kingdom and the European. The Chinese are nearly related to her; she is familiar with their philosophy and their literature; she has copied many of their systems, and she uses their script. Yet while Europeans have been busily undertaking all kinds of enterprises in China—building railways, working mines, establishing banks—Japan has done absolutely nothing. She could not even find means to start the China-Japan Bank recently talked of, useful as it would be to promote her commerce with the neighbouring nation. Her record in Korea is no better. She possesses one railway there; a line projected by an American and carried nearly to completion by American enterprise before it came into Japanese hands. She has obtained a concession for another line, that from Sōul to Fusan, but she has not even made a survey of it yet. There is no manner of doubt that Japan has great power in the Far East, but her people show no capacity for the functions devolving on them, and no ability in utilizing their opportunities. What is it that impedes China's progress? Is it not, on the one hand, her people's want of knowledge, and, on the other, their defective means of communication? Japan could supply both of these deficiencies, but she does nothing. For all the practical use that the Japanese have made of the concessions gained by the Shimonseki Treaty, the Treaty need never have been negotiated. There is nothing in such a record to warrant any fresh official enterprises in China. What their Government obtains, the Japanese people throw away. It may be urged that, since their capital does and suffice even for domestic purposes, they can not be expected to invest it abroad. But capital is not the real difficulty. English banks and German banks in China employ large capital, the greater part of which is drawn from Chinese sources. A Japanese bank, if it were properly organized, could work on the same lines. The long and short of the matter is that until the Japanese furnish some practical proof of their readiness to follow whither the Government leads, there is not the slightest use in the Government's striking out new lines.

That is plain and wholesome speaking; every word of it commends itself as sound and sensible. But if we turn to journals like the Fiji, the Asahi, the Nippon, the Chuo and so forth, we find evidences of great uneasiness. The Fiji thinks that China is rotten to the core, and may crumble to fragments at any moment. Where the process of disintegration will commence there is no foreseeing: perhaps in Fuhkien or Chekiang, almost within sight of the shores of Formosa. Yet the Japanese nation remains apathetic. This is the time for the country to choose its path and pursue it resolutely. If the present opportunity be sacrificed, the loss may prove irreparable. The Liaotung affairs was beyond help. The news of the Three Powers' interference found this nation helpless to resist. But it is not so now. The problem lies before Japan's eyes, and can be solved to her satisfaction if she grapples it boldly.

It will be seen that the Fiji does not particularize its advice, but that the general character of the policy it recommends is unmistakable. It reproaches the Liberal Party for their inaction; contrasts their excitement about the Official Appointments Regulations with their apathy about a stupendous national question like that of China, and accuses them of being great in small things and small in great.

The Chuo, which, as the Nationalist Unionist organ, might be expected to echo the Government's views, is even more perturbed than the Fiji. It thinks that if Japan sits with folded hands at this juncture, China, which constitutes the chief market for her manufactures and products, will be absorbed completely by foreign Powers. It further thinks that the idea of preserving China's integrity is hopelessly exploded. Japan certainly could not perform that task single-handed, and since all the Powers of the West have abandoned it, Japan must follow their example, unless she intends to be left out in the cold. What is the use of our military preparations, the Chuo asks, if no use is made of them when the nation has urgent need. But the Chuo does not advocate military action. What it counsels is that Japan should step in, and secure the Chinese markets by clearly establishing her sphere of influence.

As for the Nippon, we have already alluded to its vehement writing, and to its argument that Japan should send troops to China and cruisers to the principal ports of Fuhkien and Chekiang. But the Nippon appears to have been reflecting more profoundly since it advanced these stalwart views, and the outcome of its reflections is that just as the Pope divided the world, once upon a while between Spain and Portugal, with no tangible results for either the Portuguese or the Spaniards of the present era, so a division of China upon paper or by treaty would not inure in any way to the advantage of the dividing parties unless they were ready to assimilate their gain. The Nippon lays down the axiom that a nation's strength is as the strength of the individuals composing it, and that if a country wants to be great, the best plan is to educate its people in the qualities that make for greatness. It looks as if the Nippon had been imbibing wisdom at the same source as the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, but the Nippon has already blown its Jingo trumpet to loudly to muffle the sound now with philosophical platitudes.

It goes without saying that the causa causans of all this talk is Germany's action in sending troops into the interior of Shantung. The Japanese appreciate the condition of an empire within whose territories foreign soldiers are moved about at the caprice of a foreign potentate, and many of them are obviously becoming impatient lest they should be permanently left out of the scramble for Celestial scraps.

EXTENSIVE CHANGES OF LOCAL GOVERNORS, &c.

The Official Gazette publishes several changes of Departmental Vice-Ministers, Prefects, and other high officials as follows:—Mr. Matsudaira Masanao, Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, being released from his position at his own request, is replaced by Mr. Komatsubara Eitaro, hitherto Vice-Minister of Justice; Mr. Kiyozumi Iyenori, Governor of Ibaraki, is released at his own desire and replaced by Mr. Kashiwada Moribumi, hitherto Vice-Minister of Education, the latter's position being granted to Mr. Okuda Yoshihito; Mr. Sogabe Michio, Governor of Fukuoka, retires at his own request, and is succeeded by Mr. Fukano Ichizo, formerly Superintendent of the Local Government Bureau; the latter's post being filled by Mr. Shibata Iyokado, hitherto Chief Secretary of the Cabinet; Mr. Ogura Hisashi, Director of the Police Bureau, is appointed Governor of Wakayama, being succeeded by Mr. Anraku Kanemichi, Governor of Gifu, whose post is given to Mr. Nomura Masakira, ex-Governor of Wakayama; the Director of the Prisons Bureau, Mr. Koike Keiichi, is placed on the retired list, and his position is given to Mr. Okubo Toshitake, Private Secretary to the Minister for Home Affairs; Mr. Seki Shingo, Governor of Fukui, is also placed on the retired list, being replaced by Mr. Iwao Samuro, ex-Governor of Akita, to whose post Mr. Takeda Chiyoaburo, Secretary of the Higo Prefectural Office, is nominated; Mr. Sone Shizuo, Governor of Yamagata Ken, having resigned of his own accord, is succeeded by Mr. Seki Yoshiomi, and Mr. Orita Heinai, Governor of Shiga, who also resigns, is replaced by Mr. Kawashima Jun; finally, Mr. Okada Ryohei, Councillor of the Educational Department, is appointed a Sanyokwan or Chokunin Councillor, of the same Department.

NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

The new political party has been so long in the throes of delivery that it seems likely to be born a deformity, if, indeed, it is ever born at all. Essential lovers of plays upon words, the Japanese now say that this Shinsei-to (new party) will be a Kinsei-to (a homonym for "old party" and "ancient-rumour party") before it sees the light of day. Will the country be a loser by the abortion? Apparently not. When the projected organization came originally on the tapis, it was associated with the names of Messrs. Kaneko Kentaro, Saito Shuichiro, Taguchi Ukichi, Shimada Saburo, and so on. Naturally the public said, "Here at length is a party that will represent the really respectable side of politics." But when the party's platform began to assume definite shape, it was found to be a conservative structure with a religious basis. The country's indigenous creed, Shinto, and its oldest exotic faith, Buddhism, were to be folded under the wings of the Kokken-to, and the mediæval spectacle of politics and religion playing to an audience of national passions was to be rehearsed, to Japan's great demoralization, at the close of the nineteenth century. It is not a public misfortune that such a mischievous performance can not find either actors or a stage, but it is a wholesome sign that the intended audience shows its aversion beforehand. The projectors of the party are compared by a witty journalist to the Chinese knaves who, under a sheep's-head sign-board, sold dog's flesh to a deluded public, and, while the still-born deformity is buried with acclaim, fears are expressed lest its evil odour should corrupt public opinion and vitiate men's conception of conservatism. The historical misfortunes that have attended all past attempts to confound Church and State are recapitulated, and the fervent hope is expressed that Japan's peace may never be disturbed by this ancient nightmare. It may well be supposed that the partisans of Shinto and Buddhism who were ready to place their creeds under a political ægis do not escape censure. If that is their idea of the way to stand their ground against Christianity, they can not count on surviving the struggle.

FOREIGN LOAN.

There have been so many conflicting rumours recently about Japan's foreign loan that we hesitate to allude to any more of them. However, we add the latest story for what it may be worth, namely, that London financiers have agreed to float a 4 per-cent. loan at 95 or 96, and that Mr. Hayakawa Senkichiro, of the Finance Department, is to proceed to England immediately to complete the arrangements. Meanwhile, the Treasury has sold to the Bank of Japan five million yen worth of the War Bonds purchased last year for the purpose of easing the market. The Bank is now in a position to buy several millions worth of Bonds, for its note-issuing power has been increased, as our readers remember, from 85 million yen to 120 millions, and it finds, just at present, no demand for the additional issues in the open market. It pays 14 per cent. on the notes and receives 5 per cent. on the Bonds purchased with them, so that the transaction is decidedly favourable.

THE CHIEF OF THE TOKYO POLICE AND THE FLOWER-VIEWERS.

The Chief of the Tokyo Police has withdrawn his strange order forbidding the use of fancy costumes by Japanese visiting the cherry-blossoms. It has been stated by vernacular newspapers that the order was prompted by a desire to put an end to a custom which seemed likely to be severely criticised by foreigners after the era of mixed residence had commenced. Such an explanation over-taxes our credulity; for, unless the Chief of Police is singularly ill-informed, he must be well aware that foreigners themselves, in their own countries, often take their amusement in precisely the manner which he has attempted to check in Tokyo. He must also know that at the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee in Yokohama a few years ago, masquerading took place on a large scale. But whatever may have been his motive, such interference with the people's innocent amusements is unwarrantable, so far as we can see, and foreigners are entitled to strongly resent the coupling of their name with acts so ill-advised. Any Japanese who believe—and there must be a great many such—that their harmless merry-making is to be stopped in deference to foreign prejudices, will naturally feel resentment against the foreigner. From that point of view there has been far too much journalistic talk about the operation of the new Treaties. The Tokyo newspapers have discussed the event so frequently and earnestly that their Japanese readers must be beginning to regard the foreigner as a nuisance, and to regret that the Revised Treaties should give him an opportunity of disturbing the even tenor of the nation's life. As a matter of fact he will not disturb it at all. Things will go on after July next just as they have always gone on.

CUSTOMS RECEIPTS.

The Finance Department's estimate of the Custom's yield for the current fiscal year is 16 million yen. That is on account of import duties only. Export duties are still levied, but only as a temporary measure. They remain at the old rates, and the return expected from them during the period January 1st to July 17th is only three-quarters of a million yen. The Customs' records for the first three months of the year, however, suggest that the Finance Department's estimate may prove fallacious. The import duties levied during January and February aggregated 1,098,533 yen, and the figures for Yokohama and Kobe during March were 690,011 yen, so that the total yield for all the ports during the first quarter of the year can not have exceeded 2 million yen. If that figure may be taken as illustrating the state of affairs for the remainder of the year, it is evident that the aggregate income from the source will be only 8 million yen, not 16 millions, as estimated in the Budget. The Yiji Shimpō draws attention to these facts, but does not refer to the forecast generally made by foreign observers last year, namely, that owing to the rush of goods imported during the second half of 1898, in order to escape the increased tariff enforced from January 1st, 1899, the imports for the first half of the current year would probably be comparatively small.

JAPANESE POLITICS.

Incidents now occurring in the field of Japanese politics invite a great deal of criticism. The wonderful Mr. Koyama, who openly gloried in having accepted a bribe, and justified his act by pleading that to take the money of dishonest folks without giving any return for it is a kind of duty devolving on patriotic members of the Diet—this Mr. Koyama has actually had the effrontery to sue the persons who bribed him because the latter, seeing that Koyama did not vote as he was expected to vote, declined to cash a promissory note representing part of the bribe. Mr. Hoshi Toru, however, has startled the public more effectually. People do not take Mr. Koyama very seriously, but they recognise in Mr. Hoshi one of the great party politicians of the time, and look to him for light and leading. Speaking recently at a meeting in a provincial centre, Mr. Hoshi is reported to have said that Japan was now in the era of bribery. England had had a similar era in the days of Walpole, and Japan need not be ashamed that her turn has come. She must pass through this stage of parliamentary institutions, and therefore men might take bribes wherever they could get them.

It will readily be conjectured that this saying of Mr. Hoshi's—truly or falsely reported—has created no little excitement. The Yiji takes it seriously, but treats it comically. It opines that the era to which Mr. Hoshi alludes was not found by him ready-made, but was made by him. Hoshi laughs, no doubt, but the era is very sorry for itself, and doesn't care to be charged with the responsibility of being its own creator. If any one wants a pair of well-matched pictures to hang in his alcove as moral samplers, he could not do better than get likenesses of Messrs. Hoshi and Koyama embroidered in gold and silver.

Another incident which the Yiji utilizes, also at Mr. Hoshi's expense, is the affair of the Tokyo Tram Company and the City Assembly. Several months ago, the Tokyo Police issued an order restricting the number of passengers carried in a tram-car. The Company retorted by raising its fares, greatly to the indignation of the public, who justly contended that such conduct on the part of a company paying dividends at the rate of 30 per cent. was unwarrantable. Acting on that view, the City Assembly passed a resolution calling upon the Chief of Police to withdraw the sanction he had given to the schedule of increased fares. Then followed a long discussion, the police insisting on their restrictions, in the interests of order and morality, and the Company declining to reduce its fares. Finally a compromise was effected. The increased fares were endorsed by the City Assembly on condition that the Company contributed a sum of twenty thousand yen, in four annual instalments, to the road-repairing fund of the municipality. Now it is estimated that the profits accruing to the company under the new schedule will aggregate two hundred thousand yen in four years, so that the bargain struck with the City Assembly seems too favorable to have been concluded without some recourse to devious methods. Hence the members of the Assembly are classed with Mr. Koyama and his comrades, and, moreover, this new instance of corruption is laid at the door of Mr. Hoshi's theory about an inevitable era. The Fiji, therefore, has a picture of the Liberal leader in the character of a stall-keeper. His wares are iron masks, fashioned after his own likeness, and before his shop is a placard announcing that masks warranted to hide all sense of shame may be had for a reasonable outlay. A member of the City Assembly approaches the stall with the obvious intention of buying.

Of course the recent affair of the Official Appointments Regulations does not escape ridicule. The critics pretend to think that Marquis Yamagata was persuaded to issue the Regulations in the interests of the Clan nominees, who wanted to be secured in their tenure of office, and that, on the other hand, he was prepared to purchase the complaisance of the Liberals by providing for a number of exceptions. He is therefore represented as a kind of Mr. Facingbothways, giving assurances to the Chief Secretary of the Cabinet, on one side, and to Mr. Hoshi Toru on the other.

The moral of it all, as deduced by the Fiji Shimpō, is that the people who say and do these things are not so bad as the public which suffers them to be said and done with impunity. Therein we entirely agree with our contemporary. But in expressing our agreement we merely reiterate what we have often said before, namely, that among all the needs of modern Japan, an active public opinion is the most urgent. There never was a country where things that are everybody's business are so completely thrust aside as nobody's business. The miserable aphorism that tongues wag for only seventy-five days consecutively, is responsible for an immense amount of mischief in Japan. Whether society's apathetic attitude is of modern growth or of ancient custom we do not pretend to judge, but certainly the habit of the time is to regard in the light of the proverbial "conjugal quarrel" every incident with which one's own interests are not directly connected. A House of Representatives which brought its session to a close without taking any official notice of the fact that one of its members had publicly confessed himself guilty of corruption, is a corrupt House, whatever may have been the motives of its indifference.

COUNT OKUMA.

Saturday, April 8.

Rumour is busy at present with the names of Count Okuma and Marquis Ito in conjunction. There is an effort to persuade the public that the two statesmen are coming together, and that their union for administrative purposes is not unlikely. It is our conviction that Marquis Ito is irrevocably committed to the Liberal Party, and that unless, some radical re-grouping of political elements takes place, he can not be found in the same camp with Count Okuma. Nor does it follow that such a coalition would be advantageous for Japan. She needs two strong parties, and no better leader than Count Okuma can be found for one of them.

The Count, who is at present staying in his Oiso villa, has been interviewed by a representative of the Fiji Shimpō, to whom he expressed his admiration of the unimpaired vigour of Marquis Ito's mind. He hinted that most of the so-called "elder statesmen" have fallen behind the times, and become timorous of the changed conditions of the world. Not so Marquis Ito, however. He always keeps himself on the crest of the wave of progress, and the nation recognises that he still has heart for great achievements.

Count Okuma then spoke of the country's foreign policy in terms of guarded but unequivocal discontent. He let it be seen that, in his opinion, a valuable opportunity had been sacrificed when China's application for a loan on the security of the Hang-yang mines was rejected, and he hinted that the secrecy in which the Foreign Office wraps its doings does not conceal activity but hides inaction.

Wednesday, April 12.

Count Okuma has started on a "stumping" tour. He proceeds first to Sendai, and thence to Saitama, Shizuoka, Nagoya, Kyoto, Osaka, Kobe, Okayama, and Hiroshima, in that order. It is stated that his intention is to pass 6 or 7 days at each place, so that his trip will probably occupy about two months. It is not the first time that one of the leading Meiji statesmen has visited the provinces in the interests of a political party. Marquis Saigo and Viscount Shinagawa adopted a similar course when the National Unionists were organized, and Count Goto did the same at a much earlier date for the purpose of collecting adherents for the Daidō Danketsu. Indeed, it may be said that Count Itagaki set the example twenty-two years ago, for when he raised the Liberal standard he belonged to the band of so-called "Clan statesmen." Nevertheless Count Okuma's tour excites a great deal of interest, partly because his recent exalted position of Minister President of State renders all his movements important, and partly because, intimately as he has always associated himself with the Progressist Party, he has never hitherto espoused its cause to the extent of stumping the provinces in its interests. Besides, Count Okuma is unquestionably a great personality. He is an admirable speaker. In that respect he ranks, we think, above all the "elder statesmen" of the time, Marquis Ito alone being his possible peer. He possesses also a singularly captivating manner, largely due to the exceptional freshness of his mind. The smallest subject interests him. He listens to every suggestion or opinion, however humble its source, and is always ready to give to it the closest attention and to embellish it with some original view of his own. Add to this that he is gifted with an extraordinary memory and that his judgments are formed without the least hesitation, and it becomes easy to understand the influence he wields and the popularity he enjoys. It is more than questionable, however, whether the exigencies of party leadership have not impaired Count Okuma's title to be called a really great statesman. In the days before he found himself dragged this way and that by political influences, he frankly obeyed the dictates of his own verdicts and never lacked the courage of his opinions, and as the former were always sounder and the latter more profound than those of his followers, his statesmanship stood on a far higher level than theirs. Of late years it has been sometimes difficult to detect these old evidences of bold independence and high conscientiousness, and when the story of the development of constitutional government in Japan comes to be written, the historian will probably have to class this injury to Count Okuma's national usefulness among the sacrifices that the new system demanded.

SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICIALS.

The Japanese Government has found it necessary to increase the salaries paid to its Diplomatic and Consular officials. Arithmetically the increases look very large, but it has to be remembered that the former figures, though stated in silver, were paid in gold in the case of officials serving in gold-standard countries, whereas the new figures represent the payments actually made in every case. Japan herself having adopted gold monometallism, her yen has a fixed equivalent in gold, and it is no longer necessary to make any allowance on account of differences of standard. Hitherto the best paid Ministers have been those accredited to England, France, Russia, and the United States. Their salaries were 6,000 yen nominally, but, being paid in gold, amounted in practice to 12,000 yen. The figure will henceforth be 22,000 yen for Great Britain and Russia, and 20,000 yen for the United States and France. The Minister in Germany, heretofore paid 5,700 yen (i.e., 11,400 sen in silver) will now receive 20,000 yen; the Minister to Austria will receive 18,000 yen instead of 5,700; the Minister to Italy, 17,000 yen instead of 5,300; the Minister to Belgium, 14,000 yen instead of 5,000; the Minister to China, 12,000 yen instead of 5,500; and the Minister to Korea, 9,000 yen instead of 5,000. Corresponding changes are made with regard to Charge's d'Affaires, First Secretaries, and Consuls. These increases are accompanied by reductions in certain allowances hitherto granted, independently of salaries, so that the officials concerned will not find their financial circumstances so much improved as the actual figures suggest. On the other hand, since salaries, apart from allowances, constitute the basis for calculating pensions, the change now made will be very welcome.

BALL IN TOKYO.

On the evening of the 13th a ball was given by Marquis and Marchioness Nabeshima at their residence in Nagatacho, Tokyo. His Imperial Highness Prince Arisugawa arrived at about half-past nine, and Their Imperial Highnesses Prince and Princess Kanin came half an hour later, by which time the whole of the guests, some three hundred in number, had assembled, including their Excellencies Marquis Yamagata, Marquis Saigo, Count Matsukata, Count Okuma, Viscount Aoki, the Foreign Representatives, and many other distinguished personages. Dancing then commenced and was kept up until past two o'clock, concluding with a cotillon. Immediately after supper the gavotte was danced with much grace and accuracy, but the spectacular effect was disappointing, as the dancers were not specially costumed. It is needless to say that the arrangements, from first to last, left nothing to be desired, and that the entertainment proved most enjoyable. A marked feature of the evening was the beautiful costumes of some of the Japanese ladies, but as Japanese dress does not lend itself to dancing in foreign style, its wearers were little en evidence.

MARQUIS ITO.

Marquis Ito arrived at Nagano on the 10th instant, and received an ovation. Thousands of people turned out to welcome him, and there were illuminations and other demonstrations of rejoicing. The Marquis undoubtedly possesses the confidence of the nation in an incomparably higher degree than any other living statesman. It is easy to understand the eagerness of the two great political parties to obtain his avowed coöperation, for whichever has the good fortune to win him will at once rise high above its rival. There have been rumours of late that a rap-prochement is taking place between him and the Progressists, and the theory received some confirmation from Count Okuma's recent eulogies of the statesman who, while the oldest man in the nation in respect of wisdom and experience, remains as young as ever in mental vigour. But although Marquis Ito, hesitating to figure in the rôle of a party politician, refrains from openly casting in his lot with the Liberals, he is bound to them by ties sufficiently strong to hold him back effectively from joining the Progressists. If he ever does consent to take the leadership of a party—which is doubtful—there can be no question as to the choice he will make. Frankly speaking, we do not think that the Liberals, as they are now constituted, are worthy to be led by him. Their record in the last session of the Diet is not calculated to attract any really conscientious and patriotic statesman.

FORMOSA RAILWAY.

It is stated that the Formosa Railway Company has now been finally dissolved, and that all the preliminary outlays incurred by it will be reimbursed so soon as the Formosa Railway Bonds, the issue of which was voted by the Diet last session, have been floated. The operation may involve considerable delay, however, for it is evident that no market can be found for the Bonds in Japan at present. The capital of the Company, as originally planned, was 15 million yen in 300,000 shares. Of these the number taken by the projectors and the first batch of subscribers was 155,000, and, as the amount paid up on each was 2.50 yen, the total collected was 387,500 yen. A part of this was spent upon surveying the line, a part upon locomotives and waggons, and a part upon expenses of organization. Such outlays aggregated 300,000 yen, in round figures. The waggons were of special construction, being intended for transporting troops as well as carrying ordinary freight. These, together with the locomotives and the surveys and drawings, will all be valuable to the Formosa Government, but of course, the moneys devoted to organizing the Company will be a clear loss. It seems to be expected that these moneys also will be reimbursed to the shareholders, but the principle of such munificence is hard to appreciate. The company failed totally to carry out the project for which it was formed, and there seems to be no valid reason why the State should indemnify it for all the losses caused by its failure.

DR. MAYERS.

Dr. Mayers, foreign adviser to the Government in Formosa, is now in Tokyo, having come there by desire of the Central Authorities. He has naturally declined to be interviewed, but his caution in that respect has not saved him from being very falsely represented by some vernacular journals. The Forosa Choho, which enjoys the reputation of being the "Yellow Journal" of Japan par excellence, manufactured a paragraph about Dr. Mayers out of whole cloth, and the Nippon now alleges that he threatens to make all sorts of inconvenient disclosures in The Times unless his advice is followed. We have no hesitation in saying that the Nippon has been grossly misinformed, and that Dr. Mayers never uttered any such threat. Our contemporary adds that the Doctor is singularly earnest in pressing his views; so earnest that people have been perplexed to interpret his motive, and the Nippon enlightens them by explaining that Dr. Mayers having been for over twenty years a resident in Formosa, and having acquired among foreigners a reputation for thoroughly understanding the people of the island and their affairs, is most unwilling to be associated with the failures which he believes to be in store for the Japanese if they do not adopt his counsel. We are not aware how much earnestness Dr. Mayers may have shown, but it will perhaps interest the Nippon to know that Englishmen are always earnest about any work they undertake, and that a great many Englishmen are astonished at the methods pursued by the Japanese in Formosa. Great Britain has given practical demonstration that the Chinese are eminently easy to govern. She governs hundreds of thousands of them in Hongkong, Singapore, and the Straits. Her secret is to make them manage their own affairs, and to abstain from all interference with customs and organizations which are not prejudicial to peace and good order. That is a very simple recipe. The Japanese themselves adopted it with marked success during their brief administration of affairs in Liaotung and at Newchwang. But they pursue a very different course in Formosa, chiefly, we imagine, because the officials they send there are an inferior class of men quite unfitted for such a task. However, the Japanese are not at present in a mood to utilize the experience or consider the advice of other people. They are bent upon working out their own salvation in their own way, and their friends can only hope that the effort will not prove too costly.

GARDEN PARTY IN TOKYO.

The President of the Bank of Japan, Mr. Yamamoto, and the Vice-President, Mr. Takahashi, entertained a large party of friends at the Maple Club on the afternoon of the 8th instant. There were about five hundred persons present, and extensive arrangements had been made for their amusement, the programme including dancing in various styles, raconteurs, and so on. Several of the Ministers of State and most of the leading merchants of Tokyo were among the guests, and foreigners were represented by Mr. W. F. Mitchell, Mr. Budd, Mr. Bevis, and Mr. A. Diosy. At about 4 o'clock refreshments were served, and the party broke up after a most enjoyable afternoon.

THE "CHA-NO-YU" CULT.

Within the past few days there was held at Hoshigaoka in Tokyo a sale of articles for use in the Tea Ceremonial. Probably in no other country, Occidental or Oriental, does so much value attach to the "odile" of a celebrated connoisseur as in Japan. Sen-no-Rikiu, the ill-fated dilettante of Hideyoshi's time, Kobori, Lord of Yenshiu, who flourished a few generations later, and five other masters of the Cha-no-Yu, are held in such venerated remembrance that any object which received their approval or was used by them, possesses a sacro-sanct character in the eyes of their successors. Kobori was the greatest connoisseur of all, and he compiled a catalogue, called the Meiyo-ki, in which he entered a detailed account of all the Cha-no-Yu utensils regarded in his time as the ne-plus-ultra of classical taste, and when any of those utensils comes into the market now-a-days, there is a considerable flutter in the Cha-no-Yu dove-cot. The objects recently offered for sale at Hoshigaoka numbered 900, and included several which were recognised as the fully authenticated originals of the Kobori catalogue raisonné. Hence the bidding—it was done by tender—was very brisk, and some of the prices realized were remarkable. The total sale brought fifty thousand yen. Here are some of the figures:—

- A cup of stone-ware covered with lustrous black glaze having ash-coloured spots. (A specimen of Chinese Chien-yao of the Sung dynasty, known in Japan as Hakatsugi Tommoku. The most ardent Occidental lover of "antiques" would probably think five sovereigns a very yen high price for such a cup). Sold for 3,000
- A bamboo flower-vase (of the kind known as Hito-yo-giri; without decoration of any kind)..... 507
- A bronze vase; body undecorated; cloud-shaped handles; 9 inches high..... 1,680
- An iron water-bottle (kama) of the shape called Tammi gama..... 251
- A charcoal-holder (sumi-tori) made of woven bamboo, in the ichi monji style... 211
- An incense-box (diam. 2½ inches; depth 1 inch) of black lacquer in the guri, or tani-hoku, style, in a box marked by Kobori Yenshiu no Kami..... 466
- An incense box (smaller than the last) of blue and white porcelain, the decoration a roughly painted water-lily..... 158
- An Ashiya iron water-bottle (the style known as avari gama; i.e. the surface granulated in hail stone diaper)..... 356
- A similar bottle with handles..... 250
- A stand of black lacquer, for an alcove ornament (worth about 50 sen from an artistic point of view)..... 238
- A scroll inscribed with the ideographs hai shin (mens aqua), from the pen of Sei Satsu of the Tang Dynasty..... 1,580
- A scroll inscribed with ideographs from the pen of Gessaki (Sung Dynasty)..... 488
- A bamboo tea-bottle (used by Sen-no-Rikiu)..... 518
- A miniature screen, of the kind used for placing besides the furnace in the Tea Ceremony (hence called Furo-saki-biyobu); painted by Shokwado..... 258
- Five small blue and white porcelain cups, from the kiln of Shonzei Goro-dayu..... 121
- Five small cups of Ming porcelain (red glaze with traces of gold decoration)..... 110

All these were identified as having received the honour of entry in the O-kura-cho, which is the scripture of the Japanese Chajin. There were several other objects scarcely less startling, but our list is quite long enough. We may add that had these "curios" been offered for sale even in Paris, the metropolis of connoisseurs, it is doubtful whether any one of them, with the exception of the Chien-yao cup, would have fetched 20 francs.

JAPANESE LADIES

The part played by Japanese ladies in society is discussed by the Kokumin Shimbu in two articles of considerable interest. According to our contemporary's view, ladies are gradually suffering social effacement in this country. They do not occupy as important a place as they did twenty years ago, insufficient as was the consideration then accorded to them. Whenever they do make their appearance at evening parties, they are content to hide in remote parts of the salons, and are left without notice or attention. Ministers of State and diplomatists did at one time include wives and daughters in their invitations, but they do so no longer, and they excuse themselves by saying that, the ladies having shown a steadily increasing tendency not to avail themselves of these invitations, the habit of inviting them gradually went out of vogue. In short, the present state of affairs is that ladies go into society not as a pleasure but as a duty, and they do not discharge the duty with such a good grace as to dissimulate its irksomeness. The absence of ladies at semi-official or official banquets might be referred to special causes, as is often the case now, but the general fact that they are the victims of neglect can not be gainsaid. They are themselves to blame, in some degree. They do not study the usages of society, or cultivate the arts by which their foreign sisters obtain such a prominent position. But, on the other hand, no attempt is made to educate them. "Accomplishments," a term which ought to include such training as may enable a girl, if not to shine, at least to command a measure of attention in modern society by her ability to contribute to its attractions, are still interpreted in Japan to mean playing on the koto and the samisen, the art of flower setting, the ceremonial of the Cha-no-yu, and other antiquated attainments which are absolutely excluded from the reper-toire of social doings at the present day. There is another factor, also, which militates strongly against the Japanese lady's social success. It is the great and growing influence of the "professional," who to a keen knowledge of every-day affairs and of the subjects that interest men, adds a special complaisance which must always remain beyond the sanctions of strict virtue. The "professional" is much preferred to the lady as a social vis-à-vis, and the Kokumin thinks that the sphere of the former's influence is extending so that in the end she may possibly effect the complete conquest of society. Such a forecast seems extravagant. We confine ourselves, however, to reproducing our contemporary's remarks.

MR. DIOSY.

We observe with pleasure that a strong disposition is displayed to give Mr. Diosy a hearty welcome in Japan. The Shogro Shimpo has a most appreciative article about him. It notes the genuine friendship he has always evinced towards Japan, and the very useful part he has played in establishing good relations between Englishmen and Japanese. Such a man, says the Shogro, ought to have a reception not inferior to that given to Lord Charles Beresford, for though he has no title conferred by men he is one of "nature's noblemen."

ROUGHS.

The Tokyo police have been occupying themselves with the costumes worn by masqueraders at the flower festivals, and have provoked a great deal of ridicule by attempting to interdict perfectly innocent amusements which are not only tolerated but encouraged in the very centres of Occidental civilization. Happily they learned their mistake before the odium attaching to such arbitrary interference with the liberty of the subject had assumed serious dimensions. But they now seem likely to provoke as much censure by their perfunctoriness as they were recently in danger of incurring by their misplaced zeal. There is another kind of performance which has become very common at these flower-fetes, and which certainly calls for active repression by the police, though they apparently fail to recognise the fact altogether. We allude to the conduct of bands of young roughs, whose chief amusements are to play rude practical jokes on peaceful wayfarers, to slap the faces of women and girls, or to force them to drink sake against their will. Several complaints on that score were made some time ago by foreigners visiting Sugita and other place celebrated for plum blooms. They may console themselves with the thought, if it be any consolation, that their nationality did not specially expose them to annoyance. The Japanese also fare badly. So villainous is the behaviour of these bands of soshi that no respectable Japanese woman or girl ventures to walk nowadays in either Ueno Park or Mukojima. They do not care to take the risk of having their faces slapped, or of being enclosed in a circle of semi-tipsy roisterers, and compelled to swallow two or three cups of bad wine. The upshot of it all is that these places of public amusement are now forbidden ground to the upper classes, and have been monopolized by the lower. A highly creditable state of affairs, in sooth!

A few days ago this story was told to us by a foreign resident of Tokyo:—"Driving through the streets with my little son on the box of the carriage, I happened to look out, and saw a man making grimaces at the lad. He was a well-dressed person of about twenty-two or twenty-three, and, as soon as he observed that I was looking, he desisted and walked on. Now I know that in Western cities children are often rude to foreigners, and are ready to call a man names or otherwise insult him if they detect any signs of alien nationality about him. But I do not know that such things are done by respectable men of two or three and twenty."

The distinction is very just. It is scarcely fair, however, to apply any Western analogy to Japanese affairs just at present. This nation has been engaged in a long fight of self assertion, and the feelings aroused by the contest have not yet subsided. Too much importance should not be attached to occasional displays of rudeness where foreigners are the victims. We are passing through a disagreeable, though probably inevitable, period, and will soon emerge from it without any serious wounds or particularly unpleasant reminiscences. But the behaviour of Japanese roughs and roistering students towards women and girls is quite another matter. One of the charming features of the people's customs used to be their politeness and orderliness when massed together. That was a trait noticed again and again by foreign observers, and applauded most heartily. Is it about to disappear? Has the time come when ladies can no longer venture to walk in crowded Japanese thoroughfares? We should be very sorry to think so.

THE TOKYO ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Tokyo Academy of Music has been so fortunate as to secure the services of Herr August Junker in the capacity of Professor. The news is very welcome, for it presumably indicates the commencement of a new era of musical activity in Tokyo, as well as the emergence of the Academy from its condition of partial effacement. We have written so much, from time to time, on the advisability of popularizing Western music in Japan that we need not now recapitulate the advantages of the step, but will confine ourselves to congratulating the Academy on obtaining a Professor of such ability as Herr Junker. Our Japanese and foreign readers alike will be interested in the following details of Herr Junker's career:—

Herr August Junker was born in 1870 at Aachen, Germany, commencing the study of the violin with his father at the age of eight. Entering the Conservatory of Cologne in the year 1881, and graduating from the same under Professors Königsow and Holänder in 1887, he laid the foundation of his musical knowledge, and subsequently made such remarkable progress that in 1889 he was accepted as a scholar by that greatest of all classical violinists, Joachim, and, after a three years' course under him and Professor Wirth, graduated as a finished artist.

Among the Orchestras in which Herr Junker has been a prominent member are the Cologne Orchestra under Wüllner, and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin under Von Bülow. As a soloist he has been heard in such cities as Berlin, Aachen, Cologne, Düsseldorf, Sigmaringen, Osnabrück, Hamburg, Frankfurt, etc. In 1891 Herr Junker received a call from the Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the three leading orchestras in America, and joined this distinguished organization as a leading violin player and soloist. His association with this orchestra continued until 1893 when the famous musician Theodore Thomas, leader of the Chicago Orchestra and General Musical Director of the World's Fair, recognizing the proficiency and skill of Herr Junker, offered superior inducements to him to join the Chicago Orchestra as concert-master and soloist. Herr Junker was not only frequently heard with pleasure by large crowds of visitors to the Exposition from all parts of the world, but subsequently visited all the principal cities of the United States in company with Mr. Thomas' Orchestra and took a prominent part in all its concerts. In the summer of 1897 Herr Junker severed his connection with the Thomas' Orchestra in order to undertake a concert tour around the world, his travels taking him through Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Egypt, India, China, and Japan.

INDUSTRIES BANK.

The Committee of Investigation appointed by the shareholders of the Industries Bank has presented its report. It exonerates the President and Vice-President completely from having committed any act contrary to the Bank's regulations, but it censures them for creating needless sections and bureaux, and for appointing superfluous officers, especially two counsellors, who received salaries of 3,000 yen a year, and had practically nothing to do. After hearing the report, the meeting passed the accounts which have been awaiting that endorsement for nearly two months. The President, Mr. Kawashima Jun, has resigned, as our readers know, and is now Governor of Shiga Prefecture.

THE INCOME TAX.

An interesting question has been raised with regard to the manner of levying the income tax in the case of juristic persons, that is to say, companies. The fiscal year begins on April 1st. Thus the period in respect of which the tax is levied is from April 1st to March 31st. It seems to follow, as a natural consequence, that all income realized prior to April 1st should be taxed in accordance with the rates operative previously to that date. But rumour says that the Finance Department takes a different view, its interpretation being that dividends which have not been declared before April 1st must be liable to the rates fixed by law for the year beginning on April 1st. To make this clear, let us take a definite example. C is a company whose business year coincides with the State's fiscal year. In other words, C is a company which habitually makes up its accounts for the year commencing April 1st and ending March 31st. There are many such companies in Japan, especially shipping companies and railway companies which, being in receipt of aid from the Treasury, find it convenient to synchronize their business terms with those of the State. Since C's accounts cover the period ending March 31st, it is obvious that they can not be rendered before April at soonest, which means that dividends allotted in such accounts are declared after the April rates of income tax have become leviable. The Nippon Yusen Kaisha, for example, submits a half-yearly report to its shareholders, generally in May, if we remember aright, and declares a dividend for the six months ended March 31st. Obviously that dividend, though paid with respect to a period anterior to April 1st, constitutes a part of the shareholders' income for the year subsequent to April 1st, and, since it is income enjoyable during that year, the Treasury considers it liable to the increased scale of tax which went into force on April 1st. On the side of the companies, however, it is contended that income tax should be levied with regard to the time when an income is actually earned, not with regard to the time when it is spent. Hence, according to their claim, the dividend declared by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for the six months ended March 31st, 1899, should be taxed at the old rate, and not at the increased rate which became leviable from April 1st. The point is of considerable importance, and seems likely to provoke some discussion. But we entertain no doubt that the interpretation attributed to the Treasury is right. "Income," in the sense of the tax law, is the amount of money available for expenditure during a given term, irrespective of the time when the money was earned. That seems to be established by the method adopted in taxing public bonds. Interest payable on such securities in July is taxed with regard to its full amount, and the tax is supposed to be for the year commencing in April, though one half of the interest is for the three months January, February and March. The same rule ought to apply to dividends paid on the shares of a juristic person, and does apply in foreign countries.

"SUPERSENSITIVE."

We have had a moment's hesitation about publishing the letter signed "Supersensitive," which will be found in our correspondence columns, but, on the whole, it is better that such views, if honestly entertained, should find open expression. There is nothing like the safety-valve of publicity. But two things strike us. One is that the subjects catalogued by "Supersensitive" as offensive when discussed upon the stage—i.e., divorce courts and the embarrassment of a mother who has been so unfortunate as to bear triplets—can not in themselves be called illegitimate themes for theatrical purposes. The other is that the ladies and gentlemen who took part in the performance which is the proximate cause of "Supersensitive's" condemnation are quite sufficient guarantees for its propriety. We enter this protest most emphatically, and we imagine that our readers will attach the same value as we do to the cachet of the actors' and actresses' names. As to "ladies dressed in men's attire," a feature which our correspondent characterizes as "worst of all," we totally disagree with him. There are costumes and costumes, and it does not follow for one instant that a lady wearing male garments offends against even the most delicate canons of modesty. Indeed, when "Supersensitive's" letter is analysed, nothing solid remains of it except the "swear words." These, being mere vulgar superfluities of speech, certainly find no proper place in a play performed before a polite audience, but we can not discover that the language used in the last theatricals gave any offence to persons whose opinions are undoubtedly entitled to credit equally with those of our correspondent.

Correspondents inform us that "Supersensitive's" letter, published in the Japan Daily Mail on the 11th, has given offence to several people, and may have a deterrent effect upon some of the ladies and gentlemen whose public-spirited kindness has hitherto induced them to contribute successfully to the community's amusement. We are surprised that any importance should attach to the incident. Even supposing that men like "Supersensitive" never made themselves heard, the fact that they exist in every community must be perfectly well known, and it really matters very little whether they speak aloud or keep silence, seeing that the message they have to deliver is purely subjective. If the suffrages of the foreign residents were collected, quite a number would be found in radical opposition to all histrionic performances, but to close the theatre in deference to their views would not be more rational than to abstain from whistling on Sunday because a few bigoted Puritans consider that the Sabbath is desecrated by such an act. Everybody is entitled to have his own opinion, and is also entitled to express it, provided that he does so in terms not offensive to others. "Supersensitive's" letter complied with the latter condition, and we really do not see why any one should be disturbed because he has raised his voice. Those that do not agree with him are under no sort of obligation to listen to his preaching. Very likely he considers that bicycle riding is an immodest pursuit for ladies. There are many good folks who think so, and they have proclaimed their condemnation in vehement terms, but the vast majority of us remain perfectly content that our wives, our sisters, and our daughters should cycle to the top of their bent. Why need factitious importance be given to these isolated enunciations of strange theories? They merit no attention unless some valid canon of morality or propriety can be cited in their support, a condition which is certainly incapable of fulfilment in the present case. Truly, it appears to us that the nom de plume chosen for himself by our correspondent may be appropriately employed to describe the condition of some of our readers. Otherwise they would quietly go their own way and let him go his. The world would be a monotonous place if fauzy waistcoats were abolished.

THE INTERNATIONAL BANQUET.

The Tokyo newspapers re-produce full reports of the proceedings at the International Banquet on the 10th instant, the foreign speeches being carefully translated. But only one journal—the Kokumin—appends any comments. It says that the affair did not merely serve as a means of placing the relations between foreigners and Japanese on a warm footing and offer practical evidence of the good feeling that exists between them, but it also suggested the idea that frequent recourse to such international reunions is earnestly to be desired. Misunderstandings are chiefly due to doubts and ignorance bred of want of free intercourse. Once people come together and clasp hands, their long-harboured distrust of each other disappears as ice melts in the sunshine.

Referring to Marquis Yamagata's speech, the Kokumin hopes that His Excellency's assurances will be verified in practice; that the prison system will be placed on a good footing; that the administrative police will be satisfactorily organized and controlled; that impartiality and strict justice will always preside at the settlement of public questions between foreigners and Japanese; that difference of nationality will receive no recognition from the administrators of the laws, and that the practical evidence thus afforded of Japan's spirit will contribute not merely to the welfare of the foreigners residing within her borders, but also to her own credit among civilized nations.

Viscount Aoki's speech elicits only the brief comment that it truly interpreted the sentiment of the Japanese nation. Mr. Robison's words, however, receive fuller notice. The Kokumin reads them not as mere expressions of politeness, but as a genuine statement of the feelings by which foreigners are inspired, and of their faith in the good intentions of the Japanese Government, and rejoices to think that the clouds of doubt and distrust have been dispersed. With reference to the question of land tenure, to which Mr. Robison alluded, our contemporary declares that, speaking practically, superficialities differs from ownership in name only. The uncertainty and dissatisfaction evinced by foreigners on this subject would disappear if they understood the condition of Japan more accurately. Lord Charles Beresford also referred to this point, but the Kokumin did not appreciate the force of his remarks, for a superficiality is a form of land tenure which confers all the advantages of ownership except in the matter of terminology.

The Chairman of the International Committee has been criticised by a local contemporary because, in his speech at the banquet on the 10th instant, he "congratulated" the Japanese on the fact that they, first among Oriental nations, had obtained jurisdiction over Occidentals. He is accused of "insincerity," on the ground that his congratulations could not have been honest, and then the critic, with charming indifference to veracity, accuses him also of "professing to be highly delighted with the change." Mr. Robison had said that foreigners were "happy and contented" "under the old condition" and that they "did not readily want to change to something new and untried," yet, because he congratulated the Japanese on having recovered their autonomy, he is represented as having "professed himself highly delighted with the change." We have often heard the captain of a cricket or boating team, which has been beaten in a contest, congratulate his adversaries on their victory when proposing their health at a dinner, but we have never heard his congratulations interpreted as a profession of "high delight" at his own side's defeat. That is not criticism. It is bathos.

GERMANY'S PROCEEDINGS IN CHINA.

It is interesting to observe the effect which Germany's latest move in China produces upon the Chauvinistic element in Japan. Under ordinary circumstances politicians of that school strongly advocate a helpful attitude towards the Chinese Empire, and insist that Japan's duty is to aid in maintaining her neighbour's integrity. But when they see an European Power marching troops into Chinese territory and acquiring a position with large potentialities, the force of example dispels their magnanimous sentiments and inspires them with an almost irresistible longing to go and do likewise. Their conduct recalls the case of the historical Cornish parson, who exhorted his parishioners so vehemently to abstain from the sin of wrecking, and then slid down the banisters of his pulpit in order to get a fair start when the cry of "Ship ashore" disturbed his sermon. The Nippon actually seems to think that if Japan were true to her own interests, she would send troops to China at once, not to enforce the redress of any grievance, but simply for the sake of being in at the death. The Nichi Nichi, on the other hand, which occupies itself very industriously at present loading moral ballast into the Chauvinist hold, laughs these notions to scorn, and points out that Japan's position secures her effectually against being left behind in the race.

REVISED COMMERCIAL CODE.

It is announced in the Official Gazette that the Revised Commercial Code is to go into force from the 16th of June. For many obvious reasons it would have been advantageous to postpone the operation of this Code a year or two, but inasmuch as certain provisions of the Commercial Code now in force do not consist with the Revised Civil Code, the Authorities are doubtless well advised in replacing the former by the revised version as expeditiously as possible.

"A MOTHER OF THREE."

MR. W. G. BAYNE'S FAREWELL.

Mr. Bayne in his time has played many parts and played them well—as Shanghai and Yokohama can both testify; and now, at the full tide of his successes in Japan he returns to the scene of former histrionic triumphs bearing the many laurels so worthily won on the boards of the Public Hall. The large audience that gathered on Friday evening, April 7th, was a fitting tribute to his popularity, but the rounds upon rounds of applause that punctuated the performance testified to the excellence of all the players with whom he was associated. Yet, south to say, exuberantly funny as the "Mother of Three" is in many places, it is scarcely the kind of play that Messrs. Bayne and Read, or Mrs. Read and Mrs. McWilliams at their best. We say this in no carping mood, but simply from the vivid impressions of the many happy hours that these genuine actors and actresses have afforded us in the days gone by. We need not recapitulate them now; memory will long fondly linger about those pleasant evenings and will cherish their recollections and associations when the generation that now stands knocking at the gate will themselves have assumed "the motley" to "fret their little hour" upon the local stage.

"The Mother of Three" is a farce, pure and simple. Professor Murgatroyd, after six months of married life, is called away to the Quezique Observatory in Peru ostensibly to view a transit of Venus, but so absorbed is he in his scientific pursuits that instead of three months he stays eighteen years. His wife meanwhile has become a mother of triplets, but in the turmoil attending this event only the arrival of the first girl was cabled to him, and during the whole eighteen years the mother never had the courage to inform her husband of the full extent of his family. Consequently he imagines there is only one. The reader can easily imagine the complications ahead when the father returns at the close of his eighteen years of star-gazing. We need not detail further, beyond saying that all three girls are desperately anxious to be engaged, but always find that the non-production of a living father is a bar to the attainment of their desires. To help them out of the difficulty the devoted mother dons man's clothes to personate the father, but unfortunately does so the very day that Murgatroyd returns in disguise from Peru, and accordingly the funniest situations imaginable result.

Mrs. A. C. Read as Mrs. Murgatroyd was the life and soul of the piece and acted capitally. She was ably supported by her daughters—Miss Lloyd Thomas, Miss Poole, and Miss Morse—who were vivacious, pathetic, or girlishly despondent as the action of the farce demanded. Mrs. McWilliams was, of course, very good. Mr. A. C. Read, as the vagrant Professor, was decidedly clever, but we have seen him amid happier circumstances. Mr. Sharp as Soosa (the New Gal from the 'One) had a capital make up but was seen too infrequently. Mr. Parlett made a nice military lover, and Mr. Clayton a right excellent one in naval attire; while Mr. Plummer as Cheveloy Thrupp was inimitable. Mr. W. G. Bayne as Sir Wellington Port, the choleric but wife-driven Colonel of the Queen's Own Royal Rampers, was in his best style and carried off the honours with Mrs. Read.

As the curtain was rung down cries of "Bayne" arose from all parts of the house, and in the end the hero of the hour came before the curtain and made a brief valedictory speech in which he expressed the mingled pain and pleasure he felt that evening. He paid a high tribute to his fellow wearers of "the motley" and also testified to the high character of the work that they did in their ordinary paths of life. In bidding farewell to the Yokohama boards he could not help but feeling that he had trod them long enough to enable many younger "wearers of the buskin" to come before the public and continue the traditions of the house.

We give below the full programme:—
Professor Murgatroyd (of the Quezique Observatory, Peru) Mr. A. C. Read
Sir Wellington Port, K.C.B. (Commanding the Queen's Own Royal Rampers) Mr. W. G. Bayne.
Napier Ontem Port (his Nephew)
Mr. H. G. Parlett.
Captain Tuckle (H.M.S. "Gentle Gazelle") Mr. W. B. Clayton.
Cheveloy Thrupp Mr. I. Plummer.
Lady Port Mrs. McWilliams.
Soosa (the New Gal from the 'One)

Mr. H. J. Sharp.
Miss Lloyd Thomas.
Miss Poole.
Miss Morse.
Mrs. Murgatroyd Mrs. A. C. Read.

COLLISION BETWEEN JAPANESE AND CHINESE COOLIES.

THREE KILLED AND MANY WOUNDED.

On the 16th ultimo, at a sugar plantation about 5 or 6 ri from Honolulu, Hawaii, a collision occurred between Japanese and Chinese coolies. The Chinese have always been on bad terms with the Japanese, and disturbances have been of frequent occurrence. On the day preceding the affair some Chinese beat a number of Japanese. The feud thus begun was continued next day, when a large number of Japanese went to the boarding house where the Chinese lived and sought an explanation. The Chinese, however, refused to admit them and attacked them with knives, hoes, etc. Thereupon the Japanese determined on a assault and fought with any weapons that they could lay hold of, some of them snatching the arms from their enemies' hands. A severe fight lasting 10 minutes took place, the Japanese eventually destroying all the furniture, killing three Chinese, mortally wounding one, severely wounding sixteen, and slightly wounding 60. News was telephoned to the Police Station at Honolulu, and 50 or 60 police were soon on the spot, arresting 23 Japanese who were marked as ring-leaders. The Japanese Consulate also lent assistance.

THE LEOPOLD BANKRUPTCY.

Friday, April 7th, was appointed for the examination of Uyeda Yoshizo, ex banco of Charles Emil Leopold. Mr. Lowder and Mr. Walford appeared at the request of the Official Receiver (Mr. C. D. Moss), but the proceedings were private, the Press being excluded. The Bankruptcy Act of 1883 allows a very full discretion to the responsible officials in such cases. In cases where it is considered the ends of justice will be prejudiced by their presence even solicitors may be requested to withdraw, and the Court has of course even more warrant for excluding reporters. The witness Uyeda could be put on his oath, but in case he declined to answer questions and to afford information, no legal steps could be taken to compel him, unless grounds existed for a separate criminal action against him; in which case a Japanese Court would of course be the only proper authority. We understand that Uyeda did not appear, and that another attempt will be made to hold the examination next week. It is said, however, that Uyeda has been legally advised to decline information.

THE FOREIGN SETTLEMENTS—

It has occurred to the Keisai Zasshi—a periodical deservedly respected for the sake of its editor, Mr. TAGUCHI UKICHI—that the special privileges enjoyed by land-owners in the Settlements after the Revised Treaties go into operation will confer an unfair advantage on the foreigner in competition with the Japanese. The Settlements, qua Settlements, will, of course, cease to exist, but the lands held there under perpetual lease at a fixed yearly charge will remain on the old footing, and it is to this latter point that the Keisai Zasshi alludes. The editor's idea is that land hired or purchased by Japanese for business purposes will be much more costly than the land held by foreigners within the limits of the old Settlements, and that an element of unjust discrimination will thus be introduced. He regards the question as very important, much more important than many of the problems which now exercise the public mind, and he urges the necessity of adopting speedy measures to dispose of it. "What measures?" the reader will naturally ask. "The perpetual leases held by foreigners and the charges leviable upon their lands are fixed by treaty and cannot be altered." The Keisai Zasshi recognises that fully. Its project is very simple. "Buy out the foreign land-holders," it says, "and, should that prove too expensive an operation owing to their high estimate of the value of their lands, open as many new ports as possible, so that, by spreading over a large area the trade now centred at a few places, the special advantages enjoyed by the latter may be diminished, or altogether removed." Indeed, whether the buying-out method be resorted to or not, the Keisai is plainly of the opinion that its device of multiplying the number of open ports should be adopted as quickly as possible.

This is an interesting idea, and in discussing it the first question that suggests itself is, does the foreign land-holder really enjoy any advantage over his Japanese competitor in business, so far as public payments on account of his land are concerned? We might base the answer on a comparison of averages. We might say that whereas the average land tax paid by Japanese holders of urban lots throughout the Empire is 10.30 yen per acre, according to the newly determined rate—i.e. 5 per cent. of the land's taxable value—the tax paid by foreigners in Yokohama is 336 yen per acre. The foreigner, in short, pays thirty-three times as much as the Japanese. But averages are always unsatisfactory. They invite the retort, in this case, that the average payment of the Japanese urban land-holder can not properly be compared with the average payment of foreign land-holders in the Settlements, the latter being wealthier and very differently circumstanced.

Let us then pass from averages to the figures which would actually apply were the Settlements included in the general category of taxable land. When we do so, we find that the whole of the land in the foreign Settlement of Yokohama is valued at 894,000 yen for taxation purposes, and the ground rents now paid by the foreign leasees aggregate 36,068 yen. Were this land brought under the same fiscal system as that applied in the neighbouring Japanese town, the taxes leviable would be as follow:—

Imperial Land Tax (at 5 per cent. i.e. the new rate)	Yen. 44,930
Prefectural Land Tax	7,371
District Land Tax	3,175
Famine Relief Fund	607
House Tax	7,500
Total	63,583

A word of explanation is necessary here. Formerly the rate for the Imperial Land Tax was 2½ per cent. of the assessed value of the land, and it was enacted that the Local Land Taxes (i.e., the Prefectural and District Land Taxes) must not exceed one half of that amount. No distinction existed between urban and rural lands for purposes of taxation. Under the new system—passed by the Diet last session and applicable for a term of 5 years, commencing April 1st, 1899—rural lands are differentiated from urban, and the former now pay an Imperial Tax of 3.3 per cent., while the rate for the latter is 5 per cent. On the other hand, a special law was enacted by both Houses of the Diet in the same session, providing that the Local Land Taxes must remain unaffected by the change in the rates of the Imperial Tax. This statement will enable our readers to understand the system of taxation now in force. The next question that arises is, to what taxes, over and above the present ground rent, will foreigners be liable after July? So far as land tax of every kind is concerned, the answer is simple, for land tax, being payable by the landlord, is not chargeable to a lessee, whether temporary or perpetual. We presume that the foreign land-holders will also be exempt from the levy on account of famine relief, but they will probably have to pay the House Tax, and in that event their total payment will be 43,568 yen, whereas, were the special system abolished, their liabilities would aggregate 63,583 yen. It thus follows that the advantage conferred on them by the present system is 20,015 yen. But it is necessary to consider the other Settlements also. In Tokyo the assessed value of the Settlement is 91,171 yen, and the taxes leviable, if the special system were abolished, would be these:—

Imperial Land Tax	Yen. 4,558
City Land Tax	592
District Land Tax	276
House Tax	1,714
Total	7,140

On the other hand, the payments under the special system will be:—

Land Rents	Yen. 7,180
Total	8,894

The foreigners in Tsukiji would therefore derive an advantage of 1,734 yen by being placed on the same footing as the Japanese.

Let us now take Kobe's case. The land in the Settlement is valued at 198,160 yen, and the taxes payable under the general system would be:—

Imperial Land Tax	Yen. 9,908
Prefectural Land Tax	884
District Land Tax	990
Famine Relief Fund	15
House Tax	2,239
Total	14,112

Now the payments under the special system will be:—

Land Rents	Yen. 15,000
Total	17,239

Hence it appears that the Kobe community would gain 3,127 yen by being placed under the general system. If we group all these results together, it appears that, by abolishing the special system in the cases of Yokohama, Kobe, and Tokyo, foreigners would have to pay taxes aggregating 84,835 yen, whereas their payments under the special system will total 69,701 yen. Hence the total advantage conferred on them by the special system will be 15,134 yen annually. Does the editor of the Keisai Zasshi think that such a paltry sum constitutes any noticeable differentiation in favour of the foreigner, or that, for the sake of correcting an inequality so insignificant, the Government would be justified in resorting to the large measures advocated by him? It must be remembered that no compulsory expropriation of the foreign land-holders is possible. Their perpetual leases are guaranteed by treaty. They would have to be bought out with their own consent in order to abolish the special system, and that would be found a very costly operation if the State undertook it. As for the idea of establishing new ports, with the object of depreciating the value of property in the Settlements, it is exceedingly doubtful whether the expedient would have any success, in view of the facts that trade at the present ports is now established in fixed grooves, and that immense interests are concerned in keeping it there. At any rate such a device would necessitate the organization of customs houses at the newly opened ports, which would mean a large expenditure of public money.

There is another point which seems to have escaped the attention of the Keisai Zasshi: it is that though foreign land-holders in the Settlements are in a slightly better position than their Japanese neighbours with regard to taxation, the opposite is markedly true in the case of their Bluff lands. The land on which their hill residences are built pays 12 sen per tsubo annually—or 144 ren an acre—to the Imperial Government, which is certainly many times greater than the tax paid by the adjoining lands held by Japanese. We have no exact figures at present with regard to the Japanese lands, but the average for all rural lands throughout the empire is 4.33 ren per acre, and there is no reason to suppose that the hills surrounding the Foreign Settlements are rated above the general average. Their value for taxation purposes was fixed in 1873, and has remained unaltered ever since. Even supposing that they pay twice the general average, the tax on them would still be only one-sixteenth of that paid by the foreign Bluff-residents. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the total taxes defrayed by foreigners on all the land held by them under the special system, Settlement Lots and Hill Lots included, aggregate a considerably larger amount than the sum they would have to pay under the general Japanese system.

INTERNATIONAL BANQUET.

THE leading members of the International Committee of Yokohama are to be congratulated on the excellent tone of the speeches delivered by them at the dinner given to the Japanese Ministers of State on the 10th instant. Mr. R. D. ROBISON'S remarks were particularly happy. They evinced a spirit of friendliness and practicality which did credit to the speaker as well as to the Committee of which he is President, and which will doubtless be heartily welcomed by the Japanese nation as a proof that, however unwilling the foreign residents are to lose the jurisdiction of their own law courts, they are determined to accept the loss in good part, and to lend their aid in securing the smooth operation of the new system. Mr. ROBISON justly dwelt upon the entire reasonableness of the foreign community's attitude in the past. It is a natural tendency of sensible men to be content when they find themselves happy and secure, and to fight against changes which do not promise to bring any particular good and may possibly bring much evil. Justice to what this country had accomplished certainly impelled the majority of the foreign residents to recognise her right to judicial autonomy, but their natural and proper consideration for their own interests made them reluctant to take a step the consequences of which could not be estimated by any precedent. Mr. ROBISON put the case in a nut-shell when he said:—"However much Japan has achieved, she remains, after all, the very first Oriental nation which has obtained jurisdiction over Occidentals, and, while we heartily congratulate her on the fact, we ask her to remember that an absolutely unprecedented experiment of such magnitude could scarcely be viewed without some misgiving." Every reasonable Japanese must recognise the clear common sense of such a plea, and we have no doubt that these utterances by prominent members of the foreign community will confirm the conviction which calm observers must have acquired from the events of the past twenty years, namely, that the unsightly incidents of this great struggle, the incidents which often rendered it needlessly bitter and even passionate, were solely due to the fortuitous indiscretions and extravagances of over-zealous champions. Of course the future has much in store to test the good temper now shown by the community, but the existence of a body like the International Committee can not fail to smooth away many points of dangerous friction.

The speech of the Minister of Foreign Affairs was also most felicitous. His Excellency could hardly have chosen words more suitable to the occasion or better calculated to dispel any prejudices which may still linger in the minds of resident foreigners:—

"So far as my countrymen are concerned I can assure you that all classes of Japanese, even in remote parts of the Empire, will welcome you with open hearts, and join hands with you in all the various activities of life, and I sincerely trust that the foreign residents will not regard themselves in the future as strangers in a strange land, but, on the contrary, entrust with confidence their persons and property to the safe guarding of the Japanese authorities, that they will make Japan their home, and permanently reside here with their families."

There is nothing to be added to this language except an expression of sincere hope that Viscount AOKI'S promises may be fully justified by the event.

JAPAN M. E. CONFERENCE.

MONDAY, April 3RD.—The Treasurer and Statistical Secretary read his report showing an advance in self-support and a gain in membership over last year. Ten o'clock was the hour fixed for the election of delegate to the General Conference, and every member was in his seat.

Rev. J. Soper, D.D., received the unanimous vote of the Conference, and Rev. J. G. Cleveland was chosen reserve. Rev. Dr. Scott, Supt. of the Canadian Methodist Mission, and Professor Borden, fraternal delegate from the Methodist Church of Japan, were introduced and addressed the Conference. Bishop Cranston replied in a happy manner, remarking that some property matters kept Canada and the U.S.A. apart and that the dispute about fisheries was a scaly question. He expressed himself as heartily in sympathy with the proposition that all the branches of Methodism in Japan should unite in theological training.

In the Class Lists of the Cambridge Local Examinations in December last there are several names connected with Japan. Among the girls under 19 who have satisfied the Examiners are Miss N. von Fallot, Tokyo, distinguished in French, and Miss M. Lloyd, Tokyo, distinguished in drawing (at Herrington, Folkestone). Among the girls, between 16 and 18 who have passed as juniors, is Miss E. C. Evington, Nagasaki.

"TERRIBLE EARTHQUAKE" AT YOKOHAMA.

It may be within the recollection of our readers that an earthquake occurred a few weeks ago, and that some damage was done at Oauka and other places. At Yokohama the shock was so slight that nine out of ten persons did not feel it at all. Very little was made of the whole occurrence in the foreign papers published in Japan. But such a thing as an earthquake comes as a godsend to the yellow journals the other side of the Pacific, and, if it is not horrible enough in itself, it has to be made horrible. We give an example of this process of horror-manufacture—a perfect thing in its way—from a Vancouver paper. This is how the descriptive reporter commences:—

While the steamer Tacoma was steaming up the Japanese coast between Kobe and Yokohama on March 7th last she had a unique experience. About an hour after the Chinese waiters had cleared the breakfast tables as the vessel cut through the placid seas, a severe shock was felt which shivered the liner from her stem to the jack staff, and threw a number of those on board off their feet. The blow seemed to come from the starboard side, and shook things up considerably.

What had happened? The mendacious journalist knows his art too well to tell the reader immediately, and tantalises him with this pretty bit of padding:—

The engineer, who was standing in the passage way 'tween decks, was under the impression that it was his steel wards below that caused the shock—the shaft had broken he thought and his engines were racing—and with a, "I wonder what on earth's the matter with her," he sprang to the engine room door and slid down the steel companions to his unperturbed mechanism, which still revolved in the even tenor of its way and swung the big screw round. A quick inspection showed him that, notwithstanding the continued bumping—for the shock lasted 26 seconds—there was nothing wrong below; nothing was out of place and every rod and lever was working in its own appointed manner. The engineer then hurried on deck and reported that his shining mechanism was all intact, and the shaft had not been broken, or the propeller carried away. At the same time others arrived to say that she was not fast on any reef or other menace to navigation.

All this is what Pooh Bah called "corroborative detail, calculated to give verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative." The reader is finally informed that:—

The cause of the shock was a mystery until the next day, when on arrival at Yokohama it was found that the big shipping post was shrouded in a pall of smoke from surrounding fires. The cause was then evident. There had been a severe earthquake shock and it was the seismic disturbance at the ocean's bottom which caused the timbers and steel frames of the liner to vibrate until the rivets cried out. Although it shook up the vessel so, the submarine eruption had no effect on the sea. Instead of causing it to run in big confused waves the glasslike calmness remained unchanged.

The statement as to "Yokohama being shrouded in a pall of smoke from surrounding fires" is a triumph of the art of prevarication. San Francisco itself, even the New York Journal, could do no better. A career of splendid success in yellow journalism should lie before that talented young reporter of Vancouver. He adds casually:—

Yokohama suffered greatly from the disturbance, many of the bamboo built residences (!) coming down and taking fire. No fatalities were reported from that city, however.

Apparently some poor remnant of a conscience remains with the writer still, for he endeavours at the tail end of his sensational column to atone for some of his sins by saying:—

It cannot be called a very severe earthquake, but it was a wide-spread one.

Is it something in the air of the North American continent, or is it simply the buoyant animal spirits of these strong young communities, that brings about the production of such light-hearted fictions?

men, in the professions, in the arts, and as statesmen; and no thoughtful man could hide from himself that a change was bound to come. But, gentlemen, however much Japan has achieved, she remains after all the very first Oriental nation which has obtained jurisdiction over Occidentals. We heartily congratulate her on the fact, but we ask her to remember that an absolutely unprecedented experiment of such magnitude could scarcely be viewed without some misgiving. Well, the change has come. Treaty Revision is an accomplished fact, and practical men never refuse to acknowledge accomplished facts.—(Hear, hear). Therefore, the foreign residents who are above all practical men, accepting the fact, meet you to-night, and offer you their hearty congratulations on it. We ask for no special favours. As merchants we need good laws and strict order, stern impartiality, a fair field and no favour. Give us those, and we, again happy and contented, will work all the more willingly hand in hand with your people, to promote the true, the great prosperity of Japan.—(Applause.) Gentlemen, the Imperial Ministers of the State—may they be strong and wise.—(Applause.)

THE FOREIGN MINISTER'S SPEECH.

Viscount AOKI, Minister of Foreign Affairs, replied. After expressing regret at his inability to make an extempore speech in English, he asked permission to read his remarks, which were as follows:

In the first place I desire to thank you most sincerely for this entertainment to which you have honoured us with invitations, and which we gladly accepted because we felt sure that it was not an ordinary banquet, but rather a happy augury of the new era of our international intercourse, which will have the effect of making the relations between Japan and the treaty powers still more cordial and intimate.—(Hear, hear.) I need hardly point out to you that the exceptional state of these relations in the past and even now to some extent no doubt are due to the difference in the ways of the East and West. But now that these difficulties have, I am happy to say, been, politically and legally at least, paved over, I look forward with much pleasure and confidence to the time when you and my countrymen will assimilate with each other in all matters, social, commercial, and otherwise.—(Hear, hear.) I understand that you have been in direct communication with the committees of the Association for Investigating Matters concerning the New Treaties. I trust you have acquired such information and assistance from them as you desired. It is such direct communication that I earnestly recommend not in these matters alone, but in all other directions.—(Applause.) Moreover I feel confident that such a gathering as this cannot fail to create that feeling of sympathy and mutual confidence which are so essential to intimate and friendly relations.—(Hear, hear.) So far as my countrymen are concerned I can assure you that all classes of Japanese, even in remote parts of the Empire, will welcome you with open hearts, and join hands with you in all the various activities of life.—(Hear, hear.)—and I sincerely trust that the foreign residents will not regard themselves in the future as strangers in a strange land.—(Hear, hear.)—but on the contrary, entrust with confidence their persons and property to the safeguarding of the Japanese authorities, that they will make Japan their home, and permanently reside here with their families. Gentlemen, I propose to drink the health of the foreign residents of Japan.—(Loud applause.)

THE BUSINESS TAX.

The Japanese guests having duly honoured this toast, Mr. HOLM responded to the invitation of the Chairman, and spoke in German, his remarks being afterwards ably translated into Japanese by Mr. Ariga.

Eure Excellenzen, Geehrte Herren!

Mir ist der ehrenvolle Auftrag geworden, einen Toast auszubringen auf die Herren des Comité der "Joyaku Jishu Kenkinkwai," einer Vereinigung mit dem dem Zweck, Fragen in Verbindung mit den neuen Verträgen zu studieren.

Um die Geschichte unserer Beziehungen zu der genannten Gesellschaft kurz zusammenzufassen, so erkannten wir nach Gründung unseres Internationalen Comité eine unserer Hauptaufgaben darin, passende Verbindungen anzuknüpfen, um etwaige Wünsche oder Vorschläge rücksichtlich der zu erwartenden neuen Verhältnisse auch in massgebenden und sonst einflussreichen Kreisen bekannt geben zu können. Es war uns denn sehr willkommen in dem Tokio Comité eine Vereinigung zu finden, welche Ziele gewissermassen analog den unsrigen verfolgt, und welche gleichzeitig unter ihre Mitglieder Persönlichkeiten zählt, die in eminenten Weise bei Bestimmung der neuen Gesetze, und in mancher anderer Hinsicht mitgewirkt haben.

In Folge einer Zusammenkunft von Deputationen beider Comité in Tokyo, wobei die Japanischen Herren sich gerne bereit erklärten, uns in unseren Zwecken zu unterstützen, haben wir denselben seiner Zeit verschiedene Fragen von allgemeiner Wichtigkeit unterbreitet, und auch einige interessante Antworten bekommen, welche wir entsprechend dem Ruf der Herren, deren Ansichten sie eben darstellen, würdigen.

Was uns seiner Zeit ganz besonders am Herzen lag, und was auch während der eben erwähnten Zusammenkunft in Tokyo eingehender erörtert wurde, war die Kapitalsteuer, d. h. die Art und Weise, wie das in Japan zu versteuernde Kapital von fremden Corporationen, Banken, Versicherungsgesellschaften u. s. w. bestimmt werden sollte. Diese Frage ist inzwischen von der Kaiserlichen Regierung in liberaler, und wie es scheint, allgemein zufriedenstellender Weise gelöst worden durch entsprechende Aenderung der betreffenden Gesetzparagraphe, und ich möchte der Hoffnung Ausdruck geben, dass künftighin etwa auftauchende Schwierigkeiten, nun ebenso liberal und ebenso prompt aus dem Wege geräumt werden.

Gleichzeitig hoffe ich, dass wir auch ferner der Unterstützung des Tokyo-Comité zur Förderung ähnlicher Zwecke versichert sein dürfen.

In diesem Sinne bitte ich Sie, meine Herren, zu trinken auf das Wohl der Mitglieder des Comité der Joyaku Jishu Kenkinkwai, und auf festes und gedeihliches Zusammenarbeiten desselben mit unserem Internationalen Comité, und einzustimmen ein dreifaches kräftiges Hoch—

Sie leben Hoch—Hoch—Hoch!

TRANSLATION.

Your Excellencies and gentlemen.—It has fallen to my lot to propose the toast of the Gentlemen of the Committee of the Joyaku Jishu Kenkinkwai, an association established for the purpose of studying questions in connection with the new treaties.

To give a short résumé of the history of our relations with the said association, we recognized after the foundation of our International Committee, as one of our chief tasks, the necessity of forming suitable connections, in order to be able to make known possible wishes or proposals regarding the anticipated new relations, in competent and otherwise influential circles. We were therefore very much pleased to find in the Tokyo Committee an association, which follows ends practically analogous to our own, and which has among its members individuals who have been eminently connected with, or otherwise been active in the framing of the new laws. In consequence of meeting of deputations of both Committees in Tokyo, at which Japanese gentlemen declared themselves willing to support us in our ends, we proposed to them at the time several questions of importance, and we have received some interesting answers, which we value the more on account of the standing of the gentlemen whose views they represent.

What we had especially at heart, and what was also talked over in detail during the meeting at Tokyo, just mentioned, was the capital-tax, i. e. the manner in which the capital of foreign corporations, banks, insurance companies, etc., to be taxed in Japan, would be determined. This question has since been solved by the Imperial Government in a liberal spirit and evidently to the general satisfaction, by the amendment of the respective paragraphs of the law, and I would express the hope that difficulties, perhaps appearing in the future, will be cleared away in the same liberal spirit and with the same promptitude. At the same time I hope that we may be assured for the future also of the support of the Tokyo Committee in the solution of similar problems.

In this sense, I ask you, gentlemen, to drink to the health of the members of the Committee of the Joyaku Jishu Kenkinkwai, and to the future friendly co-operation of the same with our own International Committee.

JAPAN'S FRIENDSHIP FOR THE FOREIGNER.

Mr. MEGATA, of the Finance Department, was without previous notice called upon for a speech, and made the following impromptu remarks in English:—

Gentlemen, I have great pleasure in rising and thanking you for this invitation to be present at this assembly. Such a social gathering as this is full of great stimulus. I believe it is a happy prelude to the still greater future to come.—(Applause.) Gentlemen, such a social gathering as this is an augury of the extension of the happy friendship already existing. Japan has now not only opened her doors, she has opened her bosom to receive all her friends.—(Hear, hear.) She is ready to enter into a new era of things. I believe she is ready now, because it has taken forty years for the preparation. There is still one thing further, and that is the interest of her commerce. A closer friendship will develop commerce, and commerce will strengthen the ties of friendship already happily existing. In closing my speech let me say that our wishes to strengthen the happy friendship already existing are as wide and deep as the seas surrounding this Empire.—(Loud applause.) We drink to the interest of our commerce and our future friendly amity.—(Cries of "Bravo!" and applause.)

RELATIONS OF THE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

Mr. KNAFF next spoke in French, the following being a translation of his address:

Messieurs les présidents et membres des chambres de commerce de Tokyo et Yokohama—Messieurs, our respective chambers work for a common end, the commercial prosperity of Japan. Although up to the present they have not been very extended, the relations between your chambers and ours have been marked with the greatest cordiality. Soon, in consequence of the new régime, we shall come together in closer intimacy and our communication the one with the other will be more frequent. Already, quite recently our Chamber has had the honour to submit to your judgment the project of an Arbitration Committee and a proposal for a form of contract to regulate transactions between buyers and sellers. Without doubt this important subject will have your fullest consideration. Other questions may arise in the course of events, and the International Committee will again have in the future to consult you sometimes and to submit to you various projects with the object of securing a good understanding between Japanese and foreigners. This Committee is assured of your friendly cooperation, which will lead to the solution of all questions in the manner most satisfactory for our common interests. The Committee will be happy to consider with the utmost attention all requests for information and all propositions which you may wish to bring before it. Gentlemen, I propose in drink to the prosperity of the Chambers of Commerce of Tokyo and Yokohama, to the health of the members, and particularly to the health of their honourable Presidents, Messrs. Shibusawa Eiichi and Otani Kahei, both well known and both greatly esteemed by the foreigners of this port.—(Applause.)

MR. SHIBUSAWA'S SPEECH.

Mr. SHIBUSAWA EIICHI, Chairman of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, was the next speaker. He said:—

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN:—I think it a great honour to attend this grand banquet this evening in virtue of my capacity as member of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce. Of the operation of the new treaties, both the Minister of State and the Chairman have spoken. The revision of those treaties is the result of long years of labour, and the nationals of the Treaty Powers and the diplomatists residing here in Japan have contributed largely to the solution of the matter. Many vicissitudes have been passed through, and many obstacles have had to be surmounted. In view of the new treaties coming into operation from July, you have shown great wisdom in organizing to discuss the matter. We ourselves are engaged in investigation and discussion in connection with it, and the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce and other associations are pursuing their own enquiries. What we most aspire to is that foreigners and Japanese should come into as close contact as possible. Though we have long carried on commerce with Treaty Powers and have made progress in every direction with their assistance, yet there has been a tendency to hold aloof from one another, and this is to be attributed, I may safely assert, to the barriers that interfere with the complete freedom of foreign trade on account of the old defective treaties. However, these barriers, thanks to the efforts of foreign and Japanese statesmen, are about to be removed, and I can not but express my satisfaction—and I take the liberty of believing that all the gentlemen present are satisfied too. The responsibility devolving upon us is very serious. It is like making a garden or building a house. By whatever master-hand a garden may be laid out or a house built, the former will not be bright with flowers without the aid of competent gardeners, and the latter will be desolate without proper persons to occupy it. Just so with us. We are the gardeners and you the tenants. We must co-operate in union and harmony so as to secure prosperity. I thank you for your kind invitation to myself this evening.

A COSMOPOLITAN PLATFORM.

MR. OTANI KAKKI spoke in Japanese, his remarks being afterwards rendered into English by Mr. Okada as follows:—Our commerce has been greatly developed since the last four decades, and it is from you that we have derived inspiration in our commercial development, and therefore we want to express our warmest gratitude to you. We now approach the happy time in which the new treaties will come into operation, and Japan may be said to be thus regenerated. It is, however, a matter of great regret to find the actual condition of our commerce and industry is not perfectly known abroad. Not long ago a narrow exclusive commercial system prevailed in our country, but even the shadow of that has disappeared among our business men. We all stand by this time on a cosmopolitan platform, and I am very glad to say that this state of feeling is predominant throughout the country.—(Hear, hear.) I believe the new treaties will be received favourably by you, and so I have not the slightest fear but that they will be a success, since you and we will work together in their support. It would also be desirable that the Chambers of Commerce, both Japanese and foreign, should co-operate together in the benefit of Yokohama and of the Empire in general.—(Hear, hear)—and of the world.—(Laughter and hear, hear.) We trust that this meeting may become a bright landmark in the history of Japan's trade relations with the world and a strong link in our intercourse with you. Before closing, I beg, on behalf of the Committee of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, to tender the profoundest thanks for the cordiality with which you have received us this evening.—(Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then announced that their Excellencies had to retire to catch the train, and the gathering broke up.

VIEWING THE CHERRY BLOSSOM.

(BY THE MAN WHO VIEWED IT.)

I have "viewed the cherry blossom," according to the Japanese formula. I remember well the impression that phrase made on my mind in days when, long before I ever cast eyes on Japan, I sometimes picked up a book of impressions about voyages in the East. There was something in it that calmed and soothed, something naive, pastoral, Arcadian in its simplicity. It lent colour to the rhapsodical figments of Mr. Hearn and Sir Edwin Arnold. When one read of the annual pilgrimages of the simple-souled, nature-loving Japanese to the cherry groves, one began to think that after all Sir Edwin's description of them as "birds and butterflies" rather than common place men and women might be substantially true. One pictured them, happy but not indecorously merry, walking demurely through the leafy avenues, stopping with delight before a specially lovely spray of bloom, lost in artless admiration over every seeming trifle, smiling over the flutations of a pair of sparrows, and moved to gentle tears over the decease of a black beetle. No thought or care beyond that, as if foreign complications, debt collectors, unpeppable editors, babies, rates and taxes, Chinese questions, dressy wives, and importunate tailors did not exist. It was a pleasant vision, and made one long to burst the links of habit and wander far away from the stress of the home country to seek eternal repose in this happy Land of the Rising Sun.

Residence in Japan has destroyed all those pleasant visions created by the "gush" of the literary globe-trotter. One can not live long in Japan without discovering that the people are neither birds nor butterflies—but human, very human indeed—and that the country itself is neither Fairyland nor Lotusland; at least, if it is, then Lotusland and Fairyland are not, as Huck Finn would say, "what they've been cracked up to be." But still one clung to the idea that the Japanese people felt almost a religious affection for the cherry bloom, and that the excursions to view it were tinged with a species of nature-worship. I will give my own experience of one of these expeditions.

A small party of us—three or four foreigners—had an invitation to attend a "cherry blossom viewing meeting at the garden north of Hasehaya, Mukojima, Tokyo," on Sunday. (I am quoting the translation of the invitation ticket). It was a sort of festival in connection with the firm of Meidiya, the great Japanese agents of the Kirin Brewery Company, and a very large number of sub-agents and employees were entertained in these pleasant grounds. How the majority of the guests—there must have been two or three thousand—got there I cannot pretend to say. Our own adventures were quite thrilling enough to monopolize our attention. We started from Yokohama bright and early, and arrived at Tokyo without anything remarkable occurring, beyond the train arriving punctually. A jinrikisha ride of about three-quarters of an hour followed, but that was not particularly adventurous to people used to Tokyo roads, though I can well imagine it appearing in the light of a most desperate undertaking to infants like Stanley or Dr. Peters, used only to the comparatively well-kept thoroughfares of Equatorial Africa. We were finally deposited at a tea-house somewhere down by the river, whence it had been arranged we should travel by boat. But something had gone wrong. The tide had been ill-natured enough not to rise sufficiently for the steam tug to come so far up the river, and there lay our sampans on a luxurious bed of mud, looking quite hopeless as a means of conveyance. We felt a little discouraged, but a most amiable Japanese gentleman received us effusively, and comforted us by saying that the cherry blooms were lovely, and that the night would be splendid. That revived our spirits. We felt that any sacrifice and any inconvenience would be cheap if they enabled us to view those cherry blooms.

Our mission in life, we all agreed, was to view the cherry blooms, and we would view them, whatever should befall. We had all seen cherry blooms before, of course—they are in plenty in Yokohama. But we had never "viewed" them, which is quite a different thing. We waited half-an-hour, an hour, and still the steam-tug did not arrive, though the sampans were gradually lifted off the mud by the rising tide. But evil, like good, is never unmixed, and I am sure we all felt unfeigned satisfaction at the pleasure our presence gave to the youth of the neighbourhood. The aborigines of this part of the river-side seldom, I believe, see foreigners at close quarters, and the interest with which they regarded us was most flattering, if a little embarrassing. Each of us was followed by a small army of human odds and ends, from hobbled boys of nineteen to miles of four or five, with still smaller miles on their backs—on the principle of "flea with other fleas to bite 'em." The sumai of waiting was tiresome, but the hope of viewing the cherry blossom was strong within us, and we were sustained by it.

At length even the patience of the Japanese was exhausted, and the gallant skipper of the party decided to make a move. We all embarked on the sampans, and the Europeans, at any rate, thought that now it really would not be long before the viewing commenced. After all steam was not indispensable; a sampan row would be rather longer, but pleasanter, and with brisk oarsmanship we should arrive before the trees had finished blooming. But, alas for our lack of understanding! That "brisk oarsmanship" was merely a suggestion of the restless European mind; Japanese on a holiday don't trouble about briskness. We soon found that the Captain had determined to follow a policy of drift. Our sampans, lashed together, like—to take an appropriate simile—"a double cherry, seeming parted, but yet a union in partition,"—went off gallantly down the river at the reckless speed of at least 500 yards an hour. The Sumida was full of craft—some were soulless trading junks and others boats with parties of cherry-viewers like ourselves, besides the regular steamboats—and we had some very lively times in bumping against one another. It made one regret one's imperfect knowledge of Japanese when one heard the language from another boat as ours serenely straddled across its bows. The expressions certainly did not lack vigour, point, or picturesqueness. There were many slow craft there, but none so slow as ours. Even a floating hay rack, propelled by a solemn-looking old lady in spectacles, beat us easily; would pass us, wait for us to come abreast again, and then shoot ahead once more with the velocity—compared with our pace—of an ocean greyhound.

Meanwhile some of us were looking out for the blossoms, and one of the visitors—a perfect Diogenes who had rolled out of his tub "on the wrong side" that morning, as the phrase is—looked it rather ill that there were none so far. "He came to view the cherry blossom. Where was it? He didn't come out for a picnic on a raft, &c., &c." Bridge after bridge was passed, but still no cherries, and no promise of them. One might as soon expect to see cherries in the squalid back part of Lambeth, in the darkest corner of black-browed Leeds or Manchester, as in that region of the Sumida River.

The Japanese on board shared none of this foolish impatience. It was plainly their ideal of a holiday to float down a muddy river at the rate of a quarter of a mile an hour, eating sweetmeats, drinking sake, and smoking cigarettes. The enjoyment of the cherry blossom would only be heightened by the delay. Great are always the pleasures of anticipation.

And now the horrors of famine rose before the forlorn foreigners. A tiffin had been part of the programme of the viewing, and tiffin time was long past. A horrible thought began to occur to all, though at first none dared confess it even to himself: "Suppose the others have got there before us and eaten it all." There might be no restaurant within miles of the cherry groves, and if the tiffin had been all despatched then the prospect was a frightful one. The thought made the stoutest heart among us quail, and blanched the ruddiest cheek. At length our Diogenes gave voice to the general feeling, and openly broached the hideous suggestion. He treated the matter in a very lofty vein. "Such a thing," he said, "was highly injudicious so near the advent of mixed residence. It was not wise—it was not politic—on the part of the Japanese people and Government. He wished to be understood as speaking without any desire to intimidate or show unfriendly feeling towards the authorities, but he would point out that hunger was the main cause of the lamentable excesses of the French Revolution," &c. The rest of us had more fortitude. Our waistcoats were hanging limp, our eyes lacked lustre, and now and then one of us would regard a plump Japanese boy with a hideous suggestion of cannibalism in his glance. But the thought of the cherries gave us new life and hope.

Everything must have an end, and even that sampan voyage finished at last. After very nearly heading into a boat-race—for a regatta was being held on the river—we sailed serenely past long rows of cherry trees, which we could see quite plainly, but there was nothing remarkable in that. We had "seen" plenty before; what we wanted was to "view" them. And at last we disembarked at a field where there were a few booths, a refreshment stall or two, and the Japanese equivalents for milky cocoanuts, all the fun of the fair, raree shows, and so forth. It was, allowing for the changes inspired by the genius loci, a small Hampstead Heath at Bank Holiday time. There were really no cherry blossoms to view, and if there had been I don't believe anybody wanted to view them. They were hundreds intent on Kirin beer, which quite overshadowed all Japanese drinks in popularity; there were other hundreds watching the performances of trim little geisha attired in dresses of colours no ordinarily modest rainbow would have dared to assume; they were yet other hundreds listening to the patter of two comedians who appeared to be the exact counterpart of the comic Irishmen in the home music halls. But I didn't see a soul viewing the cherry blossoms. To the eternal credit of the Japanese, they had not eaten all the lunch, and we were treated so hospitably that even the cynicism of our Diogenes melted into most expansive geniality. By the time lunch was over it was time to return. I made a feeble ineffectual attempt to achieve the object of my journey, and asked a Japanese gentleman when the viewing would commence, and whether it was likely to take long. He only laughed, and said that was "the Cherry Blossom Viewing Meeting" to which our cards of invitation referred. That all, indeed!

And so another illusion is gone. Child-like delight in nature, and all that kind of thing, means, then, just an ordinary Bank Holiday outing. At least, in this case it did; our experience may have been exceptional. But I am sure the very last thing those Japanese thought about on Sunday was the beauty of nature and the glory of the cherry-blossom; they were much more intent on enjoying themselves—people do in other parts of the world, and would have enjoyed themselves just as much if there had been nothing but dandelions and dockleaves, instead of cherries, at Mukojima. We went home wiser and sadder men, albeit otherwise well satisfied with a very pleasant day's outing. After all it was much more enjoyable than simple plain "viewing" would have been.

Chicago will have the honor of sending the first Episcopal minister to Puerto Rico. Bishop McLaren has appointed Rev. George B. Platt, Chicago diocese, to that island. He will leave for the West Indies to take up his new duties about March 1, and will work under the personal instruction of Bishop McLaren and establish missions and schools in all large settlements on the islands.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"FORM OF CONTRACT."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Your memorandum in yesterday's Mail is liable to be misconstrued by your readers, and appears to be written under a misapprehension of the general usages of trade that govern such contracts.

In the first place I would point out that the proposed Form of Contract being still before the Chambers of Commerce of Tokyo and Yokohama for their decision, therefore the matter is sub judice. No doubt this had escaped your notice, or I am sure you would not have prejudiced your Japanese readers by your remarks against the terms of the proposed Form of Contract before the decision of those Chambers could be given. That you may understand better what the usages of trade are on such matters I enclose extracts from the Conditions of Sale upon the Lyons and Zurich markets—conditions which you will please remark are drawn up and agreed to by buyers themselves, and which present points of interest that may be compared with the form proposed by the Committee of our Chamber of Commerce.

The principle underlying each is the same, viz., that the buyer, having special facility for disposing of a certain class of merchandise at a profit, requests the so-called seller to import on commission goods that the latter would not have imported on his own account and risk. As expressed in Article IV. of the Lyons conditions, and Article VI. of those of Zurich, such transactions are dependent upon the bond fide of either party, and the responsibility of the seller is limited accordingly.

EXTRACTS OF THE "USAGES DE COMMERCE."

Codification des usages de la place de Lyon pour la vente des soies asiatiques en mer, et sur les marchés d'origine.

Art. IV.—RECONNAISSANCE DE LA MARCHANDISE ET DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES.—Les affaires en mer, ou traitées sur ordres directs, sont considérées comme des affaires bond fide, et, en principe, elles ne comportent pas de laisser pour compte. Un refus ne peut être examiné et admis que dans le cas de transformation de la marchandise, ou d'erreur manifeste, et alors le vendeur est tenu au remplacement dans un délai de 15 jours, ou, en cas d'impossibilité constatée, à une indemnité équitable. Par contre l'acheteur est tenu également à accepter le remplacement par une marchandise répondant aux termes du contrat agréé par lui, ou, à défaut, déterminée par des arbitres. La reconnaissance de la marchandise traitée doit être faite dans les huit jours qui suivent l'arrivée, tant pour les soies vendues pour livraison immédiate que pour celles vendues avec prompt.

Art. V.—RABAIS.—Si la marchandise ne ressort pas à la classification stipulée, elle peut donner lieu à un rabais.

Art. IX.—NAUFRAGES ET AUTRES RISQUES DE MER.—En cas de naufrage et autres risques de mer, le contrat de vente se trouve annulé purement et simplement.

Art. VIII.—BALLES AVARIÉES.—Les balles avariées doivent être acceptées avec la bonification résultant de l'expertise officielle, qui doit être communiquée à l'acheteur.

Art. X.—ERREURS TÉLÉGRAPHIQUES.—Dans le cas où une dépêche tronquée ou perdue aurait impliqué la conclusion d'un contrat erroné, le vendeur n'est tenu à l'exécution de ce contrat que dans la mesure dans laquelle il peut le faire sans perte matérielle pour lui. Par contre l'acheteur n'est tenu à prendre livraison que de ce qu'il a commandé.

(Copy.)—USAGES DE ZURICH POUR LE COMMERCE DES GREGES ASIATIQUES.

Art. V.—Les contrats passés pour soie "en mer" ou sur ordre direct sont sujets aux principes établis dans les Articles VI. et XI.

Art. VI.—Ce genre de contrat est considéré tout spécialement comme affaire de confiance, et l'engagement du vendeur est ainsi limité. Une réclamation n'est admissible que si la soie diffère sensiblement du classement promis. L'acheteur n'a pas le droit de prouver la soie, à moins qu'une grave négligence de la part du commissionnaire ne puisse être constatée. Mais en cas d'une infirmité prononcée, un rabais équitable peut être réclamé en jugeant les soies désignées par un "chop." L'époque de l'embarquement doit être prise en considération. Aucune réclamation autre que celle basée sur des défauts extérieurement visible n'est admise, et tout droit de réclamation échoit trois jours après réception de la marchandise.

Art. VII.—Si par suite d'une dépêche tronquée ou perdue un faux contrat a été conclu, le vendeur n'est tenu de le maintenir que jusqu'au point de ne pas subir une perte matérielle, mais l'acheteur a le droit d'accepter l'affaire telle qu'elle a été conclue en réalité.

Art. IX.—L'acheteur doit accepter les balles avariées avec la bonification officiellement constatée et accordée.

As to quality Article VI. Zurich is even less favourable to the buyer than Article VII. of the Yokohama proposed conditions, as only a material difference in quality is ground for an allowance, while an absolute refusal of the goods can only be based upon "gross negligence" on the part of the seller, and the limit of time within which a claim can be preferred is only three days. The seller has further advantage under Article VII. Zurich, which exonerates him from actual loss arising from telegraphic errors and irregularities. Your concluding paragraph is specially liable to produce friction at the present moment. It is not a question of the "Foreign" seller versus the "Japanese," but for all sellers, amongst whom are quite a number of Japanese, and the terms proposed are based upon the mature consideration of those most experienced in the working of the import trade, and are for the consideration of men whose knowledge of the trade will enable them to judge if the conditions proposed are acceptable or otherwise. Finally the buyer is in no way compelled to accept the terms; if they don't please him, he is quite at liberty not to make the contracts, but to import the goods himself.

Yours truly, R. D. ROBISON.

MORAL STANDARDS OF EAST AND WEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I came to Japan in 1872. I was then, memento juvat, 20 years old, less 5 months. During a nearly uninterrupted stay of 27 years in this country, I have extensively travelled North, South, East and West, on business or pleasure, visited, Sendai included, hundreds of towns and villages; lodged in as many Japanese hotels, not always of the best class, sometimes my funds not allowing of it. I am not an American Missionary, but I have never yet been favoured with any, not a single one, of the proposals or incitements mentioned by Mr. E. C. Fry, in your correspondence column of the 3rd inst. I must add that I have met with quite the reverse in each of the three lodging houses I had the pleasure to remain in during a short sojourn, years ago, in one of the principal towns of the U.S.A.

Enclosing my card, I am Sir, Yours faithfully, CONTRARIA CONTRARIIS CUMANTUR.

AMATEUR THEATRICALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Now that "our leading local comedian" has "fretted his hour upon the stage" and is about to leave these scenes, one can hardly refrain from expressing appreciation of his energetic and probably well-intentioned efforts to enliven our existence in Yokohama, which is too often (and sometimes unjustly) condemned as being devoid of amusement, and consequently "intolerably dull." Many residents who (like myself) have not the pleasure of Mr. Bayne's acquaintance, owe him a debt of gratitude for the enjoyable entertainments which he and his able assistants have so good-naturedly provided for our delectation, and, seeing that a "merry heart doeth good like a medicine," Mr. Bayne can indeed lay good claim to being a public benefactor. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Bayne's sin is not setting in its full glory, for the undercurrent of adverse criticism, which has always been more or less in evidence, has received additional impetus from recent events, until now several of us do not hesitate to openly express our disgust at the manifestly lowering tendency of our local stage.

A few years ago an entertainment on behalf of a Missionary Hospital concluded with a "farce" by our local Theatians, and a feeble protest was then raised against the plethora of expletive oaths and "swear-words" with which the gentlemen actors adorned their parts. It was unfortunate that their natural courtesy did not suggest that an entertainment for a semi-religious charity should be kept as free as possible from such violations of commonplace propriety,—but the protest in question was quenched by a retort from "our leading local comedian," who pointed out that such entertainments were not provided for Christians, and therefore such "hypercritical and supersensitive" persons had better stay at home. It is to be hoped the advice was followed, for our Yokohama comedians practise the teachings of the sixth-rate music-hall favourite, who argued that there was nothing like a few good oaths to liven things up a bit when the interest flagged, and that to be a good actor one must necessarily be a good swearer. True, at the other end of the professional life we have Sir Henry Irving, with studious courtesy and artistic discretion, substituting (whenever possible) mild expletives in the place of the oaths, etc., which figure in the role, so as to avoid offending the "supersensitive" element in his audiences,—but our local actors know better than to pander to such weakness, and even favour us with a few of their own, when the playwright has been sparing with "sulphurous epithets," etc.

But perhaps custom would gradually inure us to taking our wives, daughters, and lady friends to the Public Hall to hear language which we hope they hear nowhere else if that were the only objectionable feature of our local dramatic entertainments, but when swearing is accompanied by "questionable" behaviour and when divorce courts, the embarrassment of a mother attending the birth of triplets, and (worst of all) ladies dressed in men's attire are freely discussed and paraded "coram populo" it is surely time to put the brake on, so that we can stop to look round for that "line" which "must be drawn somewhere,"—before we get quite down to the demoralizing level of a Chicago or Whitechapel Music Hall.

Our departing "wearer of the buskin" may feel flattered by the accounts of the rush and clamorous excitement over the booking of seats for last Friday's entertainment, but let his pride be moderated by the fact that the character of the "plot," and the prospect of beholding an amateur actress in male attire, had almost as much attraction as the "farewell" nature of the performance. Let his confidants take encouragement from the same fact, for, although they are losing their able chief, they may still attract enthusiastic audiences by judicious management.

Those prudes who insist that theatre-going is essentially demoralizing certainly have their arguments forcibly illustrated by such performances as those we have seen recently, but can we not again reverse the tables, and prove the contrary? How about the good old days of a decade or so ago, when the "Pirates of Penzance," "Box and Cox," "Patience," "Pinafore," "Trial by Jury," "Overland Route" the inimitable "Sorcerer," and similar performances by local amateurs not only filled the house for one night, but had to be repeated or even given three times, before the enthusiastic public were satisfied. After those performances one went home with aching sides, and a fund of innocent amusement which gave renewed life and energy to the little wit and humour we already possessed, whereas these discussions of divorces, triplet-births, etc., only harmonize with the already demoralizing atmosphere of the place, and give food for unwholesome thought to those who like myself are dubbed

Yokohama, 10th April, 1899.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Bank of Japan has again lowered its rate of interest. Its new figures range from 1.7 sen to 2.1 sen daily; that is to say, from 6.205 to 7.065 per cent. annually.

According to the Shogyo Shampo, telegrams have been received in Tokyo announcing that the mulberry trees in the south of France have suffered severely from frost; that silk culture will be delayed in consequence, and that the crop will be more or less short.

Telegrams received from Seoul seem to indicate that the trouble in Korea has been settled. The troops despatched to the disturbed district have returned, their presence not being required, and it would appear that the dimensions of the disorder were much smaller than rumour represented them to be.

It appears certain that Mr. Tsuzuki has resigned the post of Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, and that he will be succeeded by Mr. Akabane. Some friction between the Minister and the Vice-Minister is the cause of the change, but the exact nature of the difficulty is not public property.

Viscount de Labry and his bride (née Miss Divers) left Tokyo on Tuesday, en route for France. They expect to spend a few months in Europe before returning to Japan, where the Viscount will resume his post as Military Attaché to the Legation of France. A large number of persons, Japanese and foreign, assembled at Shimbarhi to bid them farewell.

The new Japanese torpedo destroyer Shinonome arrived at Hongkong from London, on April 2nd, on her way to Japan.

The landed property at Canton of Kang Yu-wei was seized by the local Government under orders from Peking and was sold, but the purchasers have been told to await further instructions before entering into possession.

H.M.S. Narcissus, which left Hongkong on Saturday, April 1st, for Singapore and home, returned to harbour on the morning of April 2nd, owing to the bursting of a discharge pipe. The water got into her coal bunkers, and it may be necessary to discharge her coal.

The German cruiser Ilia is expected on the China station shortly. She is a new cruiser recently built in Germany to replace the old cruiser Ilia, which foundered in Chinese waters some three years ago. The cruiser Hirthe, which is now in Genoa dock, is also expected.

The Chinese Government is considering the advisability of opening Chang-sha, Siang-tan, and Chang-teh to foreign commerce.

The Americans found amongst the dead at Malolos—which was taken on April 1st—a prominent Filipino named Sandico, who was for some time engaged in the cycle business in Hongkong. Malolos was found to be a regular charnel house. As the Filipinos were driven back from Manila, they carried back their dead and wounded, and hundreds of unburied corpses were found at Malolos.

The construction by Russians of a road leading into Chinese territory has already been reported. A despatch received in Tokyo from a European source says that Russian soldiers, numbering 300, have entered Chinese territory.

A Washington despatch dated the 12th inst. states, says the Chuo, that the ratifications of the Peace Treaty between America and Spain were exchanged at Washington on the 11th inst.

Baron Hayashi, Ambassador and Plenipotentiary Extraordinary to Russia, has been telegraphically instructed to attend the Peace Conference at the Hague representing Japan. He will be accompanied by Colonel Ueyehara Yuji and Captain Sakamoto Shuntoku.

The total number of visitors to the Commercial Museum last month was 5,017, of whom 4,959 were Japanese and 58 foreigners.

The postal authorities are instructed by the International Postal Bureau to notify the public that mail matters for Guatemala, capital of the Republic of Guatemala, are sometimes addressed in San José, a seaport city on the Pacific coast of the same country. Much inconvenience is caused from the above mistake and the attention of correspondents is called to the matter.

The Chinese excepted, the people of Burmah are probably the most inveterate gamblers in the world, and they are particularly susceptible to the wiles of the teetotum, a petty and, more or less, harmless form of gambling. The Government of Burmah has been seriously considering whether or not steps should be taken to stop the spinning of the teetotum at the native fairs, but the Commissioner of the Mandalay Division has strongly urged a continuance of the policy of non-interference, maintaining that it is best to draw a distinction between a comparatively innocent amusement and harmful gambling. Sir F. Fryer has endorsed this view, and the teetotum is to remain a sport of the people.

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

Manila, April 4.

A proclamation signed by the American Commissioners was issued to-day.

It assures the Filipinos of the cordial goodwill of the American Government, the aims of the Government being the well-being, prosperity, and happiness of the Philippine people, their elevation and advancement to a position among the most civilized people of the world.

The Proclamation also sets forth in detail the means for the development of the islands, and declares there can be no real conflict between American sovereignty rights and the liberties of the Philippine people, for as the United States is ready to furnish the resources of a powerful nation to maintain its rightful supremacy over the islands, it is even more solicitous to spread peace and happiness and guarantee rightful freedom, so as to accustom the Philippine people to free self-government in an ever-increasing measure, and encourage those democratic aspirations, sentiments, and ideals which are a promise of potency and fruitful national development.

The Commission expects to visit the Province for the purpose of ascertaining what are the forms of Government best adapted to the peoples.

The proclamation contains about two thousand words, and is an excellent statement of American policy, which if it reaches the people ought to produce a good effect.

Meanwhile, the natives continue to return to their homes inside the lines.

AMERICAN MATTERS.

Figures published by the New York Journal of Commerce show that the fire loss of the United States and Canada during the month of February aggregated the abnormal and discouraging sum of $18,469,000. The seriousness of the increase is shown in the following comparative table exhibiting losses for the first two months of 1897, 1898, and 1899:—

	1897.	1898.	1899.
January ...	$12,049,700	$ 9,472,500	$10,718,000
February...	8,676,750	12,629,300	18,469,000
Totals ...	$20,726,450	$22,101,800	$29,187,000

In a British Consular report on the import trade of the Hawaiian Islands for 1897 we note that China and Japan figure for $40,647 for clothing imported from those countries. Under the heading of drugs $8,852 came from China. Opium is largely smuggled into the islands for the use of Chinese smokers. The import of medicinal opium was only $1,498 (from China, $1,356). Chinese and Japanese matting was imported to the value of $13,329. Chinese oils figure for $21,820. Under the heading of spirits are included:—Japan wines, $54,197; and China wines, $13,707. As regards the quantity of the Japanese sake this represents a consumption, per head of the estimated Japanese population of the islands at the close of 1897, of about a pint a week. The duty was raised from 60 cents to $1 a gallon for a short time last year, with the result, however, of only showing a loss of revenue from a falling-off of the import. China and Japan tobacco was imported to the value of $4,726, and Manila cigars to the value of $35,428.

A terrible wind storm, accompanied by rain and hail, passed through the extensive plantation of Samuel Cury, at Bismarck, Alabama, on March 19. Eleven tenement houses were blown down and two negro boys were killed. Seventeen other negroes were injured. This tornado did a great deal of damage to property; it swept over portions of Arkansas, and at Walnut Lake three persons were killed. A stable is said to have been blown a hundred and fifty yards with a horse in it, but the horse was uninjured.

The American papers record two instances of "smart" advertising. In one case a firm reproduced in facsimile what purported to be a large telegraphic order for goods, with the signature unfortunately torn off, and a copy was sent to the heads of all railways, contractors, and other persons likely to require such goods in large quantities, with the polite inquiry whether the order had come from them. Some of those addressed saw through the device, and replied angrily or humorously as the spirit moved them; but the object of the firm was attained in knowing that their name and the class of goods they supplied had been brought directly under the notice of all of their possible best customers. The second case referred to was on a similar but more brilliant scale. A crowd had gathered outside a hotel round a man who had fainted on the side walk, when a bustling person pushed his way to the front, calling to the crowd to make way and allow him to get to the patient. After quickly feeling the man's pulse, the supposed doctor produced a pocket-book filled with small squares of what appeared to be plaster. Moistening one of these the "doctor" pressed it upon the man's forehead and pulled his hat down over it. Then, addressing the crowd, he told them to give the man water, but not to remove his hat for two minutes; and, pushing his way out, he disappeared. For two minutes the crowd, growing denser every movement to witness the wonderful cure, waited impatiently and then removed the man's hat. On his forehead they saw an advertisement: "Go south via the Sea Board Air Line."

BICYCLE MEET AT POKOHAMA.

A bicycle meet arranged by the Sorin Club took place on Saturday afternoon at the Yokohama Cricket Ground. The weather was everything that could be desired from a spectator's point of view, though the recent rains had rendered the track a little heavy, militating against fast times. The event was largely a Japanese affair, and the great majority of the riders were Tokyo and Yokohama cracks, for though several foreign cyclists had entered most of them failed to turn out. The sport could not be called keenly interesting on the whole, for the number of competitors in the important races was too small to make the racing exciting. However, the programme was on the whole a fairly good one, and any lack of excitement there might have been in the races proper was amply atoned for by the really masterly trick-riding of Mr. W. C. Vaughan, who delighted the spectators with some wonderfully smart feats. The arrangements were under the supervision of the following officers:—

Referee and Starter:—Mr. C. H. Bain; Judges:—Messrs. J. L. O. Eytan, E. Mendelson, J. Eytan, Jr., and H. Kageyama; Timers and Scorers:—Messrs. K. Kingdon, T. M. Laffin, and W. C. Vaughan; Clerks of Course:—S. Kominami and H. Arai. Details:—

ONE MILE NON-WINNERS.—(Two Prizes.)

W. C. Vaughan	1
B. Mason	2
A. Kingdon	3
R. Yoshida	0

Iwaya and Yoshida made the running for the first two laps, and the former was leading almost up to the finish, when Mason made his effort and got ahead, followed closely by Vaughan and Kingdon. Vaughan spurred on the last lap, and got in two lengths ahead of Mason, Kingdon taking third place. Yoshida retired before the finish. Time, 2 min. 58½ secs.

ONE MILE SCRATCH.—(Two Prizes.)

M. Iwaya	1
T. Abe	2
K. Masaki	0

The race was between Abe and Iwaya, Masaki being simply not in it. Both led in turn, but eventually Iwaya got ahead and won by about six lengths. Time, 2 min. 54 secs.

ONE MILE CHAMPIONSHIP.—(Two Prizes.)

K. Tsuruta	1
E. Kobayashi	2
J. M. Scott	3
S. Onodera	0

For the first lap the competitors rode in a cluster but in the second they thinned out, Onodera first, with Strasser next, and Scott, Tsuruta and Kobayashi following. On the last lap Tsuruta spurred and passed ahead of the rest. Rounding the 100 yard bend Onodera fell, and got in Strasser's way, but this slight accident did not greatly affect the race, which was evidently in Tsuruta's hands. He won easily by many lengths; Kobayashi being second and Scott, whose want of success surprised his many admiring backers, third. Time, 2 min. 29 secs.

CHOCHIN RACE.—(One Mile.)

B. Roberts	1
M. Hori Chiyo	2
T. Iwata	3
K. Ono	0
L. W. Eytan	0
Z. Ito	0
A. Kingdon	0

In this race each competitor had to carry a lighted lantern, and to keep it alight on penalty of disqualification. Nine started, but only four kept their lanterns lighted throughout. Roberts was an easy winner.

TWO MILE RACE.—(Two Prizes.)

S. Sugino	1
K. Kaneko	2
T. Abe	0
S. Matsumura	0
T. Iwaya	0
J. Nishimura	0

Kaneko made the running, and was leading, up to the last lap, when M. Iwaya put on a great spurt and came in an easy winner by 20 yards to spare, Sugino being second, and Kaneko third.

It was found, however, that Iwaya had not actually entered, but had raced in place of his brother T. Iwaya. He was, therefore, disqualified, and the places allotted as above. Time, 5 min. 28½ secs.

BOY'S RACE ONE MILE, HANDICAP. (Five Prizes.)

J. Iwaya	1
J. Laffin	2
T. Iwaya	3

This race caused a considerable amount of amusement, the riders being abnormally small and the machines abnormally large, so that the competitors were sitting on the cross-bars most of the time. It was a very easy thing for Iwaya, who won with yards to spare. Time, 5 min. 12 sec.

FIVE MILES CHAMPION.—(Two Prizes.)

E. Kobayashi	2

Out of four entrants only two started. They were paced by Mason, Powys, H. V. Irwine, E. Irwine, and J. Scott. Tsuruta took the lead from the first, and, maintaining it throughout, won by a lap and a half. Time, 14 min. 4 secs.

LAP RACE, FIVE LAPS, TWO SPURTING LINES PER LAP.—(Two Prizes.)

B. Mason	2

Only two started. Powys led from the first, and finished each lap ahead of Mason.

A most interesting exhibition of trick riding was given during the afternoon by Mr. T. Tagaki and Mr. W. C. Vaughan. Of Mr. Vaughan's display it would be difficult to speak too enthusiastically. He made his bicycle jump over obstacles—one of them a prone man—like a blood hunter—he careered round the course on one wheel faster than most of us could do on two; he twisted, turned, stopped, balanced, and pirouetted in every imaginable and unimaginable way. It was a very entertaining and a very clever display.

The prizes were distributed by Miss Iwaya.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1592.

By HOMER B. HULBERT, A.M.

(CHAPTER I.—CONCLUDED.)

Late in the year a dangerous conspiracy was discovered, the prime mover being Chông Yo-nip of Chul-la Province. He had arranged a plan by which he and several friends of his in Whang-ha Province should rise simultaneously and overthrow the Government. A certain monk in Ku-wol Mountain, in Whang-ha Province, discovered that a certain man, Cho Gu, was working diligently among the people, taking names, sending numerous letters, and in other ways acting in a suspicious manner. He believed the man was a traitor and told the prefect of An-ak to be on the lookout. The latter arrested the man and examined him. It was then elicited that a widespread rebellion was being arranged. When the news was told the King secretly he called together his officials and asked, "What sort of a man is this Chông Yo-nip?" Some said they did not know, but the Prime Minister said that he was a good scholar and an exemplary man. The King then threw upon the floor the letter telling about the plot and exclaimed, "Read that and see what sort of a man he is."

The traitor Chông had caught wind of the discovery and had fled with his son to Chul-na Mountain in Chul-la Province but he was pursued and surrounded. Rather than be taken, he cut his own throat and expired. His son and his nephew were taken back to Sôul and executed. The nephew under torture affirmed that the Prime Minister and a large number of other officials were privy to the plot. This was the easier believed because the Prime Minister had insisted that Chông was a good man. So he and two others were executed and many others were banished. It is affirmed on good authority that the Prime Minister and the others who suffered were innocent of the charge, and that it was simply one of the deplorable results of party jealousy and strife. We have here a striking instance of the cause of Korea's weakness.

All momentous events in Korea are believed to be foretold in some way. It is said that in the year 1589 a good man named Cho Hôn went to the monastery at Kôn-san and when rice was set before him said, "Whoever eats with me will die next year, for the Japanese are coming with 200,000 men. Those here who do not eat with me will live." Three only are said to have taken up the challenge and eaten with him.

In the third moon of the following year, 1590, the King redeemed his promise by sending to Japan three envoys, Whang Yun-gil, Kim Sung-il, and Hô Sông. They were accompanied by the Japanese envoy who had waited a year for them. Whang Yun-gil was chief of the Korean embassy, but he was a weak, timid man who hardly dared speak when a Japanese addressed him. The other members of the embassy, realising how such action would bring Korea into contempt at the Japanese court, tried to stir him up and make him speak out fearlessly, but to no avail. After waiting a year at the Japanese court the embassy returned, accompanied by Tairano, who was charged with an important mission to the King. The minute this embassy landed at Tong-on, Whang Yun-gil, the cowardly envoy, sent a letter post back to Sôul saying that war with Japan was certain. When they all arrived at Sôul the King called them into audience and questioned them about their experiences in Japan. His first question was, "Did you see Hideyoshi? How did he look?" Wang replied, "His eyes flashed fire. He is a fearsome man." But Kim Sung-il said, "There is nothing fearsome about him. His eyes are like rats' eyes."

The important letter of which Tairano was the bearer was now laid before the King and it laid bare the mind of Hideyoshi. It read as follows:—

"Our country consists of sixty-six kingdoms. They all revolted from the Emperor, but for four years I fought them and succeeded in bringing them all to their knees, until even the remote islands lay mastered in my hand. When my mother conceived me it was by a beam of sunlight that entered her bosom in a dream. After my birth a fortune-teller said that all the land the sun shone on would be mine when I became a man, and that my fame would spread beyond the four seas. I have never fought without conquering, and when I strike I always win. Man cannot outlive his hundred years, so why should I sit chafing on this island? I will make a leap and land in China and lay my laws upon her. I shall go by way of Korea and if your soldiers will join me in this invasion you will have shown your neighbourly spirit. I am determined that my name shall pervade three kingdoms."

At a feast given in honour of the Japanese embassy, Gensho, the Japanese monk, who seems to have accompanied Tairano to the Korean court, whispered to Whang Yun-gil and said, "The reason why Hideyoshi wants to attack China is because the Emperor refuses to receive a Japanese envoy. If Korea leaves us but a clear road to China we will ask nothing else. No troops need be given." To this Whang replied, "That can never be. China is our Mother Country and we cannot so desert her as to give a road to an invading army." The monk returned to the attack, but this time from another standpoint. "Long ago the Mongol hordes desired to invade Japan and you gave them a road through Korea for that purpose. Now, when we seek revenge, you should do the same by us." This was considered too preposterous a thing to be even discussed and the matter suddenly dropped and the Japanese envoy started straight back to his own country. It was this envoy, Tairano, who, while on his way up from Fusan, insulted the aged governor of Ta-gu by saying, "For ten years I have followed war and thus my beard is gray; why should you grow old?" Also calling for a Korean spear he said, "Your spears are too long," meaning that only cowards use long spears. He was, also, who threw a basket of oranges to the dancing girls and, when they scrambled for them, uttered his ironical criticism, "Your nation is doomed. You have no manners."

When this embassy went back to Japan he carried an answer to Hideyoshi's letter, in which the King said:—

"Two letters have already passed between us and the matter has been sufficiently discussed. What talk is this of our joining you against China? From the earliest times we have followed law and right. From within and from without, all lands are subject to China. If you have desired to send your envoys to China how much more should we. When we have been fortunate China has rejoiced, and when we have been unfortunate she has helped us. The relations which subsist between us are those of parent and child. This you well know. Can we desert both Emperor and parent and join with you? You doubtless will be angry at this, and it is because you have not been admitted to the court of China. Why is it that you are not willing to admit the suzerainty of the Emperor instead of harbouring such hostile intents against him? This truly passes our comprehension."

The Emperor hearing a rumour of a Korean-Japanese alliance sent and enquired about it; but the King replied through an envoy telling the facts of the case exactly as they had occurred. It was well understood in Korea that an invasion was all but inevitable and active preparation were going on all the year in view of this contingency. Three able men were sent as the governors of Kyong-nang, Chul-la and Ch'u ng-ch'ung provinces, respectively, namely Kim Su, Yi Gwang, and Yun Sang-gak. They were so energetic in repairing fortresses and accumulating arms that the people complained loudly. Someone told the King that Yi Sun-sin, a man as yet unknown, had in him the making of the greatest general in the world, and for this reason the King made him admiral of all the naval forces of the kingdom.

THE ARMY OF INVASION—LANDS ON KOREAN SOIL.—JAPANESE FIRE-ARMS—FALL OF FUSAN—A COWARDLY PROVINCIAL GOVERNOR—THE FALL OF TONG NA—A FAITHFUL DEFENDER—COWARDLY OFFICERS—THE JAPANESE MOVE NORTHWARD—A MARTINET—BRAVER SOLDIERS THAN LEADERS—THE NEWS REACHES SÔUL—THE THREE ROADS GUARDED—A COMICAL PREDICAMENT—A GOOD SHOT—CHO RYUNG (PASS) LEFT UNDEFENDED—AN ARMY DISBANDED FOR LACK OF LEADERS—GENERAL YI IL'S FIASCO—GENERAL SIL YIP WANTS TO FIGHT IN THE PLAIN—RECONNOITERING—THE KOREAN ARMY IN A TRAP—OVERWHELMING DEFEAT.

We have now arrived at the year 1592, A.D., the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the dynasty, the year that was destined to see the country swept by the Japanese hordes. The Koreans call it the Imjin year, and the mere pronunciation of that word to-day brings up in the Korean mind the tales of horror and suffering which his mother told him when a boy, and which have determined the whole attitude of the Korean mind toward Japan.

Before spring opened, the King took an inventory of all the arms that were available, and appointed General Sil Yip to the command of the force in Kang-wun and Ham-gyung Provinces, and General Yi Il to the command of those in the south. In the third moon the officials worshipped at the tomb of King T'a-jo, the founder of the dynasty. Korean tradition says that wallings were heard proceeding from this tomb for three or four days preceding the landing of the Japanese.

Hideyoshi had brought together an enormous force from all parts of the kingdom, and the expedition, after being reviewed at Nagoya by Hideyoshi, rendezvoused at the islands of Iki. They were led by thirty-six generals, the General-in-chief being Hideyoshi.

As to the numbers in the invading army, the Korean account agrees so well with the Japanese that there can be little doubt of its correctness. The Korean account says that the regular army consisted of 160,000 men, that there was a "body-guard" of 80,000 men, perhaps meaning the personal body-guard of Hideyoshi, and that there were 1500 heavy armed cavalry. This says nothing about a reserve force of 60,000 men which is mentioned by some authorities, and from this we conclude that these did not come with the main army but waited and came later as reinforcements. The best Japanese accounts make the total 250,000 while the Korean records say 251,500. Either of these numbers is approximately correct, but the Japanese accounts divide the estimate differently, saying that the main army was 150,000, while Hideyoshi's personal command was 100,000. But this discrepancy is of course unessential.

As to armament we find that this army was provided with 5000 battle-axes, 100,000 long swords, 100,000 spears, 100,000 short swords, 500,000 daggers, 300,000 firearms large and small, and that there were in the whole army 50,000 horses.

The flotilla which brought this immense army to the shores of Korea consisted of between three and four thousand boats. This gives us an intimation as to the capacity of the boats used in those days. According to this enumeration each boat carried sixty men. They were probably undecked, or at most but partially decked, boats of about forty or fifty feet in length, by ten in breadth.

We learn from Japanese sources that the whole fleet did not weigh anchor from Iki at the same time. Kato, who was in command of one division of the army, managed to give the rest of the fleet the slip and was away with his command by night, while his rival Konishi was compelled to wait several days longer at anchor because of adverse winds. These two men, Kato and Konishi, figure so prominently in the first years of the war that a word of description is necessary. Kato was an old warrior who had fought for many years by the side of the great Hideyoshi and held the confidence and esteem of that great commander. He was an ardent Buddhist and a firm believer in the old regime. Konishi, on the other hand was a young and brilliant general who had gained his place not so much by long and faithful service as by his uncommon skill in military affairs. He was a convert to Roman Catholicism, having been baptized by the Portuguese missionaries in 1584. He seems to have been a personal favourite with the great Taiko. It is in the Korean accounts that we find the statement that Hideyoshi made the General-in-chief of all the army of invasion. From the Japanese accounts, which naturally would be supposed to be more reliable in this matter, it would seem that Kato and Konishi divided between them the honour of supreme command. But we must remember that Hideyoshi was an old soldier and well acquainted with the natural jealousies that spring up between officers in any army, and it is almost inconceivable that he should have put this army in joint command of two men whom he must have known to be bitter enemies and who would doubtless work at cross purposes in the peninsula. We incline therefore to the opinion that the Koreans were right and that there was a nominal head in the person of Hideyoshi, but it is quite true that the brunt of the work fell upon the two rivals, Kato and Konishi.

When day broke on the morning of the thirteenth of the fourth moon of 1592, a dense fog rested on the sea and hid from the eyes of the Koreans the vast fleet that was working across the straits. Curiously enough, the commander of the Korean forces in Fusan happened to be hunting that day on Deer Island at the entrance to the harbour. He was the first to detect the invading host. Hastening back to the fortifications he prepared for the worst. Before many hours had passed the Japanese host landed, surrounded the fort, and poured in upon its doomed defenders such a destructive fire that it is said the bullets fell like rain. The garrison fought till their arrows were gone and then fell at their post, not one escaping.

It would be difficult to over-estimate the immense advantage which the Japanese enjoyed in the possession of firearms, a weapon with which the Koreans were not acquainted and to whose natural destructiveness as a machine of war must be added the terror which it naturally inspired. It was Cortez and the Mexicans over again, only in somewhat lesser degree. What seemed to the Japanese, and what has passed down in history, as cowardice can scarcely be called by so strong a term when we consider that bows and arrows were pitted against muskets and men who were trained in their use.

Without delay the invaders marched around the bay to the ancient city of Tong-na, the remains of whose ancient fortress still greet the eye and interest the imagination of the traveller. Its prefect, Song Sang-hyun, hurriedly gathered all the town-people and what soldiers he could find. General Yi Gak, the commander of all the forces in the province, was approaching from the north; but, hearing of the fate of the garrison of Pusan, he halted abruptly and said, "As commander of all the provincial forces I must not risk my life in actual battle, but must stand outside, where I can direct affairs." So he turned about and put six miles between his precious person and the beleaguered town of Tong-na, and encamped at So san. The next day the Japanese completed the investment of the town and prepared to storm the fortress. The brave prefect took up his position in the upper storey of the great gate of the fortress where, in accordance with the Korean custom, he beat upon a great drum and urged on his soldiers in the fight. For eight hours the gallant defenders fought before the enemy effected an entrance over their dead bodies. Seeing that all was lost, the prefect called for his official robes and seated himself in state in the upper gateway. The ruthless Japanese rushed in and seized him by his garments and attempted to make him bow before them, but the first one received such a kick in the stomach that he rolled over on the floor. An instant later he was struck down by their swords. Just before the enemy entered he bit his finger till the blood came and with it he wrote on his fan "The duty of a subject to his King comes before that of a son to his father, so here I die without seeing you again." This he delivered to a trusty servant to give to his father. To his trusty friend Sin Y6 go he said, "There is no need of your staying here to die, make good your escape while there is time." But Sin replied "I have enjoyed pleasures with you and now I prefer to suffer with you." So the two died together. The Japanese general in command was so impressed with the bravery of this Prefect, Song Sang hyun, that he had his body decently buried and erected over his grave a wooden monument on which he wrote, "A Loyal Subject," an epitaph than which none could be more grateful to a true Korean gentleman. Tradition, which delights to embellish such accounts, avers that for two years a red light could be seen glimmering at night above the gate where this man met his end.

When General Yi Gak, the cautious, and General Pak Hong, who was with him, heard of the fall of Tong-na, they took to their heels, and consequently their forces did likewise. And here it should be noted that cowardice evinced itself almost exclusively in the generals and other officers. We shall find that in almost every instance the soldiers stood by their officers to the last man.

As the forces of the Japanese moved northward the prefects fled to right and left. The governor of the province, Sim Su, hearing of the battle at Tong-na, advanced toward that place with all the forces at his command, but his determination seems to have wavered, perhaps on account of the growing rumors of the prowess of the Japanese; for before he came in sight of the invading army he returned to the west and south, alarming all the prefects as he went, and so it is said that the whole portion of the province was practically depopulated.

When the Japanese arrived at Yong-san they found it empty. They swarmed over Chuk-w6n Pass like ants and filled the plain beyond. Pak Jin, the prefect of Mi-nyang, burned all the provisions and arms and fled to the mountains. Not so with So Ye wan, the prefect of Kim ha. He stayed inside his fortress and defied the invaders. The latter could not effect an entrance until they went and cut down a large field of barley in the neighborhood, which they tied in bundles and heaped against the wall till they were able to scale it. Having done his best and failed, the prefect made good his escape. U Bok-yong, prefect of Yong-gung, as in duty bound, called in his retainers and started to join the banners of his chief, Yi Gak, whose whereabouts at that time was rather uncertain, as we have already seen. During a halt for dinner two hundred soldiers from the town of Ha-yang passed them on their way to join the forces of the governor. U Bok-yong seems to have had so large an opinion of himself that he was enraged because these soldiers did not dismount when they passed him.

They were of course ignorant of his rank, but he had them all seized and executed, and sent a note to the governor saying that he had destroyed a band of two hundred robbers. For this meritorious service he was elevated to the rank of district-general.

Meanwhile General Yi Gak, the provincial general, was flying from place to place in momentary fear of encountering the enemy. His troops were disgusted at this, for they had made some raids guns that would throw pebbles, and they thought if they could have a fair chance at the Japanese they could give them a whipping.

On the seventeenth, four days after the landing of the Japanese, the startling news reached Seoul. The city was thrown into a sort of panic. The ministers hastened to the palace to consult about ways and means for defence. Yi Il was the highest actual field officer in the country. He was of the third military rank, but the two above him were simply the Minister and Vice-Minister of War, who always stayed with the King. General Yi Il may then be said to have been the General-in-chief of all the armies of Korea at the time.

There were three main roads leading up from the south to the capital, any one of which might be chosen by the Japanese. The most direct of these was the central one leading over the mountain chain at the celebrated Ch6-ryung (Pass). Another to the east crossed the mountains at Chuk-nyung (Pass), and a third to the west led through the centre of Ch'ung-ch'ung Province. To guard these three approaches the King ordered General Yi Il to go south by the middle road and station a garrison at Ch6-ryung, the most important strategic point in the Japanese line of march. General Pym Geni was to be stationed in charge of this garrison; the eastern road was to be guarded by General Yu Geuk-nyang, and Pym Eung-song was made prefect of the important southern town of Ky6ng-j6. All these men were ordered to start for their respective posts that very day. At a late hour of that same day came the news of the fall of Pusan, for some-one from the summit of a neighbouring hill had seen the red banners of the Japanese swarming over the walls into the doomed town.

These generals who had been ordered to start in such hot haste were practically without forces. When the military rolls were looked up it was found that the army was mostly on paper, and that a large majority of the men were either "sick" or "in mourning." So the whole force that General Yi Il could muster amounted to just three hundred men. Even these could not be mustered at an hour's notice, and so, in order to obey the King's command, the unfortunate general had to start off alone, trusting that this pitiful handful of men would follow him. The sight of the General-in-chief of the armies of Korea starting out alone to meet the mighty army of invasion would be comical were it not so pathetic. Of course the intention was to gather soldiers as he went, and we shall see that he did succeed in getting together at least the semblance of an army.

The Prime Minister Yu Sung-nyong was made Minister of War and was charged with the duty of gathering a competent force to cope with the dreaded Japanese. Sil Yip was also appointed Vice-Minister of War. He seems to have been specially trusted by the King, for the latter gave him a splendid sword and sent him south with the injunction to kill anyone who should prove unfaithful, even though it be General Yi Il himself. Here we see another grievous mistake, in thus giving a man an independent command over the head of the General-in-chief. It well illustrates a defect that has brought disaster to many an army—namely, the confusing of authority. As Sil Yip came out from this audience with the King he slipped on the stone steps and his count hat fell from his head. The attendants looked upon this with dismay, for it was considered an omen of ill-success. The general went south only eighty li and stopped at Yong-in.

Kim Sung-il, who will be remembered as the man who accompanied the cowardly envoy, Whang Yun-gil, to Japan, and who had so severely censured him for his craven conduct, was now made commander of all the forces in the western part of Kyung-sang Province. He started for his post immediately and in a few days arrived at the important town of Chiu-j6, just as the Japanese were approaching. His escort had become somewhat scattered, but he was not going to take a backward step even to save his life. Dismounting he seated himself in the official chair, having with him only a corporal and a dozen soldiers. It was a common custom for the Japanese to wear hideous masks for the purpose of terrifying the Koreans. On this occasion, when the van of the Japanese army entered the town it was led by a burly fellow wearing an extremely large and extremely ugly mask. The corporal strung his bow and let fly a shaft which pierced the mask and laid its wearer low. His followers bent a hasty retreat supposing that no one would be shooting arrows about like that unless there was a considerable force of soldiers in the immediate vicinity. We are not told as to the fate of the bold general. In this part of the provinces the prefects seem to have been made of better stuff than those further south, for they sent to each other urging the necessity of standing at their posts and offering whatever resistance they could to the advance of the enemy.

By this time Gen. Yi Il had collected a considerable force, had crossed the great Ch6-ryung (Pass) and was stationed at Song-j6, in the very path of the invading army. It did not take long to measure his calibre, for no sooner did the rumour of the approach of the Japanese reach him than he turned and fled up the pass. This was bad enough, but his next act was little less than traitorous; he made no attempt to block the pass, even though a mere handful of men could have held it against thousands. It was his one great opportunity to distinguish himself and that he did not improve it speaks as poorly for his generalship as it does for his patriotism.

Meanwhile an equally reprehensible event was transpiring in the south. Governor Kim Su, who had turned aside from meeting the enemy, sent letters to all the prefects ordering them to have soldiers from all the districts rendezvous at Tagnand and await in camp the arrival of generals from Seoul. The order was obeyed and a large force was congregated at the appointed place; but day after day passed and no generals came. The Japanese were sweeping northward and would soon be upon them. Under the circumstances it should cause little surprise that the camp broke up, each man returning to his own district. This is but one of many cases which go to show that in almost every instance the blame rested not on the soldiers but on the generals and other officers. They were always willing to go where the generals would lead them.

When Gen. Yi Il fled in panic over Ch6-ryung and left it undefended, his followers naturally objected to remaining under the command of a man who was not only no commander but was a coward to boot. So at last the dauntless general found himself stranded in the town of Sang-j6 without a soldier at his back. He had hoped to find some troops there under the command of the Prefect, Kwon J6ng-gil, but when he found that there were none, he flew into a rage and was about to decapitate the prefect, but let him off on condition that he should find some troops immediately. This the poor fellow tried to do, but as the whole population was a farming one, not a man could be found who had ever borne arms or who knew anything about fighting. Nevertheless, to save his head, he got together some nine hundred recruits. At this juncture a messenger came post haste from Ka-ryung saying that the Japanese were coming and were already near. Gen. Yi replied, "You lie, this is only a scheme to get me to leave, so that I will not levy any more troops here. Off with his head." So off it came. That very night the Japanese encamped at Ch'ung-Ch'und-i a few miles away, but Gen. Yi knew nothing about it as he had no pickets out. The next morning Japanese scouts were seen on the opposite bank of the river reconnoitering. The Koreans saw these scouts but as one man had been beheaded for telling of the approach of the Japanese no one dared to tell the general, and it was not till he heard the firing of guns that he became aware of the proximity of the foe. Then he rushed out and formed up his little garrison as best he could behind the fortifications. Ere long his attention was called to several columns of smoke arising from the town. He sent some of his aides to discover the cause but they fell into the hands of the Japanese and were immediately cut down. When Gen. Yi learned of this he was genuinely alarmed and his anxiety was added to by seeing two long files of Japanese deploying to right and left and rapidly inclosing him and his forces. There was only one thing to do. Mounting his steed he fled by the only way that was not already blocked. Being hotly pursued he abandoned his horse and the greater part of his clothing and fled into the mountains where he managed to elude his pursuers. In a day or so he appeared at the town of Mun-kyung where he wrote a letter telling of his defeat, and sent it to Seoul. Hearing that Gen. Sil Yip was at Ch'ung-j6 he hastened to that point and joined him.

Gen. Sil Yip had some time since arrived at his post in Ch'ung-j6 and had prosecuted his work of collecting soldiers with such zeal that he had mustered a force of some eight thousand men. It was his intention to push straight for Ch6-ryung, the key to the whole situation, but when he heard of the flight and defeat of Gen. Yi Il he fell back to his strong position in Chung-ju. One of his lieutenants, Kim Yô-mul, expostulated with him and said, "We cannot cope with them except in such a place as Choryung were the roughness of the land will be of material aid to us," but the general replied, "No, they are infantry and we are cavalry. If we can once get them into the plain we can use our battle-flails on them with deadly effect." One of his captains told him that the Japanese had already crossed the Choryung, and that night he left the camp secretly and went on a long tour of inspection in order to ascertain whether this was true. When he came back he ordered the instant execution of the captain. This midnight expedition speaks well for his courage and his loyalty.

A few days after the fugitive general, Yi Il, joined the forces of Gen. Sil Yip, the Japanese forces approached. In order to carry out his pet scheme of fighting the Japanese in an open plain where his soldiers could make good use of their battle flails, Gen. Sil selected a spot that seemed to him most suitable. It was a great amphitheatre made by high mountains, while on the other side, like the chord of an arc, flowed the river T'ang-gu-da. The only approaches to this plain were two narrow passages at either end where the mountains came down to the river bank. In this death trap, then, Gen. Sil drew up his entire command and awaited the coming of the invaders. It is easy to imagine the glee with which the Japanese saw this arrangement, for it meant the extermination of the only army that lay between them and Seoul. Strong detachments were sent to block the passages at the ends of the plain while the main body scaled the mountains and came down upon the doomed army as if from the sky. The spears and swords of the descending legions flashed like fire while the roar of the musketry made the very earth to tremble. The result was an almost instantaneous stampede. The Koreans made for the two narrow exits but found them heavily guarded by the Japanese. They were now literally between "the devil and the deep sea," for they had the appalling spectacle of the hideously masked Japanese on the one hand and the deep waters of the river on the other. The whole army was driven into the river or mercilessly cut down by the swords of the Japanese. Gen. Sil Yip himself made a brave stand and killed with his own hand seventeen of the enemy before he fell. Out of the whole army only a handful escaped, and among them, we are almost sorry to say, was the coward Yi Il, who managed to get across the river.

KINSHIU MARU-MIYAGAWA MARU COLLISION.

The Kobe Herald contains the following decision of the Osaka Marine Court in the Kinshiu Maru-Miyagawa Maru collision case—

Fujiwara Rihei, Helm, living at No. 403, Koguchi Mura, Kojima Gun, Okayama Ken, F. J. Brown, British subject.

Having examined the circumstances of the collision between the Miyagawa Maru and Kinshiu Maru, it is found:—Fujiwara Rihei was Captain of the steamer Miyagawa (registered tonnage 257) owned by the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, No. 64, Tomishima-cho, Kita-ku, Osaka; while F. J. Brown was Captain of steamer Kinshiu (registered tonnage 2,459), owned by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, No. 1, Yuraku-cho, Ichome, Kojimachiku, Tokio. The Miyagawa, which sailed from Akamagasaki in Nagato province on 24th October, of 33rd year of Meiji, for Osaka, in Settsu province, via ports in Chugoku, left Tomotsu in Bingo province for Tadotsu in Sanuki province at 5.28 p.m. on the 25th of same month, and at 6.08 p.m. passed the northern extremity of Kotobi Island in the same province, keeping about four cables distance. She there changed her course to S.E. by E. & E. Proceeding full speed, at the rate of 11 miles an hour, at 6.32 p.m., she made out the white and green lights of the Kinshiu, then about 2 miles distant and about 2 points on the port bow. The Kinshiu left Kobe in Settsu province for Hongkong, via Nagasaki, in Hizen province, at noon of the 25th. At 6.28 p.m. she passed the northern extremity of Takumi Island in Sanuki province, at a distance of four cables, and there changed her course to W. by S. & S. She was going at full speed, viz., 12 miles an hour. At that time Captain Brown, Pilot Kaya, and the third mate, Shirodzu Kozo, were on the bridge. At about 6.33 they saw the white light of the Miyagawa about 3 miles off, at about 2 points on the starboard bow. It was a gloomy moonlight night and there was a light N. E. breeze and about a quarter knot westerly current. The islands in the neighbourhood could be seen very clearly, and Captain Brown entrusted the deck to the pilot and left the bridge to take his supper. At 6.32, at a distance of about 2 miles, a red light was seen in the same direction. The pilot then turned the Kinshiu's head to the right in order to avoid the approaching vessel. At the same time the Miyagawa changed her course to the east. Then both steamers recognized three lights. Thereupon the pilot put the rudder to starboard to recover his former position. The Miyagawa at the same time turned quickly to the right in order to pass the Kinshiu on the port bow. The Kinshiu was changing slowly to the west and blew two short blasts of the whistle. The Miyagawa expecting danger, sounded several short whistles and turned suddenly to the right. At this critical moment both steamers gave orders to go full speed astern. At about 6.38 the Kinshiu was heading W.S.W. and the head of the Miyagawa was S.W. by S. The Kinshiu struck the Miyagawa at the rear part of the bridge on the port side. The Kinshiu was slightly damaged, but the Miyagawa was so badly damaged both above and below the water line, that she sank a few minutes after the collision, at about S.W. by W., one cable to the S.W. by W. of the position where the collision occurred; that is, she sank 1½ mile S. & W. of Sanagi Island in Sanuki province. Before that time, Captain Brown, who was taking his supper, heard a whistle and ran up on the bridge as quickly as he could and gave orders to go astern. But it was too late to avoid a collision. After the collision happened, he ordered the engines to be stopped and endeavored to rescue the passengers and crew of the Miyagawa. On the other hand Captain Fujiwara Rihei, notwithstanding the fact that his steamer was sinking rapidly, took no measures to rescue lives, and of a total of 147 on board at the time 50 persons were drowned and 6 were missing. These facts are made clear by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination by the Osaka Marine Court of Enquiry of Captain Fujiwara Rihei, Captain F. J. Brown, Kono Zenichichi, Minematsu Takejiro, Shiota Wajiro, Shiga Monji, Ota Jinkichi, Yasukura Hachisaburo, Shirodzu Kozo, Asakura Fukutaro, Odahawa Ichizo, Nakano Sinto and an Austrian named P. P. Staffa, and also by the notes sent the Osaka Marine Court by Pilot Kaya Yasuke and the reports forwarded by the Nagasaki Marine Court, the Marugame Police, and Hiroo Jiro, who gave testimony regarding Regulation No. 987.

After examining the foregoing facts, the actions of Captain Fujiwara Rihei when the collision occurred, the infringement of Art. 21 of the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and his failure to adhere to his course, it is clear he erred in his duty and contravened clauses 2 and 3 of Art. 1 of the Seamen's Disciplinary Regulations. Therefore he must be punished according to clause 2. of the same regulations. On the other hand in regard to Captain Brown's actions on the Kinshiu Maru it is to be noted that he did not avoid the passage of the other steamer, nor lower the speed of his vessel, nor alter his helm in time. That was a mistake. But at that time the pilot was in sole charge of the steamer, so Capt. Brown cannot be held responsible for it. Nor is there anything to be said against him for the steps taken to rescue lives, his action in no way constituting an offence under Art. 1 of the Seamen's Disciplinary Regulations.

The decision is as follows:—The second grade certificate as Captain (Otsushin) of Capt. Fujiwara Rihei will be suspended for nine months. Captain Brown will not be punished at all. The costs of the enquiry, yen 77.70, will be borne by Capt. Fujiwara Rihei.

M. LOUBET IN THE COUNTRY.

Saigon, April 7.
The President of the French Republic has gone to spend two days at Montélimar, his native town, and has been warmly welcomed by his compatriots.

Saigon, April 8.
The President of the French Republic, speaking at a banquet given by the Municipality of Montélimar, asserted the attachment which the country bears to its national army. He said that transitory difficulties and superficial agitations could not long defer the reign of concord in France.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR: REMARKABLE DEPOSITIONS.

Saigon, April 7.
The Figaro publishes the deposition of the Juge d'Instruction, M. Bertulus, who declares that the preliminary examination conducted by him proved that Made-moiselle Pays and Colonel Du Paty de Clam are the authors of the telegrams sent to Picquart over the signature "Blanche" and "Speranza." He adds that when he said to Colonel Henry that Esterhazy was the writer of the "bordereau," Henry did not deny it.

Saigon, April 9.
The publications of the Figaro continue, and are giving rise to numerous protests.

Saigon, April 11.
The Figaro publishes the depositions of Generals Zurlinden and Chanoine, former Ministers of War, affirming the guilt of Dreyfus.

FRENCH PREMIER ON THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Saigon, April 10.
The Prime Minister, M. Dupuy, in a speech delivered at a banquet which was given to him by his constituents at Puy, affirmed that the situation of France was generally satisfactory. Of the Dreyfus affair, the Premier said that it would be soon settled by the judgment of the Court of Cassation, and that, as soon as the judgment was pronounced, the sanctions of the law would follow if necessary. He added that the punishments which might eventually overtake the errors or the faults of individuals were incapable of reaching the national army, which constituted security in the present, confidence in the future, and the guardian of the country's independence and constitution.

EX-MAYOR OF ALGIERS ARRESTED.

Saigon, April 11.
M. Max Régis, former Mayor of Algiers, has been arrested in that town for delivering a violent speech against Governor-General Leferrère.

FRANCE CALM.

Saigon, April 12.
The opening of the General Councils has taken place amid the greatest calm throughout the whole of France.

NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Admiral Cuvelier de Cuverville, Chief of the Head-Quarters Staff of the Navy, has tendered his resignation in consequence of the recent decree with regard to the points d'appui of the Fleet. M. Lockroy, Minister of the Navy, who is now at Cherbourg, will give a decision on this subject when he returns to Paris.

FRENCH FLEET'S RECEPTION IN ITALY.

Saigon, April 13.
The press and the populace received the French at Cagliari with acclaim. Admiral Fournier, Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Squadron, gave a déjeuner on board to the Authorities. The Crowned Heads arrived in the afternoon.

THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE BORDEREAU.

The deposition of General Gonse says that Dreyfus alone can have written the "bordereau." General Deloye's report refutes the deposition of Hartmann.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

London, April 7.
Le Figaro continues publishing the depositions taken by the Criminal Chamber of the Court of Cassation. They contain those of General Roget, who detailed several strong points against Dreyfus. He insisted strongly that the items mentioned in the bordereau were only known to the officers of the Department where in Dreyfus worked. An official from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs testified that the German and Italian Ambassadors and attachés positively denied all dealings with Dreyfus. M. Bertulus, Examining Magistrate, who interrogated Col. Henry regarding Col. Picquart's charges against Count Esterhazy, deposed that Henry declined to answer whether Esterhazy was the author of the bordereau, and that, besides, he made a scene imploring Bertulus to consider the honour

London, April 10.

The Observer says that Count Esterhazy has avowed that he wrote the bordereau by Col. Henry's order.

London, April 12.

M. Lorillier, former military secretary to the late Col. Henry, committed suicide on Monday last after receiving a telegram summoning him to Paris.

THE "FIGARO" REPORT.

Le Figaro, continuing its report (of Criminal Section trial), states that M. Casimir-Perier deposed that Gen. Mercier told him of one secret document submitted at the Court Martial, but that the witness was unaware that it was only communicated to the Judges.

CANADA AND BRITISH DEFENCE.

London, April 8.

The Dominion Government is considering a scheme of contributing to Imperial naval defence. It is proposed to train a thousand fishermen annually first ashore and then on board warships.

THE TRANS-AFRICAN RAILWAY.

The St. James Gazette reports that Germany has given the necessary guarantee upon the capital for the German section of the Cape-Cairo Railway, and also the guarantee of a certain percentage of interest on the line from Dar-es-Salaam to Ujiji.

Mr. Cecil Rhodes has abandoned the idea of British guarantee for the Tanganyika railway; and intends to raise capital without guarantee.

THE SAMOAN DIFFICULTY SETTLED.

The three Powers (England, America and Germany) have finally settled upon a Tripartite Commission in Samoa.

London, April 10.

Malietao Tanu was crowned King of Samoa on the twenty-third of March in the presence of the British and American representatives, the Germans holding aloof.

London, April 11.

Germany strongly protests against the intervention of the British and American men-of-war and the installation of Malietao Tanu as King, as being contrary to the Treaty.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN ENTENTE.

London, April 10.

Reuter understands that the negotiations between Russia and England extended over other questions besides China, and had in view the adjustment of present or contingent difficulties.

IRISH LOCAL ELECTIONS.

The results of the County Council elections in Ireland show that Unionism is unrepresented in Munster and Connaught, scarcely represented in Leinster, and has suffered severely in Ulster.

DUKE OF CONNAUGHT.

London, April 11.

A declaration by the Duke of Connaught was read in Diet of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, agreeing to assume the government of the Duchy in the event of any contingency arising.

AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION.

The Ministry of South Wales has appointed twelve members to the Council to outvote Councillors objecting to the Federal Bill.

"THE TIMES" ON JAPANESE FINANCE.

The Times, in a leader on Japanese finance, concludes its remarks by quoting the positive opinion of its Tokyo correspondent, that Japan is more than able to repay any foreign loan she can possibly require.

SITUATION IN SAMOA.

BRITISH-AMERICAN FORCE AMBUSCADED.

London, April 13.

The British-American force, being ambuscaded by Mataafans at Apia on the 1st of April, were forced to retreat. Lieutenant Freeman, of the British cruiser Tauranga, two American officers, and four sailors were killed and decapitated. The ambush occurred in a German plantation, the manager of which has since been arrested on the charge of inciting the rebels.

[The Tauranga is a twin screw cruiser of the 3rd class, for the protection of Floating Trade in Australian waters. Lieut. Angel H. Freeman was borne in her as Gunner Lieutenant, and received his commission to the Tauranga on April 1st, 1897.—Ed. J. M.]

The new Chinese five per cent. gold loan to the amount of 112,500,000 francs for the Peking-Hankow Railway has been issued by the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas and other French banks.

PLAGUE AT MECCA.

Two cases of plague have occurred at Mecca.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

Manila, April 3.

Major General Otis, commanding the Forces at Manila, has issued a proclamation in which he advises the American troops to treat the Filipinos with consideration in order to disabuse the minds of the natives of the mendacious allegations of looting and ravishing sedulously circulated to incite the natives against the Americans.

Many natives are returning to Malolos and the vicinity, and the situation is hopeful.

(FROM THE "MANILA TIMES.")

NEXT U.S. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. PROBABLE CANDIDATES.

New York, March 28.

It appears probable that the Republican Convention will nominate William McKinley as candidate for President and Colonel Theodore Roosevelt for Vice-President. The Democratic Convention will probably adopt Bryan as candidate for President, and Admiral Schley for Vice-President.

No mention is made of Dewey. In answer to urgent appeals from prominent sound money Democrats, Admiral Dewey has written a letter to Judge Browley, of South Carolina, stating that under no circumstances would he consent to be a candidate for the presidency. He says he is not fited by training or temperament for the high office, and begs his friends not to consider his nomination a possibility.

THE FRENCH MISSIONARY AFFAIR IN KOREA.

Seoul, April 10.

The missionary affair in Kang-kyong, Korea, was a petty quarrel arising from a bargain between Christians and merchants, and the local officials, in a panic, telegraphed gross exaggerations. The district is quiet, and the missionary is safe.

BOAT UPSET—THREE PERSONS DROWNED.

Tadotsu, April 12.

About 4 o'clock this morning a boat laden with passengers was upset on the way to the Tongawa Maru, and three of the passengers were drowned.

MURDERER AND MURDERESS EXECUTED.

Nagoya, April 12.

The priest Kuroda Suisei and his wife, who were sentenced to death for murder, were executed this morning.

STEAMERS IN COLLISION.

Hakodate, April 11.

Last night, the N.Y.K. steamers Matsumai Maru and Tagenoura Maru collided in the harbour, the latter suffering most damage.

DISASTROUS FIRES.

Kanazawa, April 11.

At 4.20 a.m. to-day a fire broke out at Ishiyakoji, Kanazawa, and the flames extended to Fukurocho and Yasuyecho. No fewer than 100 houses were reduced to ashes, including many well-to-do merchants' residences. It was not before 6.30 a.m. that the fire was got under control.

Aomori, April 11.

On Sunday night, 167 houses were burnt down by a fire in Shichinoe village, Kamikita district. The post and telegraph office and tax office shared in the destruction. One person was injured.

GAME No. 498.

THE WELSH CHESS TOURNAMENT.

Mr. A. Burn added another leaf to his laurels by again winning the major tourney at Llandudno on January 10th, 1899. Like last year, he scored 3 points out of a possible 10. Last year he lost to Mr. G. Bellingham. This year he did not lose a game, but, what was tantamount thereto, he drew with Messrs. Atkins and Jones. Mr. H. E. Atkins took second prize with 7½ points, Messrs. Bellingham and Schott tied for third and fourth prizes with 6 points each. In the second class tournament the prize takers were respectively Messrs. N. Clissold (Liverpool), J. E. Parry (Shrewsbury), and A. Mackenzie (Birmingham).

The following fine game between Messrs. Burn and Schott is taken, with the notes, from the Times (weekly edition):—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT DECLINED.

White—A. Burn. Black—G. A. Schott.

WHITE.
 1—P to Q 4
 2—P to Q B 4

BLACK.
 1—P to Q 4
 2—Kt to K B 3

This defence is proved unsatisfactory, because, whether Queen or Knight retakes the Pawn, White gains a move either by 4—Kt to Q B 3 or P to K 4, the latter being a very important move if the Knight takes.

3—P takes P
 4—Kt to Q B 3

 4—Q to Q R 4
 5—P to B 3
 6—B to Kt 5
 7—Q Kt to Q 2
 8—P to K 3
 9—Q to Kt 3

The Queen is not well placed on this square. We suggest P to Q Kt 3, followed by Q R to B and Kt to Q R 4.

11—Q R to Q sq
 12—P to K R 3
 13—P to K 4
 14—P takes B

10—B to Q 3
 11—Q to B 2
 12—P to K R 4
 13—P to K 4

With a crowded position, and nothing special threatened, the capture is not good. It led, as might have been expected, to a very exciting and difficult game for White, and his adventures are well worth following in detail.

15—Kt takes P
 16—K R to B sq

14—R P takes P
 15—Kt takes Kt

It is not at first apparent why White cannot safely retake the piece. But a little analysis will show that if P takes Kt, B to B 4 is difficult to answer. It threatens Q takes P, &c. The game at this point is an uncommonly fine study.

NOTES.

The American chess players came out with flying colours against the British in the cable match which was begun in London and Brooklyn on Friday morning, the 10th March, the score being 6 to 4. Nearly from the start of this great annual contest the Americans seemed to get the better positions on the majority of the boards, and although only three players, namely, Showalter, Barry and Hodges, scored a win for America on each of the boards they were engaged in, no fewer than six games were drawn, and Champion Pillsbury had to resign his game against the British champion, Blackburn.

The following are the results, as recorded:—

United States. Won.	Great Britain. Won.
1 H. N. Pillsbury..... 0	J. H. Blackburn..... 1
2 J. H. Showalter..... 1	H. E. Atkins..... 0
3 J. F. Barry..... 1	T. F. Lawrence..... 0
4 A. B. Hodges..... 1	E. Jackson..... 0
5 K. Hymes..... 1	D. V. Mills..... 1
6 H. C. Voight..... 1	H. Jacobs..... 1

The match at the American end was played at the assembly rooms of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and the big hall was filled with an enthusiastic crowd of spectators throughout the hours of play. It is needless to say that every result of the game, whether won by an American player or only drawn, was cheered to the echo. Very often moves which were registered on the giant boards came in for hearty sounds of applause when the spectators thought the move was a good one.

During the morning session on the last day of the tournament it became evident that Pillsbury could do no more than draw against Blackburn. The latter, however, played splendid chess and drenched his man on his first board after seventy-one moves.

Showalter's brilliant play on the second board against Atkins caused general admiration, and when at his forty-fifth move he announced a mate in seven moves the spectators nearly went crazy with excitement. Atkins, of course, resigned.

Barry, too, played excellent chess, and after fifty-one moves he had beaten Lawrence on the third table.

On the fourth board Hedges played very strongly and managed to beat Jackson after fifty-one moves.

Voight, who at first tried to play for a win against Jacobs, had to withdraw after fifty-four moves.

The Brooklyn champion, Marshall, let no opportunity slip to win his game right out, and he, too, had to be satisfied with a draw after sixty-two moves against Wainwright. Newman and Bellingham, who contested their game right up to the finish, agreed upon a draw after sixty-six moves, and Baird and Trenchard also drew their game after seventy-one moves.

After the conclusion of the match dispatches of thanks were exchanged by the clubs and by the promoters of the contest.

The contest, as were the previous ones, was played for a trophy presented by Sir George Newnes, president of the British Chess Club of London. The first match, in 1896, was won by the Americans, but the second and third matches, played in 1897 and 1898, were won by the British.

The magnificent trophy, consisting of a unique set of chessmen of Persian design and workmanship, which Mr. A. F. Walter has offered for competition in the next inter-parliament tournament between Great Britain and the United States, is thought to be the finest specimen of the carvers' art that has ever been seen in London. These beautiful figures, all of the purest ivory, are superbly chased and mounted on gold, the whole being enclosed in an exhibition case of tasteful design.

Capt. Chepmell, of Hongkong, has been compelled by medical advice to resign the championship and abandon chess for some considerable time. Black Bishop, of the China Mail, says the cup passes to Mr. M. J. Dautenberg, who had sent in a challenge before the news was known. As the challenger's (and present cup holder's) chess superiority to the other members is perhaps not quite so marked as that of Messrs. Pollock, Souza and Chepmell, good sport may be expected before the trophy finds a permanent resting place.

One of the greatest colonial chess events of the year will be the match by wire, on May 24th, between the Sydney and Melbourne Chess Clubs.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, APRIL 8TH, 1899

DEATH.

On the 2nd of April, near Hakone, ALEXANDER KLEINWORT, a native of Sietlin, Germany, in his 50th year.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A few cases of diphtheria are reported in the Akasaka District, Tokyo.

H.I.M. THE EMPRESS will visit the Ongaku Gakko, Utsunomiya, on April 21st.

THE Easter Holidays were rather disappointing this year, rain falling nearly every day.

THE Yokohama International Committee's dinner on Monday evening promises to be a big success.

IN Berlin it is believed that Dreyfus conveyed to Russia details and specifications of the new French rifle.

THE Formosan authorities have made all preparations to open some normal schools from October 1st.

MATSUDAIRA, the notorious Ocha-no-miden murderer, has been sentenced to penal servitude for life, the crime having been reduced by the Court to manslaughter.

YOKOHAMA is suffering from a "cold snap," the temperature on Thursday and Friday being much below the normal.

THE Times publishes a long correspondence on the progress of Siam, and in an enlogistic leader admits the claim of Siam for Customs revision.

PRINCE KAWIN will entertain the Ministers of State, the military high officials, the Foreign Ministers, and others on the 13th, 15th, and 18th inst.

THE iron chimney of the Glass Manufactory, Takashimacho, Yokohama, was blown down on Thursday morning. In its fall it cut down over 40 telephone wires.

OWING to fresh missionary outrages in Shantung, Germany has despatched troops to Ichow: she has declared, however, that she has no territorial designs.

MARQUIS NAB SHIMA will give an evening party at his residence at Sannenchō on April 12th, to which the Cabinet Ministers, their ladies, and others will be invited.

FOUR hours fighting took place between the Turkish and Bulgarian frontier guards at Kizilagach last week. A number of them were killed and wounded.

THE Public Hall was crammed to its fullest limit on Friday when Mr. W. G. Bayne made his farewell appearance in Yokohama in the farce "A Mother of Three."

NEWS comes from the Philippines of the death of General Egbert while leading a charge; and of a Ge man prince who had been staying in the Philippines for some months past.

At the Peace Conference, Japan, it is stated, will probably be represented by Baron Hayashi, Minister to Russia, and by the military attaché to the Japanese Legation there.

TWO pensions of 300 yen a year each, from the Imperial Household Department and from the War Office, have been granted, to Mr. Eckhart, the retiring Imperial Band-master.

A TWO-STORIED godown standing on Lot 31, Yokohama, was entirely destroyed by fire on Friday morning. The insurances on building and contents—mostly curios—amounted to yen 15,200.

THE farmers of Hoonmoku are endeavoring to foment an agitation against the Kirin Brewery Company by alleging that the oily products that flow from the Company's drains are injuring their crops.

BICYCLE races and athletic sports will take place at the Cricket ground on May 6th; on May 20th the Yokohama Spring regatta will take place, and on May 27th the Interport regatta takes place in Kobe.

YEMACU AN papers print a queer story regarding a man from whose family the Government bought the land on which Yokohama now stands. This man is demanding the restitution of the family's former property when the new Treaties are enforced.

A SHINTO shrine dedicated to the late Prince Kunshikawa is to be built in Taipei Prefecture, Formosa, the scene of his death. It will be completed by the 33rd fiscal year. A museum may be established as accessory to the shrine.

THE Department of Agriculture and Commerce is about to despatch inspectors selected from the districts of Fukui, Kyoto, Kiryu, and Ashikage, to Italy, France, etc., on a tour of investigation into improved methods of silk manufacture.

THE War Department last year appointed a committee to compile a history of the Japan-China war. They sit weekly for the purpose. No definite method of compilation has yet been arrived at, and the work will occupy four or five years.

A FORMOSA despatch dated the 28th March shows that on the 25th and the following day 64 new cases of plague and 36 deaths occurred in Tainan Prefecture, and one new case in Taipei, making a total of 688 cases and 470 deaths since the commencement of this year.

REAR ADMIRAL DOUBISSOFF, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Russian Squadron, and the principal officers of the Vladimir Monomach and the Rossia were received in audience by H.I.M. the Emperor, accompanied by Baron Rosen, Russian Minister, on the 4th inst. at 1.30 p.m.

MR. FUJIWARA RIKET, captain of the Miyakawa Maru, which sank in collision with the N.Y.K. steamer Kinshu Maru off Tadoussac last year, has had his certificate suspended for nine months by the Osaka Marine Court. Captain Brown, of the Kinshu Maru, has been exonerated from all blame.

FOUR Exchanges of various kinds are now established in Yokohama, viz., the Five Staples, the Four Staples, the Rice, Salt and Grain, and the Merchandise Exchanges. Owing to the narrow scope of their business, none of them are prospering and a project is on foot to bring about an amalgamation.

MR. A. KLEINWORT, head of the firm of Morf & Co., an old resident of Japan, while walking in Hakone on Easter Sunday was suddenly taken ill and died within two minutes from heart failure. He was a very popular member of the German community, and his funeral on Tuesday was largely attended despite the pouring rain.

A SHOP lifter named Suzuki Heikichi is in custody on a charge of stealing two coats (valued at 20 yen) from the Tensho do watch store, Iwazaki-cho, Yokohama, and over 40 overcoats and other garments from 21 different tailors and drapers. He is said to have spent the greater part of his life in jail and has been convicted nine times on various charges.

WHILE Capt. May, Superintendent of the Hongkong Police, was engaged in delimiting the Kowloon hinterland frontiers the other day, he was attacked by Chinese. A hut that had been temporarily erected for his use was burnt down. The Colonial Government at once despatched a torpedo boat and 100 infantry to Mira Bay, while the General at Canton sent 300 "braves."

THE South Western Railway steamer Stella, having on board 140 passengers and a crew of 41, bound for Guernsey, struck the Casket Rocks (to the west of the Island of Alderney), driving a lug on the afternoon of March 30th, and sank ten minutes later, the boilers exploding. Seventy-four passengers, comprising mostly women and children, and 19 of the crew, were saved by boats, while upwards of eighty were drowned.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND THE CABINET.

One of the great difficulties besetting the foreigner who seeks to ascertain the drift of political opinion in Japan is that the so-called "organs" do not really fulfil representative functions, but are just as likely to reflect the views of individuals as those of parties. The Fimmin is an example. It is regarded as the mouthpiece of the Liberals, but if its utterances justify that estimate on one day, they belie it on the next. Hence, although its attitude towards the Government's new regulations as to the appointment and status of officials is uncompromisingly hostile, we are uncertain whether the relations between the Liberal Party and the Cabinet are really in danger. The Fimmin declares that these regulations are opposed to the principles of constitutional government; that they are a device to perpetuate the tenure of power by superannuated nominees; that they are a means of insuring the appointment of incapables; that they will have the effect of creating a special class in the community; that they will augment the arrogance of men in office; that they will dangerously extend the power of the Administration; and that they will remove junior officials beyond the pale of discipline. That is a sufficiently sweeping indictment of the framers of the regulations, in other words, of the present Ministry, and if the Fimmin truly expresses the sentiments of the Liberal Party, a rupture between the latter and the Cabinet would seem inevitable.

If we turn to the organ of the National Unionists, a paper which usually lends most loyal support to the present Ministry, we find that it approves the regulations as calculated to cure the office-hunting fever of party politicians, but, at the same time, it frankly admits that they are likely to expose the Ministry to considerable hostility on the side of the parties.

The independent section of the press is, on the whole, favourable, but even the Nichi Nichi thinks that the effect of the regulations will be to extend too much protection to officials; the Shogyo Shimpō considers that the treatment guaranteed to men in office is too good, and the Nippon tempers some moderate applause with the criticism that Clan Government is perpetuated. As for the Fiji Shimpō, it conveys its views to the public through the medium of a cartoon, in which the Prime Minister is depicted flourishing a sword to drive off all applicants from a gate the panels and bars of which are constructed of the newly issued regulations. In one direction, an ungainly figure retreats precipitately, showing a perturbed face and carrying on his back a sack marked "emoluments 2,000 yen"; in another, a man having a star where his head should be, rides away on a diminutive donkey. This latter figure is an allegorical representation of Mr. Hoshi (hoshi means a star) Toru, and the animal he bestrides is a dwarf (war) mule (ro). That is to say, a homonym for "bribe" (war ro).

Whatever the issue of the event may be, it is universally regarded as a severe slap in the face for the Liberals, and the latter's leaders will probably find some difficulty in preventing their followers from breaking away into open opposition. No one forgets that the Cabinet's tenure of power was not expected to exceed the term of the Diet's session, and that its reconstruction so as to admit several Liberals was counted a foregone conclusion. But the reconstruction of the Cabinet on that basis would have opened a large number of official appointments to the rank and file of the Liberals had not these new regulations been promulgated. Thus the direct consequence of the Government's measure is to destroy one of the principal incentives to Cabinet reorganization, and indirectly it suggests that the Ministry did not feel at all secure against embarrassing enterprises on the part of their political allies.

If foreign opinion on such a subject has any interest for the Japanese, we can assure them that these new regulations will have the universal approval of Englishmen, at all events. The British Civil Service owes its excellence—we do not hesitate to use the word—partly to the fact that, with few exceptions, tenure of office is entirely independent of political vicissitudes. Men can confidently seek life-long careers in Governmental posts, and can devote their energies to the discharge of their administrative duty, instead of dissipating a considerable portion of them on political campaigns. If the instability that representative institutions have produced in Japan is to extend to the Administration, and if offices of State are to become rewards of political agitators instead of being filled by men of competence and experience, it would have been better for Japan had she never possessed a Diet.

The sequel of this incident seems to have been the usual compromise. On the 31st instant, the non-parliamentary members of the Constitutional Party held a meeting and passed a violent resolution, in the sense that by enacting such regulations without consulting the Party, the Government had treated the latter with contempt; that the General Business Committee must be held responsible for not keeping themselves informed of what the Government had in contemplation; that the Committee should be required either to resign or urge the withdrawal of the Regulations, and that, in the event of the Cabinet's refusing to withdraw them, the Party's connexion with it must be severed. On the evening of the same day, the Prime Minister gave a dinner at which Marquis Saigo and Count Matsukata were present, as were also the Liberal leaders, Count Inagaki, Mr. Hoshi Toru, Mr. Matsuda and Mr. Kataoka Kenkichi. What passed is not quite clear. Some say that the Liberal leaders asked for a modification of the regulations; but the more credible account is that Marquis Yamagata—acting doubtless, in conformity with a previous understanding—announced the Government's intention of issuing supplementary regulations by which the following officials would be regarded as political, not as purely administrative; in other words, would not enjoy the permanency of appointment guaranteed to officials in general, namely, Vice-Ministers of State, the Chief of the Metropolitan Police, the Heads of the Local Government Bureau and the Criminal Law Bureau in the Home Department, the Councillors of Departments, and the Chief Secretary of the Cabinet. Thus 22 posts are reserved for the "spoils system." We presume that the country is not ready for the more enlightened programme proposed by the Cabinet. Under the circumstances, probably the best plan would be to create an additional post, that of parliamentary Vice-Minister, so that the administrative Vice-Ministers may not be disturbed on each change of Cabinet. Otherwise it will often result that the Departments of State are left entirely without responsible direction.

The Government's guiding principle in enacting these much-talked-of Regulations was unquestionably good, but the method pursued can not be said to have shown much political sagacity. It is plain that the Liberals might have been frankly taken into consultation, and that the Regulations, in a slightly modified form, might have been enacted with their consent. As matters stand, the Regulations have been enacted at the expense of a heavy strain on the link between the Ministry and the Liberals. One side feels that it was not trusted; the other has the unpleasant consciousness of being obliged to beat a partial retreat.

COUNT OKUMA ON CURRENT POLITICS.

Count Okuma thinks that Russia will come off second best in the negotiations now pending with England. It is impossible, he says, for the two Powers to draw a line across China and take it as the limit of their respective ambitions. Their discussion will turn upon a few definite points, and Russia will purchase England's complaisance by tangible concessions. As to the possibility of an international conference to decide the fate of the Chinese empire, the Count regards it with entire scepticism. The time is not ripe for anything of the kind. If there had arisen such a clashing of interests as to endanger the peace of the world, the Powers might be induced to confer. But there is nothing of that kind at present. Besides, though people talk glibly of the partition of China, such a feat would be immensely difficult. Perpetual friction, endless difficulties, and great bloodshed have marked the attempt to cut up Africa, which presents no difficulties comparable with those offering themselves in China's case. The Powers will not approach the task lightly. Even if China asked for a conference, the answer would be unfavourable, and as for Japan's taking the initiative, she has lost her opportunity. England wanted her to make a protest at the time of Kiaochow. But she would not do anything. Again, England plainly intimated her willingness that Japan should occupy Wei-hai-wei permanently, but Japan preferred to get the money due to her by China. It is too late for Japan to do anything now in the way of inviting a conference. These views are said to have been expressed by Count Okuma to a representative of the Asahi Shimbun.

PETROLEUM IN HOKKAIDO.

Vernacular newspapers announce the discovery of an extensive petroleum field in Hokkaido. It is situated near the course of the Abashiri River in Abashiri district, and is said to have an area of 40 or 50 square miles. Investigations are now being carried on, and important results are expected. So many announcements of this nature appear in the columns of our Tokyo contemporaries, and so invariably do they turn out baseless that we hesitate to place any credit even in the most circumstantial.

GERMANY IN CHINA.

Some very outspoken expressions of opinion are published by Tokyo journals—the Asahi and the Yomiuri—with reference to the latest step taken by Germany in Shantung. She is said to have violated all the principles of international law and grossly insulted the Chinese Government, inasmuch as she has sent troops into Chinese territory by way of preliminary to a demand for redress. That is precisely what she did in the case of Kiao-chou, and her conduct then elicited similar comments in Japan. Of course there is no denying the justice of these censures. All that can be said is that China stands outside the pale of international law. The German Government has evidently made up its mind as to the most effective and practical kind of procedure where China is concerned. It is a very simple process—place yourself in a position to enforce your demands before formulating them. Such a step, if taken towards any self-respecting Power, would necessarily be counted a declaration of war. To send troops into the territory of an independent State without the permission of its Government is an armed invasion, and would be so regarded by any Occidental Power or by Japan. China, however, seems to have an unlimited capacity for digesting these insults, and, if they suit her constitution, that is chiefly her own affair. Chiefly, but not altogether. As Englishmen we have a very strong interest in Germany's doings, being persuaded that her presence in the Far East will ultimately contribute to the ends which the Anglo-Saxon Powers have in view. Hence we can not regard with indifference these displays of violence, which appear not merely unnecessary but also quite disproportionate to the incidents constituting their pretexts. If Germany's recourse to armed pressure were prefaced by demands for redress, however peremptory, we should welcome her procedure as calculated to promote the cause of law and order, and to strengthen the Chinese Government by compelling it to reform its administrative machinery. But no such effects can be produced by coups of the Kiao-chou and Chin-chou kind. They must impair the competence of the Peking Administration and of the local officials by exposing their inability to preserve the empire against the armed invasions of mere handfuls of foreign troops. It is impossible to suppose that the vitality of the Manchu dynasty can long survive these repeated blows, any one of which would prove fatal to the Government of a people endowed with even a small modicum of national sentiment. Germany, we presume, does not want to see the Chinese empire tumble to pieces. Gentler methods would give her everything she aspires to possess, whereas, by precipitating the crisis, she will create a situation of which she is not yet prepared to take full advantage.

It is suggested by a Tokyo contemporary that the Peking Administration, strengthened by its recent experience with Italy, may decline to entertain any demands preferred by Germany until she withdraws her troops from their newly occupied positions in Chinese territory. We shall be much surprised if anything of the kind occurs, and still more surprised should events prove that Germany is acting in collusion with Russia, as the Asahi opines.

The Chauvinist view in Tokyo journalistic circles is that Japan should despatch a fleet of cruisers to guard the ports of Fuhkien, and that she should also demand from China a promise never to alienate any part of Che-kiang. Evidently the writers advocating such steps think that something like a crisis is at hand, and that, unless Japan gets her finger into the pie, she will presently find that all the plums have been extracted by more enterprising Powers. On the whole it is not wonderful that there should be some impatience among the Japanese. But since everybody sees that the Opposition organs have planned an assault upon the Cabinet from the direction of its foreign policy, these hostile utterances lose a great deal of their force.

RUSSIA IN THE FAR EAST.

There are sundry evidences of dissatisfaction with the present management of Japan's foreign policy, but they appear to be based chiefly on the fact that nothing of a striking nature occurs. The critics of the Foreign Office, not seeing any fireworks, imagine that there is no festival, and think that because Japan is not en evidence like the Great Western Powers, she is suffering effacement. Prominent among these critics is the Yomiuri Shinbun. Its editor seems to be one of the Japanese who believed that Russia had permanently effaced herself in Korea for the sake of devoting her whole attention to China, and he now believes that finding her Chinese designs checked by British influence, Russia is again stretching out her hand towards the peninsular empire. That apprehension appears to be based principally on the news recently received that Russia has been asking for whaling privileges, had demanded three fishing stations on the Korean Coast, and has been indirectly the means of driving the Cabinet out of office. Seeing no distinct signs that Japan is efficiently thwarting this new outbreak of energy on the part of the Great Northern Power, the Yomiuri concludes that the country's diplomatists are culpably inactive or incompetent. The Nichi Nichi Shinbun, however, combats these criticisms with its usual ability and breadth of view. It admits the magnitude of Japan's interests in Korea, but scoffs at the notion that her influence is in any danger of being eclipsed, and it reminds the cavillers that the belligerent kind of procedure which they apparently advocate, is not diplomacy at all, but a line of action consequent on the failure of diplomacy. If Russia gets new whaling privileges or fishing stations in Korea, Japan can get them also for the asking, but, as the Nichi Nichi truly observes, this clamour for increased privileges sounds absurd in the mouths of people who have made no use of the privileges already gained by them in foreign countries.

On the whole we gather that the telegram announcing the prospects of an entente between Russia and England with regard to Chinese affairs is regarded by Japanese journalists as an indication that the partition of the Chinese empire is at hand. There has not, as yet, been any general expression of newspaper opinion, but journals like the Asahi are very outspoken. They say that England has obviously abandoned the open-door policy in favour of spheres of influence, and that her agreement with Russia will be on the latter basis. If so, the beginning of the end is in sight. Underlying these comments there is evidently a conviction that England alone stands between China and disruption, and that Russia stands in the fore-front of the aggressors. In our opinion the difference between the policies of the two great Powers is rather one of method than one of principle. Be that as it may, however, it is an exaggeration to say that an entente between Russia and England must necessarily be on the lines of spheres of influence, if "spheres of influence" signify that China's imperial authority is to be replaced by that of England over certain definite areas of the former's dominions. England and Russia might agree that each shall confine herself strictly within such and such limits, but England's consequent policy within her sphere would not be territorially aggressive. She would simply insist on the open door, on perfect freedom of enterprise for her nationals, and on non-alienation of any part of the regions delimited. What threatens China's integrity at present is first, her extraordinary incompetence to defend herself, and secondly, the clashing of foreign interests. The former source of ruin seems to be irremediable, and will assuredly prove fatal in the end. The latter would be greatly mitigated by an agreement between Great Britain and Russia.

THE NEW POLITICAL PARTY AND RELIGION

The new political party (Kokken-to) is still unborn, but seems likely to see the light of day at an early date. Its enemies are therefore beginning to bestir themselves. The Yomiuri Shinbun, for example, having declared that the party is compounded of a section of the clan followers and the Nuye folks—Nuye means a fabulous and shocking creature, in part monkey, in part snake and in part eagle—proceeds to announce that one plank in its platform will be "the development and extension of the ancient creed of Japan." On that text it is of course possible to preach a serious sermon about the evil of confounding politics and religion, and it is also possible to discredit the party by alleging that Buddhist money has been largely put up to meet the expenses of "organization and encouragement." Mr. Ishikawa Shuntai, Vicar of Hongwan-ji, whose name was so much in the mouth of the public when the Sugamo agitation became formidable, is said to have been the channel through which the funds were furnished. It is difficult to credit such tales.

MISCONDUCT OF JAPANESE NOBLES.

In the Japanese Peerage Regulations there is a provision to the effect that whenever the conduct of a noble is such as to bring discredit upon his order, or when he becomes pecuniarily unable to support his title properly, a council of his peers may be nominated by the Throne to investigate the circumstances of the case and make a report to the Emperor. Such a council has now been appointed, for the first time, we believe, in Japanese modern history. It consists of thirteen members. Of course nothing is publicly stated as to the nobles whose affairs are to be the subject of investigation.

UNIFICATION OF EAST AND WEST.

Nothing could exceed the perseverance of the Fiji Shimpō in preaching reform. We presume that our contemporary understands its own countrymen a great deal better than any outsiders can pretend to understand them, yet we are sometimes inclined to question the wisdom of perpetually holding up foreign examples to a people proud of their own traditions. On the other hand, the Fiji's methods bear indirect testimony to the spirit of the time. Six or seven years ago, no less persuasive text than Western views or Western fashions could have been chosen for an ethical homily addressed to the Japanese, and had the Fiji been required to act as a propagandist of good morality in 1892 or 1893, we are very sure that it would have moulded its thesis on different lines.

In one of its recent articles, our contemporary reminds its countrymen that all their modern progress is the gift of the Occident. Their political and administrative systems, their laws, their machinery of communications, their military and naval organization—everything comes from Europe and America. They have taken the material products of Western civilization very readily and successfully, but they still turn their backs on the moral side; still refuse to make any radical change in their manners and customs. It follows that they are still regarded by the Western world as Orientals, and they will never be regarded as anything else until they adopt Occidental ethics as well as Occidental articles. They are pursuing a thoroughly ostrich-like policy, hiding their heads under the superficials of foreign civilization and leaving exposed their unaltered, unimproved Oriental bodies. Descending to particulars, the Fiji denounces the displays of loose morality and immodest behaviour constantly made by its nationals; urges them to exercise more diligence in acquiring foreign languages, and taunts them with unreasoning prejudice in opposing Christianity because it is an alien creed, while they cling to Buddhism, which is equally alien, and in spite of the fact that one half of the nation has no religious belief at all.

No less than 28 articles in series have been published by the Fiji on the subject of Japanese houses. The writer is Mr. Tsuchiya Gensaku, and the articles have been collected and issued in the form of a brochure. They may be briefly summarized. Japan's modern progress has been confined to the regions of science, industry, administration, and legislation. Her people's manner of life has not undergone any change. That is notably true of her houses. There is no standard of architecture for dwellings. Simplicity and economy are the only objects kept in view. The frailty of the structures that have been adopted for generations is generally attributed to fear of earthquakes, but, if there were any genuine spirit of progress in these matters, architects would have endeavoured to devise some form of earthquake-proof building. They have done nothing of the sort. The people regard earthquakes as heaven-sent calamities and make no attempt to mitigate their effects. The old style of the South-sea islands, of Java, and of Borneo, has been in vogue from time immemorial. The free ingress of air in summer seems to have always been the paramount consideration, and people have been content to sit on the floor and be always insecure against burglars. Interior decoration is limited to a little useless show—fine timber, gold screens, and painted doors. Sanitary considerations have never received any attention. The fundamental explanation of it all is that the Japanese house reflects the taste of the Samurai, the soldier. A man who has the possibility of death always before his eyes, who sets duty far above comfort, who cares little about changes of temperature, who is too poor to concern himself about burglars, who, being punctilious above the conventionalisms of etiquette, likes a troublesome arrangement of ingress and egress, who wishes to have many servants about him as an evidence of authority, and who regards his home as a kind of tent—such a man offers no encouragement to the architect. As for the rich merchant in Japan, if he built for himself a showy or substantial house, he at once became a target for extortion. Thus the habit arose of spending money in ways that did not strike the eye. The wealthy trader went abroad in cheap cotton garments but wore costly silks at home; furnished his house in the simplest style, but spent great sums on knotless timber for building it. The time has come, however, when the ancient influences must cease to be acknowledged and the ancient apprehensions laid aside. The Japanese must get off the floor, and carry the spirit of the new civilization into their lives.

It is interesting to observe the sharp contrast presented by the views of different Japanese writers with regard to the steps that the nation should take by way of preparation for mixed residence. One class of publicists, headed by the Fiji Shimpō and the Chinō Shimbun, assert that Japan should do everything possible to put her house in order; to correct the faulty, hide the unsightly, and repair the defective, prior to the advent of foreigners, for since the old order has been driven out before the new is established, there is much that the prying stranger will find to criticise, and it may end in his classing the Japanese with the Koreans and the Chinese. Another section of publicists, represented by the Tokyo Asahi, take precisely the opposite view. They observe that the conservative sentiment of anti-mixed-residence days has now entirely disappeared, and everywhere the people are prepared to welcome the coming of foreigners. No other preparation but that change of mood is needed, so far as the people are concerned. The Government, indeed, has certain duties to perform—duties with regard to the police, the jails, the administration of the laws, and so forth. But the people may await the event with "vacant hearts and level minds" (kyōshin heiki). The advocates of this policy of unconcern condemn the methods of the "fussy folks," for they say that to be continually urging the people to make reforms and improvements on account of the coming of foreigners tends to weaken the impulse of progress for its own sake.

All this talk illustrates a point which we have often noted, namely, the remarkable ignorance of many Japanese about the world's knowledge of themselves and their affairs. They seem to be quite unaware that they have been scrutinized closely for the past thirty years by philosophers, journalists, tourists, book-makers, and residents, and that whatever there is of interest or novelty to be told about them has been told already. Their failings have been "sized up," their virtues extolled, and mixed residence will certainly not produce any new crop of literature about them or expose them to any fresh observation.

THE CHIONG-CHIU OUTRAGE.

Recently a sketchy rumour reached Tokyo to the effect that Japanese subjects had been roughly handled by Chinese in Chiong-chiu. Details are now published. Since Japan obtained from China a promise that the province of Fukkien should not be alienated, the Fukkienese, it is said, have become persuaded that their destiny is to pass under Japanese rule, and they accordingly devote themselves assiduously to currying favour with the Japanese. The effect of this new disposition has been manifested strongly in the domain of religious propagandism. The Buddhists of Hongwanji have representatives in Fukkien who are actively engaged in the work of proselytizing. Of late—that is to say, since the non-alienation engagement—marked success has attended the efforts of these propagandists. They have now a thousand converts in Amoy, eight hundred in Chiong-chiu and six hundred in Tswan-chiu. On the 20th of January, two Japanese engineers who had been engaged surveying the new settlement in Amoy, paid a sight-seeing visit to Chiong-chiu, and were shown round by their countryman, the Buddhist priest. While passing through one of the streets, they were set upon by a number of native Roman Catholics, dragged from their palanquins, haled off to the Roman Catholic Church, and treated with great indignity in the presence of a Spanish padre. The engineers shook the dust of Chiong-chiu off their feet as speedily as possible, but the Buddhist priest insisted on remaining, despite the urgent advice of the Japanese Consul in Amoy. Finally the Consul sent his constables to compel the withdrawal of the priest. But after the latter had retired to Amoy his former parishioners made constant applications for his return, and finally he went back to Chiong-chiu, the Consul having obtained an engagement from the local authorities of that place that they would protect him. Such is the story told by Tokyo newspapers. It is the first example of Japanese religionists' encountering difficulties which are only too familiar to Western propagandists.

SILVER COINS.

According to the Yoroku Chōho the Treasury has disposed of all the silver coins that flowed into its vaults in connexion with the adoption of the gold standard. Our contemporary alleges that the amount was only 7 million yen, but we presume that it refers only to the coins presented in exchange for gold, inasmuch as the aggregate value of the silver with which the Treasury had to deal was nearer seven times seven, than simply seven, millions. However, taking the item of intelligence for what it may be worth, we read that three millions out of the seven were coined into 50-sen pieces; one million was coined into 20-sen and 10-sen pieces, and the remaining three millions have been lent to the Bank of Formosa.

THE PRESS AND VISCOUNT AOKI.

April 4.

The Yomiuri Shimbun continues its campaign against Viscount Aoki, probably on the principle that constant dropping wears a stone. As to the value of the attack, we need only mention the three principal counts. They are, first, that the Fuhkien guarantee has not been converted into a practical reality; secondly, that Japan did not take the lead in withdrawing her troops from Peking; and, thirdly, that Kang Yu-wei has been sent to England instead of receiving continued asylum in Japan. The first of these charges obviously means that Japan should insist on obtaining a naval station in Fuhkien. It can not mean anything else. Of course, such a demand preferred by Japan would be a complete subversion of the policy pursued by her towards China during the past two years; the policy which may be said to have been inaugurated by Count Okuma and which now has his explicit approval. Count Okuma is the leader of the Progressists, and the Yomiuri Shimbun is a Progressist organ. So we have Viscount Aoki attacked by a Progressist journal for not doing what the Progressist leader disapproves! That is certainly a case of any stick to beat a dog. Concerning the second count, that Japan did not take the initiative in withdrawing her troops from Peking, it is obviously not to be interpreted as a plea for greater gentleness towards China, because that would be quite inconsistent with the idea of appropriating a part of Fuhkien. What the Yomiuri means is that Japan should place herself in the van of all the Treaty Powers when Chinese questions are on the tapis. She should have been the first to send troops to Peking and the first to withdraw them. In short, Japan is expected by the Yomiuri to step into the place hitherto occupied by Great Britain in the Far East, and because she does not immediately carry out that "tall order," her Foreign Minister is abused! Kang Yu-wei's case has the same sweetly reasonable elements to recommend it. There has not been any question of refusing asylum to the rash refugee. What has happened is that he was assisted to transfer himself to England as a measure of temporary expediency. He need not have gone had he pleased to remain. We do not even know that the Minister of Foreign Affairs had anything whatever to do with the arrangement. If he had, it was certainly not in an official capacity, not is it to be interpreted for a moment as a concession to any representation made by China. The Yomiuri seems to have entered upon this campaign in a very light-hearted manner.

April 6.

Some of the Tokyo newspapers, led by the Nippon, continue their attacks upon Viscount Aoki. We have seldom seen a less substantial basis of assault. The allegation made is that Viscount Aoki, who was Japan's Representative in Berlin at the time of the Shimonoseki negotiations, failed to warn the Tokyo Government of the coup contemplated by the Three Powers with regard to Liaotung. It is late in the day to advance such a charge, and, as to its justice, any one at all familiar with the ways of diplomacy must understand that if the German Government desired to keep the Japanese Representative in ignorance of negotiations which it was carrying on with Paris and St. Petersburg, no astuteness on the part of the Representative could have enabled him to penetrate the veil of secrecy. Berlin is not like Peking. If the German Foreign Office wants to hide its doings from the world, it can do so effectually at all times; none of its own officials will be found to betray its trust. Some happy chance might enable Viscount Aoki to discover what was on foot, but chance alone could have come to his aid, and we can scarcely blame a diplomat because chance does not always favour him. Germany's action on that occasion took the world by surprise. She probably looks back upon it with surprise herself now. The Government in Tokyo had no suspicions, though it received from Baron Gutschmid communications which are said to have been intended to convey a warning, and the Government in Berlin took thorough precautions to hide its hand from Europe. The British Representative in Peking did not inform Lord Salisbury that Russia was about to preler in Peking a demand virtually amounting to the cession of Manchuria, yet we have never heard him accused of incompetence or perfunctoriness. Another point which occurs at once to every thoughtful person, and which ought to occur to our Tokyo contemporaries if they had any desire to be fair, is that the Liaotung coup was planned in St. Petersburg, not in Berlin, and, moreover, that Paris ought to have been as favourable a place for collecting information as the German capital. Yet we have never heard the Japanese Representatives in St. Petersburg and Paris blamed for failing to warn the Tokyo Government of what was going forward. We do not know what standard of diplomatic acumen the journalistic assailants of Viscount Aoki may have in view, but we can assure them that their accusation in this instance assumes, in foreign eyes, the semblance of unreasoning prejudice.

BLUE BOOKS.

One luxury of modern civilization to which Japan has not yet aspired is the publication of blue books. Some of the despatches relating to the Shimonoseki negotiations were submitted to the Diet, and therefore found their way into the newspapers, but with that single exception we do not remember that the Government's correspondence has ever been presented for the nation's approval. Why should there be that marked difference between the practice of Japan and the practice of Western countries? We are aware that England has not published many blue books about Japan since 1871. But she did publish one of great interest and importance with reference to Treaty Revision, and there has not been any other affair specially calling for such procedure on her part. The Chuo Shimbun seems to have reason on its side when it urges that the best way to educate an intelligent perception of foreign policy is to publish blue books, and that if the Japanese people knew a little more of what is going on, they would be much better prepared to support the Government. Viscount Aoki might make a record by inaugurating the publication of blue books.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

The action of the Figaro in publishing documents connected with the Dreyfus case, and in continuing to publish them despite the institution of legal proceedings against the journal, seems at first sight very reprehensible. But, after all, what the French paper is doing in defiance of the law might be done by an English journal with impunity. Were the Dreyfus trial occurring in London, every word uttered in the Court and every document produced in evidence would appear in the newspapers within a few hours, and nobody would find anything blame-worthy in such publicity. They manage things differently in Paris. As Englishmen we disagree with their system, and are disposed to admire, rather than to censure, the Figaro for its courageous adoption of methods which we have learned to regard as sound and wholesome. It is unquestionably wrong to comment journalistically on a case which is still sub judice, but it can not be wrong merely to report the proceedings of a judicial tribunal from day to day.

We have just learned, with interest, the theory entertained about the Dreyfus affair in the best informed circles in Berlin. It is there confidently believed that Dreyfus, though he unquestionably violated the trust reposed in him, and therefore deserved to be punished, was not guilty of treachery in the ordinary acceptation of the term. His revelations were made to the Russian Government. Official application had been addressed by St. Petersburg to Paris for drawings of the new French military rifle and for explanations as to the manufacture of its ammunition. France expressed willingness to comply with her ally's request provided that Russia entrusted to French arsenals the duty of supplying the necessary rifles and ammunition. The Authorities in St. Petersburg declined to adopt that course, their objection being economical, namely, that, having workshops of their own, they did not care to incur the needless expense of going abroad for articles which they could manufacture for themselves. There the matter ended, officially speaking. But Russia took steps to obtain privately the information denied to her publicly, and Dreyfus assisted her efforts. He did not consider that there could be any question of treachery in making, to his country's ally, revelations which his superiors were avowedly willing to make in consideration of employment for French arsenals. He did not sell secrets, as has been generally stated. It is believed that no money passed—, the wealth of the Dreyfus family being opposed to such a theory—but that Dreyfus merely hoped to receive a Russian decoration for his services. Such, we are informed, is the version generally credited in Berlin. A further conviction entertained in Germany is that, had Dreyfus been a Christian, the world would never have heard anything more about him. But the Jews took up the matter, and by their money and influence succeeded in making it the cynosure of universal attention. That does not mean, of course, that the Jews sought to obstruct the course of justice; they doubtless believed honestly that an injustice had been done, and that it was their duty to redress it, if possible.

That is the Berlin version. We may supplement it by saying that, so far as we know, the Jews were challenged originally by certain Parisian journals which imported the racial question into the discussion from the very outset.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN FOREIGNERS AND JAPANESE.

The Committee of the Yokohama Foreign Chamber of Commerce seem to have given very careful thought to the Arbitration scheme submitted by them to the Chamber at the last general meeting. It is an eminently practical idea that recourse to litigation should be avoided as far as possible, especially where full confidence is not felt in the ability of the Law Courts. Many years must pass before foreigners learn to lay aside the doubts that experience has engendered as to the competence of Japanese tribunals; and even though such doubts did not exist, wise men will always prefer to avoid the delays, vexations and expenses of the law. The public has consequently awaited with much interest the statement of this scheme which the Committee of the Yokohama Chamber were understood to be elaborating. Kobe had set the example but, as Mr. Flint Kilby succinctly pointed out at the meeting of the Yokohama Chamber, the Kobe project does not appear calculated to work well in practice. It provides for the appointment of two arbiters—a Japanese and a foreigner—and it further provides that, in the event of their disagreement, the question is to be submitted to an umpire. Now, in the great majority of cases, it is strongly probable that the arbiters would disagree. Mr. Kilby says—and the Committee of the Chamber endorse his view—that, as a rule, a Japanese approaches the task of arbitration with a conviction that his duty is to act as advocate for the Japanese party in the dispute, and it thus follows that unless right is on the Japanese side, there can be no agreement between the arbiters. Hence the net issue of the Kobe plan is that the onus of deciding will fall on a solitary individual, the umpire. Such an arrangement may occasionally succeed, but the objections to it are obvious. Yokohama's programme is different. It contemplates the organization of a joint Committee—ten from each Chamber—which Committee nominates as many of its own members, or of the other members of the Chambers, as may seem desirable, to act as arbiters. These arbiters investigate the case, and report their decision, if they arrive at one, to the joint Committee, who accept it as final. If, however, the arbiters can not agree, they simply submit their investigations and individual opinions to the joint Committee, and the duty of deciding by a majority vote devolves upon the latter. There is, finally, a provision that in the event of an equal vote in the joint Committee, the arbitration falls through, unless the joint Committee agree to appoint an umpire. On the whole this plan seems the best that can be devised. There is no apparent reason why it should not work satisfactorily, if the Japanese Chamber of Commerce agrees to cooperate.

JAPAN'S FUTURE FOOD SUPPLIES.

The report of the Yokohama Foreign Chamber of Commerce for 1898 indicates great care and research on the part of the compilers. This remark applies especially to the analysis of imports prepared by Mr. Sale, which shows, in a clear form, the tendency of the trade since 1892. Mr. Sale's manner of grouping the figures is very suggestive. His results confirm the contention so often advanced by the Fiji Shimpō, that Japan is becoming more and more dependant on foreign countries for food stuffs. Her imports in that category totalled nearly 87 million yen in 1898 against 14½ millions in 1892. Of course 1898 and 1897 were exceptional years, for, owing chiefly to bad crops of rice, the import of that cereal rose from its normal figure of 4 or 5 million yen to 21½ millions in 1897 and 48 millions in 1898. But even if rice be altogether excluded from the account, we still have the fact that the imports of bread stuffs aggregated 38½ million yen in 1898, against 12½ millions in 1892. Besides, apart from the quality of the rice harvest, it can not be doubted that the consumption of rice in Japan is increasing much faster than its production, and that the supply obtained from abroad will grow steadily.

Another fact emphasized by Mr. Sale's résumé is the gradual development of manufacturing industry in Japan. The imports of raw materials grew from 26 million yen in 1892 to 77 millions in 1898, and the imports of machinery and railway materials from 1½ millions to 18 millions. As to actual amount these are small figures, but their significance is not to be mistaken.

CONTRACT PROPOSED BY THE YOKOHAMA FOREIGN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

April 5.

Looking, as outsiders, at the form of contract proposed by the Yokohama Foreign Chamber of Commerce in the case of goods imported to Japanese order, we find some of its provisions decidedly harsh. For example, the 3rd Article says that "if arrival date is specified, the date of the arrival of the vessel in Yokohama is to be accepted, but over-carriage, and/or miscarriage is to be at buyer's risk, subject to any claim recoverable from the ship;" and the 5th Article adds that "the sellers are in no way responsible for any delay in shipment or arrival, if caused by circumstances beyond their control, including strikes, break-down of manufacturers' machinery, or accident to the vessel carrying the goods, and in the event of delay from such causes the buyers agree to extend date of shipment or arrival as may be necessary." Is it fair that all these risks should be placed on the buyer's shoulders? According to ordinary business principles it would seem to be right that a merchant who enters into a contract to deliver goods at a certain price within a certain time should be prepared to give practical effect to his agreement, and should not require the other contracting party to accept the whole responsibility for accidents or misadventures with which he, the second party, has no direct connexion. Delivery, it seems to us, should mean actual delivery to the buyer, not mere arrival in the harbour, for the buyer can not interfere in any way with the transport of the goods until they are taken out of the ship and passed through the customs. Then again, incidents such as strikes and break-down of manufacturers' machinery may be made matters of negotiation between the foreign contractor and the foreign industrial, but they are entirely beyond the reach of negotiation by the Japanese buyer, and it does not appear just that the latter alone should bear the inconvenience of these mishaps.

The 4th Article, also, suggests a query. "should a part only of the goods be late," it says, "the option" (of cancelling the contract) "extends only to the part late, and the buyers agree to take delivery of all that fulfils the shipment or arrival date specified." It is easy to conceive certain classes of goods to which this provision could not be applied without great hardship to the buyer. Machinery is an example. Part of a plant of machinery might arrive up to date, and the remainder might be delayed so long as to fatally cripple the enterprise contemplated by the buyer.

Finally, Article 7 lays down that "should the goods on arrival prove to be somewhat different from sample (though not to such an extent as to alter their character) they shall be accepted under the contract on a reduction in the price being made to the extent of the difference in the market value on the day of arrival between the goods as received and the sample." It is easy to sympathise with the bitter experiences which prompted the insertion of this Article, but it is not easy to endorse the idea that a buyer should be bound by written promise to accept goods different from those that he orders. He may want them to match goods already in his possession, or he may have other reasons to desire exact agreement with the sample, yet he is obliged to give a pledge that he will be content with goods merely "of the same character" as those that he wants.

It strikes us that if the places of the foreign seller and the Japanese buyer were reversed, such a contract would be thrown out of court at once. No Occidental buyer would sign it. The foreign middleman owes his strong position in Japan's trade to the fact that he takes upon himself every legitimate risk—often he goes a good deal farther—and thus becomes an ideal agent. It would be a great pity if he himself abandoned that recommendation and put a weapon into the hands of competitors.

April 7.

With reference to our comments on the form of contract proposed by the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce in the case of goods imported to Japanese order, it has been pointed out to us that, although our criticisms may seem fair from an outsider's point of view, they do not commend themselves to persons possessing intimate knowledge of the conditions of the import trade in Yokohama. Experts are said to be of the opinion that such terms, or something very like them, are almost essential in the interests of sound trade. It is further anticipated that they will be accepted by buyers as well as sellers, and it is added that they are not simply conditions formulated by foreigners in their own interests, but that they will be endorsed and approved by leading Japanese importers, who fully recognise their desirability. To all these considerations every weight is due. It is for the Sakamaki Yasu (40-, who, in conjunction with her son murdered her husband on April 30th of the 30th year of Meiji, and was sentenced to death in the Tokyo District Court, was executed at Ichigaya Jail on Wednesday morning, her appeal before the Court of Cassation being dismissed.

An idea seems to prevail in some quarters that the Minister of Foreign Affairs has recommended the issue of an Imperial Ordinance defining what is meant by "superficies" and what rights of land tenure will be enjoyed by foreigners under the Revised Treaties. Such a notion is very quaint. The Government would scarcely be disposed to assume the function of interpreter to the Judiciary, even though the latter were required to solve a really perplexing problem. But the whole perplexity is this case arises from the unwillingness of certain writers to admit that they have been discovering ambiguities where ambiguities do not exist. The question of "superficies" is clear as daylight, and would be perfectly clear to the most sceptical could they persuade themselves to imagine that although a particular provision of law is not found among the statutes of England, it may nevertheless be an intelligible and practical enactment. At any rate, if these good people intend to wait until the Government issues an Ordinance for the purpose of solving private doubts which have no basis of fact, we apprehend that their patience will be sorely taxed.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE.

It is a matter of public congratulation that the International Committee of Yokohama is to continue its labours. Under the able presidency of Mr. R. D. Robison, whose great tact and untiring diligence in the interests of the community deservedly elicited a special vote of thanks at the recent meeting of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, the Committee has accomplished most excellent results. Not only has it been able to make valuable suggestions which have received due attention in Japanese official quarters, but it has also established between the foreign community and the Japanese Authorities relations of a useful and wholesome character. As a point of etiquette such a Committee can not obtain diplomatic recognition, for, being cosmopolitan, it has no claim upon the good offices of any particular Foreign Representative. Possibly that fact may hamper its operations, more or less, though we do not see why the British subjects on the Committee, for example, should not be able, in their national capacity, to obtain from the British Minister any information or advice that he is in a position to give. That is a secondary matter, however. The great point is that the Committee constitutes a direct channel of communication between the community and the Japanese Government, and that its representations do not savour of complaint or protest, but bear the character of suggestions prompted by considerations of mutual interest and benefit. We understand that the action of the Committee has the full appreciation of the Japanese Government, and that its usefulness is thoroughly recognised.

REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

The movement in favour of reducing the establishment of the Japanese army seems to be acquiring considerable dimensions. Two newspapers, the Nippon and the Yoroku Choko, have constituted themselves its champions, and are working the matter very cleverly. They claim that Count Inouye is on their side, and Count Inouye's name is one to conjure with. They also marshal as their allies Viscount Nomura, Mr. Kusaka and Viscount Miura, and they allege that even Marquis Yamagata, Viscount Katsura and Count Kaba-yama have been brought to the same way of thinking. Another point put forward—with what accuracy we can not tell—is that Count Okuma, when he occupied the post of Minister Resident, was disposed to introduce a scheme of military retrenchment, but encountered strong opposition from Viscount Kawakami, and that Count Inouye, when he held the portfolio of Finance, actually drafted a programme of reduction but was prevented by his colleagues from carrying it out. We find it very difficult to express our opinion clearly upon this point, for although our views are of the most emphatic character, and although we believe that the future lying before Japan is one which she can not possibly control and which she must be prepared to face boldly, we also believe that a newspaper ceases to be useful and becomes simply mischievous when it contributes in any way to the disturbance of international relations.

JAPANESE MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY.

Some very suggestive remarks about the prospects of industrial enterprise in Japan are made by the Yoji Shimpō. The comparative cheapness of skilled labour originally constituted this country's strong point in competition with other States. But that advantage has disappeared, in our contemporary's opinion. Wages have risen so rapidly during the past few years, in company with the appreciation of commodities, that the price of labour in Japan no longer contrasts, in any very marked degree, with its price in Occidental countries. What manufacturers should now make their chief aim is the development of skill on the part of artisans. There does not, however, appear to be any very plain evidence that progress is being made in that direction. In certain parts of Japan, as Joshu, Ashikaga, and so on, the apprentice system is followed at weaving establishments, and it results that really competent workmen are obtained; experts fully versed in every detail of their trade. But in the match-making and cotton-spinning industries a very different state of affairs prevails. Statistics for 1897 show that out of 71,000 hands, no less than 31,000 were changed within the year, and only 160 had stuck to the work for ten years. The consequences are that a large part of the official staff must devote their time solely to hunting up new employés, and that only a very small fraction of the hands develop anything like expert skill.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA.

The time for the Nippon Yusen Kaisha to make its half-yearly statement of accounts being at hand, conjectures are published by Tokyo newspapers as to the amount of the dividend that will be declared. Ten per cent. is the sum apparently regarded as most probable. The Company's circumstances are now very flourishing. During the past two years, it has been obliged to keep large sums of money lying idle—the price of steamers in course of construction in Europe—but that is now at an end, for the steamers, having been completed, will henceforth be a paying asset. Then, again, by the Diet's endorsement of the special subsidy bill, all anxiety as to the success of the European and American services is dispelled, so that, from every point of view, the shareholders may congratulate themselves.

THE TOKIO STOCK EXCHANGE.

The new buildings of the Tokyo Stock Exchange were formally opened on the 2nd instant. They are situated near Yoro-bashi and are constructed in tolerably attractive style, which gains a great deal by comparison with its surroundings. There are six edifices, covering an area of 678 tsubo (24,408 square feet), and the sum expended on them was 280,000 yen. This Exchange is now a highly prosperous concern. When it was started, in 1878, the business done was a mere bagatelle, but the daily transactions at present average from twenty thousand to fifty thousand shares. Mr. Kaneko Kentaro is the Chief Manager, and under his able control the system has been largely improved.

A STORM IN A TEAPOT.

All things considered, Sendai is one of the most backward of Japanese towns. But it is not to be beaten in sensationalism. The more insignificant the incident the more momentous is it made to appear by the poorly educated scribblers who supply material for the local press. A case in point is the disturbance that took place at one of the Rev. S. S. Snyder's preaching stations on the evening of the 29th ult. It seems that in order to attract an audience Mr. Snyder has been in the habit of holding magic-lantern meetings in a house in Miya-machi, Sendai, and that on several occasions people who love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil, have utilised the opportunity to cut holes in tatami and otherwise injure mission property. Mr. Snyder, some weeks ago, applied to the police, and they promised to send a constable to attend each of the meetings, and up to the 29th fulfilled the promise. On that evening the absence of the policeman was taken advantage of by a lad to cut a large hole in one of the mats. He was caught in the act, and, just before the closing hymn was given out, Mr. Snyder's attention was called to what the lad had done. There being no policeman in the room, Mr. Snyder seized the culprit, and, in order to prevent his escape during the singing of the hymn, bound his hands together with a piece of the cord that was attached to the curtain hanging in front of the magic lantern. Just as the proceedings closed and Mr. Snyder was about to take the boy to the Police Station, a policeman arrived, who, however, was hopelessly tipsy. Mr. Snyder learnt subsequently that this man was not on duty, though he wore uniform, and had not been sent to the place by his superior officer for the sake of keeping order. The man seems to have blustered a great deal and to have annoyed Mr. Snyder so much that he threatened to turn him out of the house. As soon as Mr. Snyder discovered that the policeman had no authority to act, he sent off to the police station for another policeman, but before the latter arrived the first policeman had absconded, taking the boy with him, whom he immediately released.

Mr. Snyder reported the whole affair at the Head Police Office the next day, and asked whether policemen who were supposed to be off duty were allowed to go about the streets in uniform in a state of intoxication and were warranted in interfering in disputes of any kind between citizens. He asked for the name of the delinquent policeman, but did not succeed in obtaining it.

This story has been twisted into every conceivable shape by the local press and copied into one or two Tokyo journals. The fact that the policeman who interfered was tipsy has been carefully suppressed, while the dreadful outrage on one of His Imperial Majesty's subjects committed by the foreigner is, according to the newspapers of Sendai, about to engage the attention of the Japanese Cabinet. Not a word is said about the losses already sustained by the mission or the insults they have submitted to from the people of the neighbourhood. Day after day tissues of falsehood have been published and devoured by a gullible public which seems only too glad to find fresh reasons for abusing the foreigner.

If the newspapers of Sendai would call the attention of citizens to the filthy habits of the lower orders, would condemn the insulting language often used to foreign ladies and children as they pass through the streets, the defacing of the names that foreigners put on their gates, the bespattering with mud the posts of their main entrances, and the commission of offences too indecent to be mentioned in print; if they would point out that many of the poorer residents of Sendai are on a level with very low-class Ainos as regards habits and manners—instead of writing in defence or extenuation of schoolboy insolence—they would show the world that they are competent leaders of public opinion. Whether the act which has given occasion for all the commotion—the binding of the boy's hands—was advisable is certainly open to question, other methods of preventing the culprit's escape being capable of adoption. But we are assured by Mr. Snyder himself that the interference of the drunken policeman and the mistaken accounts of the affair to which it gave plausibility are the real cause of the dimensions which a trifling incident has assumed. Sendai is one of the largest of Japan's cities, but the local press is by no means a credit to the town, and when mixed residence comes and foreigners pass under Japanese laws the amount of harm that the local sensation-mongers may do by anti-foreign agitation is a factor to be included in our forecast of the future. The local authorities are averse to giving information to the press, and are quite powerless to interfere with newspaper writers so long as these do not violate the press laws. It would greatly facilitate the easy working of the new treaties if official accounts of incidents that concern foreigners could be furnished by the departments which are in possession of all the facts. As regards the suppression of anti-foreign feeling, that the authorities could do much more than they have ever attempted is the opinion of all who have paid any attention to the subject. That insults to foreigners are winked at by school-teachers and others in Government employ is a well-known fact.

REDUCTION OF MILITARY ARMAMENTS.

Judging from the indications given by vernacular newspapers it would seem that the agitation in favour of reducing the scheme of military expansion is extending among Japanese statesmen. Count Inouye is still pointed to as the chief advocate of the idea, though it is not distinctly stated whether he recommends an extension of the period for completing the present programme, or advocates a reduction of the programme itself. The Yomiuri is the latest journal to champion this particular form of retrenchment, but the Yomiuri spoils its case by reckless statements. It alleges, for example, that the wealth of Japan is only from five to six thousand million yen. If that were the case, an annual expenditure of two hundred millions would be from 4 to 5 per cent. of the total wealth, a monstrously extravagant ratio. This renewal of an agitation which seemed tolerably powerful last year seems—if it has any substantial basis at all—to be mainly suggested by the difficulty which the Japanese Government experiences in obtaining money abroad on easy terms. There is no doubt that Japan has injured her own credit. The political parties may place that achievement to their score. A recent return showed that the sums lying on deposit or at current account in the banks of London and its neighbourhood aggregate 300 million pounds sterling; that is to say, 3,000 million yen. That immense total is probably not earning more than 2 per cent., on the average, and its owners are anxiously looking out for better investments, while Japan, on her side, is crippled for want of funds, would gladly pay 4 per cent., and offers a perfectly safe investment. Yet the willing lenders and the anxious borrower can not come together.

A "LECTURE ROOM LAWYER."

Dr. Lönholm's digest of Japanese laws, compiled at the request of the International Committee of Yokohama, is a book of the greatest value to every one desirous of making himself acquainted with the systems under which we shall all pass a few months hence. But it is a book decidedly inconvenient to persons who find profitable employment in raising doubts about Japanese laws and Japanese systems. One of those persons recently referred to Dr. Lönholm's digest as "the vain imagining of a lecture room lawyer." Had this courageous disparagement been accompanied by any demonstration of its justice; had any serious attempt been made to prove that Dr. Lönholm merited such a description, the charge might have been excusable. But the writer did not concern himself about trifles of that kind. It suited his immediate purpose to belittle Dr. Lönholm, and he proceeded to belittle him with fine indifference to facts. It happens, however, that before Dr. Lönholm accepted the Chair of German Law in the Imperial University of Japan, he had served for many years as a judge in his own country, and, so far from being a mere "lecture-room lawyer," he is, consequently, a practised judicial official. He is very unlikely to trouble himself about such charges or to make any effort to refute them, but, since we are acquainted with the facts, it is our business to state them.

IRON.

An extraordinary statement appears in the columns of the Kokumin: namely, that the supply of iron ore procurable in Japan is quite insufficient for the purposes of the new Iron Foundry, and that recourse must be had to China. It is added that the real object of Professor Wada's visit to China is to negotiate the purchase of a mine at Siat-san, about 7 miles from Hankow, which produces excellent iron, as has been proved by the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha's trial exports of the ore. We call this an extraordinary statement because it has been fully understood and officially stated that the project of the Iron Foundry, which is involving such a large outlay, would never have been seriously entertained had not there been solid assurance that the domestic supplies of iron ore would be found ample. Japan's position is not greatly improved by the possession of an iron foundry of her own if she is to remain dependant on a foreign country for her supply of ore.

POLICE MISCONDUCT.

Circumstantial accounts are published of gross misconduct on the part of two constables of the Water Police Mr. Murayama Jiro, a Superintendent of Water Police, returning from an entertainment given at Mukojima, discovered, as he supposed, that his watch had been stolen. His suspicions falling on a woman-servant named Aka, employed in his household, he communicated with the police, and they arrested the woman. The two constables who had apprehended her beat her so severely when they got her to the station that she confessed herself the stealer of the watch. But she was of course unable to give any indication of its whereabouts, and, while the police were questioning her, Mr. Murayama arrived to say that the watch had not been stolen at all, but had been lying, all the while, in the pocket of one of his coats. The two constables have been dismissed from the force in disgrace, and the sub-inspector who directed them to arrest the woman has been allowed to resign, but Mr. Murayama remains in office. We do not see why he should suffer at all, for he merely informed the police of his supposed loss, but some of our Tokyo contemporaries write as though he deserved condign punishment.

THE OPERATION OF THE REVISED TREATIES.

Information is published by the Chiuo Shimbun to the effect that the French Government has declined to ask the Chamber to alter the date for putting the Franco-Japanese Revised Treaty into operation. By an oversight on the part of the Japanese official charged with the duty of negotiating the Treaty, the date was put at August 4th instead of July 17th, and the French Government, very reasonably as we think, considers that the troublesome process of a special reference to parliament would not be warranted for the sake of so trivial a matter. Nineteen days sooner or later need not give any concern to any one. We presume that the Japanese Government does not contemplate the taxation of foreigners before October 1st, and there is really no other question of any great importance connected with the date.

THE SHANGHAI COTTON MILLS.

On Wednesday a telegram was published in Tokyo to the effect that the Cotton Mills in Shanghai had decided to put a stop to night working, and that the price of raw cotton had declined heavily in consequence. The following day, the intelligence was corrected, the correction being that only two mills had adopted that course, and that the step taken by them was for a limited time, ending on the 30th of last month.

THE KIRIN BREWERY.

Japanese newspapers allege that Kanagawa Prefecture is likely to be the scene of an agitation similar to that caused by the poisonous refuse of the Ashiwo Mine. They say that the crops in Hommoku district have suffered seriously from the oily emanations of the Kirin Brewery; that a meeting of farmers has taken place to discuss the matter, and that representations have been made to the Governor.

MURAI BROTHERS.

The Murai Brothers, who gained such unenviable notoriety last year in connexion with the "Virgin Cigarettes," are said to have sold their business to an American firm for 300,000 yen. The firm will take over the concern from July next, and will give employment to the Messrs. Murai. The latter are reported not to have made a success. They have liabilities aggregating 250,000 yen, and Dr. Hashimoto, of the Red Cross Hospital, having examined the "Hero" and "Sunrise" cigarettes, their principal articles of sale, condemns them as deleterious to the lungs, so that the Murai prospects are clouded. The Chino Shimbun tells this story, but we find it rather incredible.

R. I. P.

An incident worth notice has been brought to our attention. In 1868, an officer of H.B.M.S. Sylvia was taken seriously ill and landed on the island of Hiroshima, where he died and was buried. Naturally the grave, being situated in a place very seldom visited by Englishmen, received no attention at the hands of the dead man's countrymen. But the Japanese villagers seem to have considered that some duty of hospitality devolved on them in connexion with the event. They erected a tomb-stone over the remains of the unknown stranger, and tended the grave so carefully that it attracted the attention of Captain Conner, of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, who had occasional opportunities of landing on Hiroshima during the course of his voyages to and from Shanghai. He mentioned the matter to Mr. T. B. Glover, who spoke of it to H.B.M.'s Consul in Kobe, and the latter, having addressed the Governor of Hiroshima Prefecture on the subject, received the following reply:—

[TRANSLATION.]

February 18th, 1899.

SIR.—Your letter of June 22nd, 1898, addressed to the Governor of Hiroshima Ken, requesting that an enquiry might be made regarding the grave of an officer of H.M.S. Sylvia, was referred to me, as no record was said to exist in that Prefecture. Taking it upon myself to reply to your letter I have the honour to inform you that investigations have been made with the result given below, the position of the grave, the tombstone, etc., being shown on the enclosed plan.

I have, etc.,

YOSHIWARA SABURO, [L.S.]

Governor of Kagawa Prefecture.

J. C. HALL, Esquire,
H.B.M. Consul, Kobe.

In the 1st year of Meiji, corresponding to A.D. 1868, H.B.M.S. Sylvia was proceeding on a voyage through the Inland Sea when an officer on board, named Lake, fell ill. He was landed on the island of Hiroshima, Hiroshima-mura, Naka-gori, in the province of Sanuki, Kagawa Prefecture, while the Sylvia proceeded along the coast of Hiroshima and cast anchor in Enoura Bay to await the officer's recovery. In a few days, however, he died; and Captain St. John buried his remains in ground belonging to the temple of Ikwoji above Enoura shrine, and, having set up a wooden cross to mark the grave, departed.

Several years afterwards, when this monument had almost decayed from the effects of wind and rain, frost and snow, Awaburi Tukuan, Superior of Ikwoji, and others said: "Truly it would be too sad if the grave of our solitary guest from afar, who has become a spirit in a strange land, were suffered to pass out of all knowledge." Thereupon Terawaki Kaemon, head of a village company, and other sympathizers such as Oka Ryohaku, set on foot a scheme for the erection of a stone monument, and, the shore-folk all with one accord tending their help, the work was finally brought to completion. This was on the 7th day of the 11th month of the 4th year of Meiji, that is, 1871. Since then nearly thirty winters have passed, during which time the islanders have not neglected to take good care of the tomb. In particular, from the 10th to the 16th day of the 7th month, old style, there are still persons found who every year clean and sweep the grave, and, offering up flowers and incense, mourn for and console the spirit of the dead.

LITERARY NOTES.

There has just been printed at the Cambridge University Press a work by Professor Takahashi Sakuye entitled "Cases on International Law during the China-Japanese War." It has a preface by Professor T. E. Holland, and an introduction by Professor J. Westlake. From a prospectus of the Work, issued by Messrs. C. J. Clay and Sons, we take the following:—

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE BY PROFESSOR HOLLAND.

The author of this book, my friend Professor Takahashi, thinks that a few words of introduction from an Oxford colleague may commend it to English readers. I have therefore great pleasure in saying how deserving the work appears to me to be of the attention of all who are interested either in International Law or in the development of Japan.

Mr. Takahashi has exceptional claims to speak with authority upon the subject of which he treats. Becoming a Professor in the Naval College at Tokyo, he was directed to join the Atakushima, as legal adviser to the Admiral commanding the Japanese fleet, and remained on board the flag-ship nearly to the end of the war with China. Under his guidance, great pains were taken to observe in all questions of naval capture the best traditions of European Prize Courts. Several new questions were raised, and equitably dealt with. Mr. Takahashi's narrative is always clear, and his arguments are, as a rule, convincing. The value of the work is greatly increased by the official documents—proclamations, reports, opinions, conventions, and regulations—with which its statements are copiously illustrated.

EXTRACT FROM THE INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR WESTLAKE.

This book of my friend Professor Takahashi, who followed that war as adviser of the Japanese Admiral in matters of International Law, recounts the proceedings in it which bore on his science. As such it is a valuable monument of the history of the Far East, and the details with which it is enriched are the best testimony to the care with which Japan entered on a line of operations, naval and judicial, quite novel to her, while they furnish the student with an unusual opportunity of realizing the operation of the law; which is often presented to him only in the form of generalities.

On February 10th was published Mr. W. G. Aston's "History of Japanese Literature." Mr. Ed. Gosse, the projector and editor of the series in which Mr. Aston's book is included, tells us this:—

This history differs from those works which have preceded it in the fact that two-thirds of it are translation and only one-third history or criticism. The Japanese have cultivated a voluminous literature for upwards of twelve centuries, and it is probable that the richness and variety of their prose and verse will come as a revelation to English readers. One point that is very curious is that Japanese is the only language in which women excelled in classical times. Mr. Aston's estimate of and quotation from their work will be a feature of his book.

SALVATION ARMY.

On Saturday evening a successful Salvation Army demonstration was held in the Central Tabernacle, Hongo. The objects of the meeting were twofold, viz., to give a representation of Salvation Army work in different countries and also to help the funds of the Army Home for Discharged Prisoners at Okubo, near Shinjuku. A very good audience attended and gave every sign of interest in the Army work. The platform presented quite an unusual appearance, with its representatives of Army work in India, Zululand, Maori land, China, America, Australia, and various European countries. The officers representing these countries were attired in national costume, sang a Salvation hymn, and gave the statistics of Salvation Army work in that particular country. Short addresses were also given by the Rev. M. Tomonaka, Chaplain of Sugamo Prison, and Mr. Hara, who is engaged in work amongst discharged prisoners in Tokyo. This is the first meeting of the kind held by the Salvation Army in this country, and the result was considered very satisfactory.

FERRIS SEMINARY.

The "commencement exercises" of the Ferris Seminary for young ladies were held at the Van Schaick Hall, No. 178 Buff, on Tuesday evening. The programme was very attractive, and all the musical numbers were exceedingly well rendered.

The items were as follows:—

Piano Duet "The Palms" Faure.
Kume Imai and Fusa Sugawa.
Chorus..... "Song of the Sunbeam"..... Macfarren.
English Essay..... "Unexpected Treasures" Ichi Imai.
Song..... "Meadow Talk" Fisher.
Nobuji Jimbo.
Japanese Essay..... "Our Way is One" Kane Matsumura.
Piano Duet "March of the Dwarfs" Holst.
Kume Imai and Yoshi Rokkaku.
Concert Recitation..... "The Children's Hall" Longfellow.
Chorus "Chandler."
a. "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah."
b. "Son of My Soul."
Japanese Essay..... "Woman and Literature" Hiro Wada.
Vocal Trio..... "Lullaby" Emerson.
Shizu Kurimoto, Ichi Imai, and Asada Hara.
English Essay..... "Cherry-blossoms and Japanese Spirit"..... Shizu Kurimoto.
Song "The Sweet Story" Marzials.
Shogakko.

Japanese Essay..... "Yearnings of the Human Mind"..... Koto Takemura.
Piano Duet "Hymn of Praise"..... Mendelssohn.
Tetsu Sato and Sada Hayashi.

DISTRIBUTION OF CERTIFICATES.

Address Rev. E. S. Booth.
Chorus..... "Farewell Song" Wiegand.

The piano duet, "March of the Dwarfs," was performed by two such very young ladies that they might be called dwarfs themselves. The song, "The Sweet Story," was sung most impressively and sweetly by six little girls of the Primary Department. The essays, English and Japanese, were all read with great clearness and distinctness of enunciation.

The graduates were as follows:—

Grammar Department (1899):—Hiro Wada, Koto Takemura, Kane Matsumura, Ichi Imai, and Shizu Kurimoto.
Special Department:—Fusa Sugawa.

After the distribution of certificates by the Principal, Rev. E. S. Booth, assisted by the Rev. K. Hoshino, Assistant Principal, an address of congratulation and farewell was given by Mr. Booth to the graduating class. He exhorted them not to be satisfied with blossoms but to seek to bear fruit—to find their highest enjoyment in learning to serve their fellowmen. Especially were they to reflect "the light of life" to all with whom they came in contact. In this way they would reflect the greatest honour upon the Institution, and the cause of Christian education.

The Farewell Song was sung by thirteen young ladies, with piano and organ accompaniment by Miss Tetsu Sato and Miss Hama Hirano. The proceedings were brought to a close by the pronouncing of the benediction by Rev. K. Hoshino.

THE WEALTH OF JAPAN.

LAST October we published statistics compiled by a writer calling himself "Onjōji Kyōshi," with reference to the wealth of Japan. The total sum, according to his estimate, was 7,898 millions of yen, and the items were as follows:—

	Yen.
Lands	3,527,085,739
Live Stock	59,896,722
Buildings	1,082,567,116
Furniture and Fittings	541,283,558
Railways	116,171,819
Shipping	28,440,536
Merchandise	428,380,142
Specie and Bullion	139,721,201
Miscellaneous	1,974,515,681
Grand Total	7,898,061,444

Referring to this table, we said:—

The above figures are based on statistics for 1894 and 1895. In our opinion, the value of lands should be nearly doubled, and that of buildings increased by fifty per cent. It is worth noting that Giffen's estimate of the wealth of the United Kingdom in 1875 was 8,548 millions of pounds sterling, or over ten times the figure for Japan. On the whole, a yen in Japan is approximately the representative of a sovereign in England.

Mr. KUSAKA YOSHIO has now undertaken the same calculation, and, after devoting six months to the work, has arrived at these results:—

	Yen.
Lands	10,000,000,000
Live Stock	75,000,000
Buildings	1,919,000,000
Furniture and Works of Art	788,000,000
Railways, Telegraphs and Aqueducts	90,000,000
Shipping	98,000,000
Mines	405,000,000
Mining Products	272,000,000
Capital (paid up) of Companies and Banks	241,000,000
Specie and Bullion	176,000,000
Miscellaneous	1,028,000,000
Total	15,093,000,000

It will be seen that Mr. KUSAKA'S total is nearly twice that of "Onjōji Kyōshi"; that he more than doubles the latter's figure for the value of arable and forest lands, and that he nearly doubles the figure for buildings. It appears to us that Mr. KUSAKA'S estimate is nearer the truth than that of the former economist. He arrives at his results thus:—

LAND.

The total area of the land, in Japan is 413,201,088 tan (103,300,272 acres), of which 274,678,144 tan (68,669,536 acres) belong to the Government and 138,522,944 tan (34,630,736 acres) to the people. Now the total yearly produce of the people's land is 1,000 million yen annually, half of which must be set aside on account of labour and other costs of production, so that the net income derived from the land is 500 million yen, and if that be regarded as 5 per cent. of the value of the land, we get 10,000 million yen as the aggregate value of the privately owned lands. With regard to the lands owned by the Government, there are no means of making any estimate, and Mr. KUSAKA consequently omits them altogether from the list.

It will be seen that Mr. KUSAKA assesses the gross average yearly produce of the land at 28 yen an acre, approximately, and the net produce at 14 yen, or 38 shillings.

That is a liberal estimate, especially since the question of forests and moors does not appear to be taken into account. The area of forest land owned by the people is 7,300,000 cho (18,250,000 acres), and the area of moor land is 1,060,000 cho (2,650,000 acres). Deducting these figures, we find that the area of arable land owned by the people is only 13,730,706 acres, and since we know that the gross income derived from the moors and forests certainly does not exceed 40 million yen annually, it would appear that Mr. KUSAKA estimates the yield of the arable land at about 72 yen gross per acre, or 36 yen net, which seems to us to be above the mark.

Two years ago, we also examined this question, and arrived at the conclusion that the gross produce of the land, exclusive of root crops, concerning which no statistics are available, amounted to about 700 million yen annually. There was thus a difference of 300 millions between our calculation and that of Mr. KUSAKA, but without a more detailed statement of his method of reaching his conclusion, it is impossible to query his accuracy.

LIVE STOCK.

	Yen.
Number of horned cattle 1,091,360, total value at 35 yen per head	38,000,000
Number of horses 1,477,021, total value at 25 yen per head	37,000,000

Total

These figures are certainly not excessive. An average price of seventy shillings a head for cattle and 50 shillings a head for horses—although the former are diminutive in Japan and the latter mere ponies—seems to err on the side of conservatism.

BUILDINGS.

	Yen.
Number of dwellings 7,884,263, value at 200 each	1,577,000,000
Number of Shintō 190,803, value at 1,000 yen each	191,000,000
Number of Temples 71,831, value at 1,000 yen each	72,000,000
Buddhist Edōda 36,498, value at 500 yen each	18,000,000
Schools 1,594, value at 10,000 yen each	16,000,000
Departments of State 10, value at 300,000 yen each	3,000,000
City and Prefectural Offices 50, value at 30,000 yen each	3,000,000
City and Prefectural Assembly Buildings 50, value at 20,000 yen each	1,000,000
Local (District) Offices and Police Stations 1,700, value at 1,000 yen each	2,000,000
Jails 50, value at 50,000 yen each	3,000,000
Military Divisional Buildings 7, value at 500,000 yen each	4,000,000
Military Brigade Buildings 28, value at 100,000 yen each	3,000,000
Naval Ports 3, value at 1,000,000 yen each	3,000,000
Total	1,919,000,000

It will be observed that, whereas barracks are included in the above list, fortifications are excluded, and so are arsenals, private dock-yards, harbours, and factories. As to harbours, dock-yards, and factories, Mr. KUSAKA doubtless includes their value in the paid up capital of companies. Arsenals, however, might fairly be added to the list, though fortifications are properly omitted.

FURNITURE AND WORKS OF ART.

The figure under this heading is obtained by allowing an average of 100 yen per house.

RAILWAY TELEGRAPHS AND AQUEDUCTS.

The average net profit obtained from the State Railways in the last four years was 4 million yen, and if this be capitalized at 20 years' purchase, we have a value of 80 million yen. Thus the figures stand:—

	Yen.
State Railways	80,000,000
Telegraph 12,212 ri (30,530 miles) value at 450 yen per ri	6,000,000
Submarine Cable 387 nautical miles; value at 3,000 yen per mile	1,000,000
Aqueducts 100 ri (275 miles)	3,000,000
Total	90,000,000

We can not regard this estimate as quite satisfactory. Considering that the mileage of the State Railways has been steadily augmented year by year for several years past, the net profit during the last year of working would be a more correct figure for the purposes of such an account than the average profit for 4 years. But the difference would be only 20 or 30 millions at any rate. Mr. KUSAKA omits the private railways, doubtless because the cost of constructing them appears in the paid-up capital of companies. The propriety of the omission may be questioned. At the lowest estimate the market value of the private lines now in operation is 140 million yen, and if we subtract that sum from the paid-up capital (242 millions) of the companies and banks, we obtain 102 million yen as the value of all the factories, dock-yards, and other movable and immovable property of industrial and commercial associations in the empire. That is surely too low an estimate?

SHIPPING.

	Yen.
Foreign-model ship, 254,692 tons; value at 100 yen per ton	25,000,000
Japanese-model ship, 2,660,887 hoku ; value at 5 yen per hoku	15,000,000
Fishing, pleasure, and rowing boats and lighters, 200,000 hoku ; value at 5 yen per hoku	1,000,000
Men-of-war 112,760 tons; value at 500 yen per ton	56,000,000
Torpedo craft 1,898 tons; value at 590 yen per ton	1,000,000
Total	98,000,000

This is certainly a very conservative estimate so far as the Navy is concerned. The figure for men-of-war must be at least 100 million yen too small.

MINES.

The yearly yield of the mines is 40,506,833 yen, one half of which may be regarded as the cost of working. Hence capitalizing at 20 years' purchase as before, the resulting value is 405 million yen.

MARINE PRODUCTS.

The yearly yield is about 27,227,047 yen, half of which being regarded as net profit and capitalized at 20 years' purchase, the value is 272 millions.

CAPITAL (PAID UP) OF COMPANIES AND BANKS.

The total paid-up capital is 259 million yen, from which has to be deducted 17 millions, being the value (already included under the head of shipping) of the vessels (165,000 tons) belonging to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Osaka Shosen Kaisha.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There are no trustworthy data for estimating the value of miscellaneous properties. Mr. KUSAKA has therefore followed MULHALL, who adopts a figure representing 6.8 per cent. of the country's wealth. That method of calculation gives 1,028 millions of yen in Japan's case. It is difficult, however, to endorse such a manner of estimate. In Great Britain objects such as jewelry, plate, and books are included in the category of miscellaneous, and since they represent the accumulations of hundreds of years in a country where conflagrations are comparatively rare, their value must reach an enormous figure. Plate and jewelry have practically no existence in Japan, and the value of the public and private libraries does not, we think, amount to anything like as large a fraction of the national wealth as it does in Great Britain. Mr. KUSAKA, it will be observed, estimates the miscellaneous objects at a figure equal to one-tenth of the value of the land. It is a pity that he has not explained precisely what he includes under the heading. We do not pretend to assert that his figure is too large, however. What we desire to point out is the difference between England and Japan. If it be correct to assert that "miscellaneous" objects in Great Britain represent only 6.8 per cent. of the country's total wealth, then it can not be correct to say the same of Japan, where such objects are obviously of far less value comparatively than in England. On the other hand, the estimate for England may be too low. A tolerably easy way of approaching the matter is to consider, as the main basis of the estimate, the average value of the clothes, jewelry, books, household utensils, and other personal belongings of each unit of the nation. Mr. KUSAKA's figure—1028 million yen—gives 24 yen, approximately, per head of population, and that certainly does not appear excessive.

Mr. KUSAKA's principal object in making the above calculations is to obtain some means of determining what Japan's yearly national expenditure ought to be. He adopts as fundamental the rule that the State's ordinary annual outlays should not exceed $\frac{1}{10}$ of its total wealth, and thus arrives at the figure of 150 million yen for Japan, to which he adds 50 millions for extraordinary expenditures. So far as we are acquainted with the Government's estimates, there will soon be no difficulty in keeping the outlays within that total. Tokyo newspapers publish some other statements which they attribute to Mr. KUSAKA with regard to the comparative wealth and the burden of taxation in Occidental countries and in Japan. But we imagine that there is some mistake on the part of the reporter, for the wealth of each unit of the British population is put at only 383 yen, on the average, whereas it is really about 2,300 yen.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Kirisutokyō Shimbun under the title of Kokka bansai and Kirisutokyō (The permanency of the State and Christianity), calls attention to the fact that since the war with China the words Kokka bansai have been on all lips both in season and out of season. But, says this organ, the unfortunate thing is that along with a universally expressed desire for the perpetuity of Japanese nationality, there is displayed an astonishing love of change, a fickleness of disposition that is most injurious to the country. There is little use in shouting "Long live the State," unless some adequate measures are taken to impart to our institutions and our life elements of permanency. This, in the opinion of the Kirisutokyō Shimbun, only Christianity can do. The writer we are quoting sees nothing but what is artificial or superficial in every direction. The hope of immortality only exists in the minds of a few devout men and women. The temporal, the secular, the worldly are in evidence everywhere. Even the writer who more than any other foreigner has lauded the Japanese, Mr. Lafcadio Hearn, is forced to acknowledge that the idea of eternal existence is quite absent from their thoughts. Transiency, says Mr. Hearn, is written on all the phases of their life and even on their dwelling houses and their clothes. To supply the missing element in Japanese thoughts is the work that Christianity has undertaken and must carry through, concludes the Kirisutokyō Shimbun.

The organ we have just quoted draws attention to the steady growth in the number of female criminals in Japan and urges the necessity of increased religious effort among women. The following are the figures given:—In 1889, the number of female criminals was 9,411; in 1890, 13,448; in 1891, 15,317; in 1892, 17,067; in 1893, 18,421, and in 1894, 19,195. Commenting on these figures, the Kirisutokyō Shimbun says, the Japanese woman has few interests outside of her family circle, her mind is dwarfed, and petty spite and jealousy lead her to commit crimes that a better education and different social surroundings would render impossible.

Mr. Uchimura Kanzō is totally opposed to the Fukuin-domei Kai's display at the Imperial Hotel, noticed in our last Summary, and denounces the whole movement as worldly to the core. He thinks that Christians who have so little knowledge of the genius of the religion of Christ as the promoters of the meeting should be asked to leave the church. It seems that Mr. Uchimura was consulted about the scheme while it was still in embryo, and that he denounced it as claptrap and undignified, and understood that its promoters had agreed to abandon it. He now uses his powerful pen to hold it up to ridicule in the pages of the Dokuritu Zasshi. Why, he asks, was the name of a nobleman, who, as a Christian believer, occupies a back seat, paraded before the public as a promoter? Evidently only for vulgar effect. In their zeal to attract attention and impress the public, the promoters have even given titles to those who do not possess them. What joke is this? asks Mr. Uchimura. The Fukuin-domei Kai must be purged of the worldliness that now characterises it, or its usefulness as an evangelistic agency will be seriously impaired.

Professor Tsuboi Shōgorō, the ethnologist, a short time ago published an article on the religion of the Ainos from which we cull the following:—The Ainos can hardly be called polytheists, since the gods they worship are too few to warrant that title. They worship the sun-god, the water-god, the fox, the bear, and owl. They use the symbols known in Japan as the Gohei. They are not idolaters. They believe in future rewards and punishments. The good are said to go to Kamoi-yutan (Heaven or paradise) and the bad to Kokunamo Shiri. Their graves are only about a foot long. The body is wrapped up in matting when lowered to the grave. The difference between a man's and a woman's grave is made plain, but epitaphs are unknown. Visiting the tomb for the sake of worship is practically unknown. When the head of a household dies, his dwelling-house is burnt. This is done as a kind of send-off by the women folk attached to his house who, according to Aino belief, are not, like the men, allowed to be reborn in another world. The widow has to live in retirement for years and is not allowed to remarry or to permit a man to enter the house she inhabits. The first-born sometimes inherits, but not always, the youngest son or the cleverest occasionally having this honour. The Ainos believe that while physical peculiarities come from the mother all mental traits are derived from the father.

Dr. de Forest has recently published in Japanese a little book entitled "Modern Civilisation and Christianity." The author sets out by stating his belief that the terms "Modern Civilisation" and "Christianity" are capable of being defined in a simple manner and that their relation to each other may be shown without involving lengthy discussion. The chief elements of Modern Civilisation Dr. de Forest considers to be five in number; all of which, he maintains, are based on Christianity. (1) The perfect equality of all nations as recognised by international law. Each Power has its representative residing in the capital of alien states, and strenuous efforts are made to settle all disputes in a peaceful manner by means of international law. This law is still very imperfect, and there are occasionally flagrant breaches of existing law, but after all it is an element of modern civilisation second to none in importance and the idea that forms its basis, the equality of nations, is no other than the Christian doctrine that we human beings are all brothers and sisters, with the only true God as our Father.

(2).—Another important element of modern civilisation is the place of distinction that it accords to representative government. Although the idea of popular representation, like that of national equality, originated with Occidentals and never was entertained till recent times by Orientals, it would not be true to say that it is our superior cleverness which has resulted in the development of the notion that every man and woman is entitled to be represented in the governing bodies. The claim of all men to be represented is based on the dignity of man as man, and it is Christianity that has established that claim by showing what was man's origin and what is his destiny. To this religion belongs the honour of having abolished slavery.

(3).—Another element of modern civilisation is the even-handed administration of justice which it demands and the abolition of torture and other methods of perversion. This is a corollary of the doctrine of the equality of all men which Christianity proclaims.

(4).—The next element to be noticed is connected with education. The right of every child to be properly taught is acknowledged in Christian countries, though it has never been recognised in non-Christian lands. It is asserted in this country that Christianity is contrary to the Imperial Rescript and to the spirit of national education, but the truth is if it had not been for the Christian doctrine of the dignity of man, there would have been no Imperial Rescript and no such system of education as now exists.

(5).—The last element of modern civilisation to be noticed is the position of woman and her equality with man. It is acknowledged that Christianity elevated woman to her present rank in Europe and America.

The Seikyō Shimpō (No. 437) has a somewhat spun-out article on the failure of the present system of education in respect of moral teaching, and contends that without religion to back it instruction in morality is useless. While professing great loyalty to the throne the teachers in elementary schools certainly do nothing to carry out the commands of the Imperial Rescript, says this organ. The charges brought against school teachers by this writer are too general and stereotyped to merit notice here. To make school teachers responsible for the morality of the students who are only under their control for a few hours each day is quite absurd.

No. 66 of the Kyōrin, a Shintō organ, has an article by Mr. Kimura Takarō on "The object of the State and the Standard of State Religion" in which the writer endeavours to show that both Christianity and Buddhism are alien to the spirit and genius of the Japanese people and that Japan's only safe course is to purify Shintō from all the accretions of past ages and rely on it alone. According to Mr. Kimura, Messrs. Kamo Mabuchi, Motoori Norinaga and Hirata Atsutane are the only sure guides in religious matters.

Another article in the same magazine discusses in a very discerning manner the need of a reformation in Shintō. The writer is careful to state that by reformation he does not mean the adoption of new doctrines or the performance of new ceremonies, but he refers especially to a revival of interest in the time-honoured teaching of the cult and to the development of organisation suited to the age in which we live. Christianity is not successful in this country on account of its doctrines, but on account of its superior organisation. "When I say," observes Guizot, "that Christianity was connected with European civilisation and assisted its progress, I mean not Christian doctrine, but the Christian Church." This remark shows great discernment, observes the writer we are quoting. Organisation impresses in a way that doctrines by themselves never can. At the present time Shintō is without the means of making its influence felt to any great degree. Neither our temples, nor our Associations, nor our men of letters are doing what they might to bring our teaching to the notice of men of the world. Our forces need re-organising. Will nobody appear among us who is capable of rendering this service to our national religion?

In an article on the "Religious World," published in the Yomiuri Shimbun, it is alleged that the undoubted tendency of the Government is not to interfere with religion in any way, but that certain scholars have been busying themselves about the matter and are using what influence they possess in favour of restrictions on liberty. Most of these men are quite unqualified to pronounce an opinion on the subject, says the Yomiuri, having only a very superficial acquaintance with religious doctrines and practices. Yet they are endeavouring to run the Government. In the Council of High Class Education they made their voices heard and expressed the opinion that foreigners should not be allowed to establish schools in Japan. The ground we take, says the Yomiuri, is that if the Government decides to act in the matter, they must first supply themselves with reliable information. This was recognised by Count Itagaki when he was Home Minister, and he commenced to collect facts and even drafted a Bill to be presented to the Diet, but his tenure of office was short and his successor did not feel the same interest in the matter. It is quite plain that the present Government is not sufficiently well informed to warrant their taking any immediate steps, so action will have to be postponed to the next session of the Diet.

The Taiyō in discussing "Mission Schools" contends that they have proved failures. Their want of success is to be traced to two sources, says this organ. (1) The education which they impart is wholly foreign and hence is apt to have a denationalising tendency. This has been felt by Japanese connected with these schools who, in some cases, have given effect to their objections to the system of education pursued. (2) The religion taught by the missionaries connected with these schools is better suited to thoroughly uncivilised people such as are found in Africa than to the Japanese. These schools would no doubt be successful among savages. European and American missionaries are very foolish to try and induce the Japanese to accept their articles of faith. It is universally acknowledged that mission schools are on the decline. The Doshisha explosion was caused by an attempt to combine things that are incompatible. It is quite plain that the Christianity taught by missionaries, and the Christianity which thoroughly loyal Japanese are prepared to accept are quite different things and all attempts at combination of effort with foreigners in education make this more and more manifest. The article in the Taiyō (No. 4) which we are quoting resolves the whole difficulty connected with Mission Schools into deep-seated, ineradicable antagonism between Christian doctrine as taught by the majority of the missionaries and Japanese national sentiment.

Writing on Mission Schools for girls, the Taiyō says that the majority of the girls who pass through these schools do not become real Christians, and after finishing the course do not even keep up outward forms of Christianity. In recent years, continues the Taiyō, Mission Schools for boys have not been successful; partly owing to the fact that an equally good education to that offered by missionaries can be obtained at secular schools and partly owing to the refusal of the Government to exempt Mission School students from military service. Hence it is that the missionaries have concentrated their efforts on female education. Women are creatures of emotion, whose rational faculties are usually quite undeveloped. Consequently they easily receive impressions and naturally do not ask questions about the truth of what they are told. It is easy to perceive, says the Taiyō, that such soil is very suitable for receiving Christian seed. Then the paucity of good female schools in Japan helps to supply the mission schools with a never ceasing stream of candidates. . . . The Taiyō in a later part of the article asserts that the tendency of the religious teaching in mission schools is to make girls regard their own people as inferior as long as the latter remain "heathen," and proceeds to argue that when these girls become mothers the assumption of superiority learnt from the foreign lady teachers will certainly produce undesirable consequences. It is the practice of these foreign ladies, says the Taiyō, while sneering at our Japanese religious festivals and religious folk-lore, to speak of their own many superstitions as entitled to universal credence. Thus regarded from the philosophical standpoint, oriental superstition is exchanged for occidental. This is decidedly denationalising in tendency. If our women are to believe in superstitions, it is preferable that they should keep those that are current in this country. Why is it, asks the Taiyō, that we pay so little attention to female education and allow our girls to fill their heads with notions imported from foreign countries?

The Koye, the Roman Catholic organ, publishes an article entitled Shinkyō Mukyō (Protestantism is not Religion), which contains some remarkable assertions. Though Protestants pray, attend church and perform religious ceremonies, says this organ, at heart they are not really religious. The shallowness of their religious belief is illustrated by the fact that with them the advance of scholarship and the decay of faith go together. Their learned Ministers believe little and their Professors of Divinity still less. From the Divinity Chairs of Protestant Germany there come utterances that are designed to produce unbelief. The number of persons who in Protestant countries believe in the Bible as a Divine revelation has decreased enormously during the present century. . . . To come nearer home, the organ of the Lutheran Church in Japan, a magazine which maintained that the Bible is a Revelation, has been discontinued because no suitable editor could be found who is prepared to defend such a theory. The fashionable theory among Protestants is that Christianity is a philosophy. You cannot have a religion unless you have some authority to which to appeal. We appeal to the Church. To this Luther objected, and taught men to appeal to the Bible instead, leaving them to interpret it as they please. This has ended in many cases in there being no Bible revelation left. If Luther could rise from the dead and see the use to which his doctrine has been put he would not be a little surprised. To believe the Bible to be the word of God, this is religion, but Protestantism, only regards it as a text-book of philosophy, and hence cannot be called a religion.

The vicissitudes of fortune which have marked current literature in Japan during the past twelve months have been specially manifest in Buddhist periodicals. No. 146 of the Bukkyō gives a list of magazines that have become defunct during the year; which we transcribe as follows:—The Kyōkai Jigen, the Narita Shūin, the Hōshu Shūin, the Hana no Sono o, the Minoru no Haha (A woman's organ), the Mikuni no Hikari, the Shakai Hyōron, the Nori no Ame, the Katei Shimbun and the Tokiwa. Some of these had only been running for a few months when they were discontinued, while others were old established organs. The Shakai Hyōron was suppressed by the Authorities.

On January 1st two new magazines appeared: the Kokumin Dōmei kai and the Seikyō Jihō. The Hansei Zasshi changed its name to the Chūō-Kōron. The Buddhist magazines of importance still in existence are:—The Shōrai [松嶺], the Zengaku (the organ of the Zen Sect); the Kyōron (the Sotō Shū organ); the Myōshū; the Tōkō, the Shūsui Hōwa and the Shiun. The principal books that the Buddhists published during last year are:—Mr. Anezaki's "History of Indian Buddhism;" Mr. Murakami's "History of Japanese Buddhism," and "Japanese and Chinese Buddhist Chronicles," and Dr. Inouye Enryō's "Refutation of Materialism," and "Indian Philosophy."

At the 17th meeting of the Hikaku Shūkyō Gakkai (Comparative Religion Society) held a few weeks ago, the various derivations of the Japanese word Kami (God) were discussed. The derivations which have found supporters are no less than 10 in number as follow:—

(1).—Kami is alleged to be a contraction of Kangami or Kagami, a mirror, and is said to be applied to Divinity, because He clearly reflects nature. This derivation is not old. Arguments drawn from Buddhist and Confucianist applications of the term are given by those who support this etymology.

(2).—Kami is explained to be the one who is 形上 Keijō, above all form, that is one who transcends all physical nature.

(3).—Another explanation makes the term to be equivalent to 上, above, only; God being regarded as "The Most High," the title He bears in other countries.

(4).—The word is said to be an abbreviation of 明見 Akami; the idea being that all things are manifest to God. He is the all-seeing one.

(5).—The word is derived from Kashikomi, reverence, awe, say some; and thus the Supreme Being is described as the chief object of reverence.

* Literally, "The roaring of wind through pine-trees."

(6).—There are those who maintain that the characters 幽冥 Yūmei should be used for God, which are sometimes pronounced Kami, and bear the meaning of the Land of Shades, or the other world, and may have been applied to God as the ruler of that world.

(7) Others there are who would make out that Kami is a contraction of Kakushi-mi 隠身, and describes God as the one who hides Himself. But this, as was pointed out at the meeting, is a very forced analogy.

(8).—A very old derivation of the word Kami makes it to be a variation of the word Kabi, written 葦牙, and it is said to refer to the generation of a principle or a being during the time of the chaos that preceded the dividing of Heaven from earth and the separation of the male and female principles. This word has been divided up by Hirata Atsutane; the first syllable ka being explained to mean kare, and the second, bi, to be equivalent to reimyō, beautiful, but all this was pronounced fanciful at the meeting.

(9).—By others Kami is said to be derived from the ka of Kasuka (幽) indistinct and the mi of mitsuru (満) the idea being that, though invisible to human eyes "in Him all fulness dwells." This, too, was pronounced to be unconvincing.

(10).—The last etymology noticed was that which makes Kami to be a provincial rendering of Kimi, lord or master. The meeting was unable to come to any decision as to the derivation which is best supported.

Mr. Kimura Takatarō, the Nippon Shugi zealot, has published a book on the Government's recognition of Christianity entitled Yesukyō Kōnin Kahi (可否) ron, in which he has said all that is possible against Christianity generally, even quoting what Byron and other authors have written concerning its disfigurements and imperfections, and contending that such a creed should never be publicly recognised in Japan. This book is designed to prepare the minds of the unwary for the terrible ordeal through which they will have to pass during the latter half of this year.

Throughout the whole of the religious world, says the Rikugō Zasshi, there is a commotion over this question of the public recognition of Christianity. From every point of view this agitation is very silly. The truth of a religion does not depend on its being acknowledged by the State. Government recognition of Christianity could not in any way affect the hold that Buddhism and Shintō have on devout minds. The whole thing resolves itself into the raising of a false issue. Religions are to be tested by their general effect on the minds of people who are free to accept or reject them as they please, and confidence in a creed solely on account of Government recognition or antagonism to it on account of its not being publicly recognised are equally foolish. The persons who wait for State leading before they move in religious matters are a set of weaklings that are not worth the consideration of ardent propagandists, says the Rikugō.

Viscount Watanabe, formerly Minister of Finance, who is quite an authority on Buddhism, in the pages of the Tenchi-jin discusses in a concise and pointed manner the merits and demerits of both Confucianism and Buddhism. No student of history can fail to see how numerous are the ways in which Japanese civilisation in by-gone days was assisted by the two creeds. But at the same time there are states of mind which originated with one or other of these systems that have been a serious drawback to the nation. To cite two noted instances: Buddhism has always taught men to despise the world in which they live and Confucianism has ever preached the doctrine of submission. The first doctrine has led some of the best men to regard with perfect indifference the conduct of public affairs. The second has produced servility and even effeminacy. There is little doubt that had the warlike spirit and military ambition which characterised the Japanese of Hideyoshi's time and the ages that preceded it been more fully developed, Japan's empire in the East to-day would be twice the size it is now. The spirit of enterprise that characterised our ancestors in the days of the Taikō, says Viscount Watanabe, was gradually crushed out of their descendants under the grinding despotism of the Tokugawa rule. It was under the last dynasty of Shōguns that both Buddhism and Confucianism were utilised to the utmost to teach submission. Under this régime the nation lost all the ambition that characterised it at an earlier period; to keep what it had was all it aimed at.

The Rev. Dr. Motoda Sakunoshi, in No. 13 of the Shinseiki, discusses the subject of Church Ceremonies. He is of opinion that many Japanese protestant churches err in the direction of having too little ceremony. As regards Church architecture in Japan, it is, says Dr. Motoda, of the most nondescript kind. There are churches that are like police offices, and churches that are like coach-hiring establishments, and churches that are like fire-engine sheds. These buildings are only known by the notices that are placed in front of them. The interior of the buildings is no better than their exterior. They resemble lecture halls rather than places of worship. There is not the slightest doubt that a feeling of awe and reverence is generated in most breasts by the interior beauty of the magnificent structures in which men and women worship God in Western countries. In some Japanese churches before the service commences there is talking, tea-drinking, cake-eating and even, on certain occasions, games. Thus the Church is turned into a kind of theatre. Dr. Motoda, being an Episcopalian, argues in favour of written prayers being used. He says that the objections which are urged against written prayers may be urged with equal force against extempore prayer. It is said that there is no life or spirit in written prayers. But this must depend on the persons who use them. At any rate there is a safeguard in these carefully thought out and reverently worded supplications against the flippancy and familiarity with which many Japanese are in the habit of addressing the Almighty. Some of the prayers, says Dr. Motoda, which I have heard, sounded as if addressed to the audience rather than to God.* On the whole there is far more insincerity and unreality about extempore prayer than about written forms. It is absurd to suppose that even in Churches where the pastor is expected to invent a prayer every week there are no forms. Every pastor has his own forms. His prayers are the product of one mind and not, as in the case of the written forms that have come down from antiquity, the product of many of the most devout minds. Dr. Motoda advocates the use of Church almanacks and dwells on the importance of developing musical talent and taste in Japan and of making music play the part in Japanese Churches which it plays in the West.

* We ourselves once heard an aged Christian invoke the Almighty that the worshippers whose mouth-piece he was, had met that afternoon at half past two.—[Writer of the Summary.]

In the German Church organ, the Shinri, No. 109, the Rev. E. Schiller publishes his 4th article, on "Japanese Christianity," which, though full of interest, is too long to be noticed in this Summary. In the same number the Rev. H. Minami contends that a new Japanese translation of the Bible is needed. He says that just as in Germany the constant progress of thought and the better understanding of the scriptures have resulted in the publication of new translations by noted scholars, so in Japan Christians should not rest content with a translation that was prepared 20 years ago. Some seven or eight years ago there was a talk about undertaking a new translation, but at present there is no interest in the subject evinced anywhere. Rare listlessness, says Mr. Minami, on the part of the Christians who are always telling us that the Bible is the word of God. The present translation is in many parts most defective. Then the New Testament not being translated by one person, contains all sorts of styles and lacks unity. Mr. Minami goes on to inform his readers that he has himself translated the Epistle to the Romans, parts of which he quotes in the Magazine as a specimen of the style he thinks it desirable should be adopted. He further observes that a good translation of the Bible at the present time would doubtless help largely to settle that much discussed question, how far is it desirable that the written and spoken languages should be blended?

THE LATE MR. KLEINWORT.

The respect in which the late Mr. Kleinwort was held, and the sympathy aroused by the melancholy circumstances of his death, were shown by the large attendance at the funeral, which took place at Yokohama Cemetery on Tuesday afternoon. His untimely death occurred between Ashinoya and Hakone on Sunday. Mr. Kleinwort, who was holiday-making with some friends, felt unwell, and obtained a glass of water at a Japanese house. He then resumed his walk, but, becoming worse, sat down by the road side, and expired in a minute or two. He had been in poor health for some time. Mr. Kleinwort was born at the big German manufacturing town of Sietlin, and came out to Japan some twenty-one years ago. In Yokohama and Kobe he was well-known and liked by English and Germans, and his loss is greatly felt. His wife and children have been staying in England, and deceased recently telegraphed to hasten their depart for Japan, as he felt his health was not satisfactory. The funeral service, which took place in most inclement weather, was conducted by the Rev. M. Haas, who spoke eulogistically on the character of the deceased. A number of beautiful wreaths, many from Japanese, were sent, and the pall bearers were Messrs. Weinberger, Wismer, Bergmann, Luther, Alton, and Popp (of Kobe).

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORAL STANDARDS OF EAST AND WEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—My duties as a missionary require me to travel quite a little in Miyagi Ken. In the course of this travel I frequently visit two towns each of about 10,000 population. They are quiet inland places, each being the centre of a Gun. The opinions of my Japanese friends and my personal judgment based upon some little observation place these towns upon a plane of at least average respectability as life in Japan goes. Yet in one of these towns there are two and in the other three establishments of infamy, the average number of inmates of each of these houses being somewhere between twenty and forty,—not including a large number of young girls who manifestly are in training for lives of infamy. These houses are all fronting on the principal streets and in at least some of them there is a good view of the inmates to be had every evening by whoever passes along the street.

My duties of travel also require me to lodge frequently in some of the best hotels of Miyagi Ken. I will not sully your pages with any descriptions of the foul proposals and indirect incitements to sin that have been made to me on several occasions in these hotels. The fact that these people know that my special calling among them was to proclaim repentance, the forgiveness of sins, and power of a holy life, was no protection from all this rottenness.

The considerable survivals of phallicism which are to be found in this Ken and the hold which that cult still has on many of the people are also indexes of moral conditions to one who has investigated the subject.

I am a native American and in my own country frequently lodged in hotels, but was never approached with immoral suggestions. I am also well acquainted with a considerable number of American towns of various sizes and in none of them is there anything which can in any way be compared to the moral conditions of the towns I have referred to above.

The editor of the Mail has referred to New York City in making comparisons, but is he not aware of the fact that the majority of the population of that city are not Americans but a conglomerate of the worst elements of the populations of various European countries?

Sincerely yours, E. C. FRY.

ENDOWED OCCIDENTAL THEOLOGY AND JAPANESE CHRISTIANITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Now that the Japanese Trustees of the Doshisha have retired from the false position they occupied and have handed over the control of the institution to the American Board and its nominees and friends, it is an opportune moment for discussing one or two interesting aspects of the conflict that has been carried on for many months, if we may not say many years, between the representatives of the orthodoxy professed by the Congregationalists of America and the free-thinking section of the Japanese Christian Church. It is quite evident that there has been a huge misunderstanding between the parties. Accustomed to the idea of endowed Theology, not free to preach anything not specified in the conditions of endowment, the Missionaries of the American Board have naturally been averse to allowing Japanese Christians to teach what they please, to permitting them to overhaul the orthodox creed of the Congregationalists as they would a parcel of merchandise offered for sale, selecting and rejecting at will. The Japanese Christians, on the other hand, having little experience of the ways of the home Churches, deeming it conceivable that the miracles said to have been performed by Christ and his disciples rank little higher than the miracles ascribed to other religious teachers, holding that the doctrines of the Divinity of Christ, eternal punishment, original sin, &c., have been scientifically shown to be untenable, but still valuing beyond all else in the world the moral teaching of Christ, have ventured to think that they might be allowed by the missionaries to make a creed for themselves. The position that the liberal-minded Christians have assumed vis à vis the American Board may be thus stated:—"You shall not dictate our creed to us. You don't claim infallibility. You can think as you please, worship as you please, and interpret the Bible as you please. But give us the same liberty." Had some few of the advanced thinkers among the American Board missionaries been free from home control and influence, had they been able to shake off the thralldom of our Occidental system of perpetuating special dogmas by paying men to teach them exclusively, they would undoubtedly have granted to the Japanese Churches the liberty they asked for and been content to fall back on the motto, "Great is truth and she will prevail." But there is no man less free to choose what shall be taught or believed than the Christian missionary. He has to choose between strict loyalty to the creed of his sect or expulsion. There is no other alternative.

Of course this doctrine-endowing system of ours, so strikingly illustrated by the action of the American Board during the past two years, is pernicious to a degree that it is impossible to exaggerate. As was pointed out by Professor Huxley in the pages of the Nineteenth Century ten years ago, no surer method of preventing inquiry and no greater stimulus to insincerity could have been devised. In a series of striking articles Professor Huxley maintained that his rejection of supernaturalism was fully justified by the writings of "scholars and theologians of the highest repute in the only two countries, Holland and Germany, in which at the present time, professors of theology are to be found whose tenure of their posts does not depend upon the results to which their inquiries lead them." He then goes on to say "Imagine that all our chairs of astronomy had been founded in the fourteenth century, and their incumbents were bound to sign Ptolemaic articles. In that case, with every respect for the efforts of persons thus hampered, to attain and expound the truth, I think men of common-sense would go elsewhere to learn astronomy." "Hence the serious question is," continued the Professor, "whether theological men of science (German and Dutch) or theological special pleaders are to have the confidence of the general public." It is not only the occupiers of Chairs of Divinity at Universities that are required to echo the Shibboleths of their sects or give up their perquisites, but every Minister of the Gospel all the world over is no otherwise situated. Now the Japanese don't understand this system, at least a great many of them do not. I for one sympathise with them in their difficulty, and see quite plainly how their embarrassment was caused in the case which forms the basis of these remarks. Among Protestant bodies, excepting the Unitarians and the German Churches established by Mr. Spinner and his successors, there is no Church that allows so much liberty of thought and action as the Congregationalists. Their Kumiai Churches, in consequence of this, are somewhat of an eyesore to more orthodox Protestants, as has been stated in these columns by Japanese writers quoted in the Summaries of the Religions Press. The Congregationalists undoubtedly possess a fine set of men, but many of their very best men, if their published statements are to be relied on, regard with perfect indifference certain important articles of the Congregationalist creed.*

* Vide Mr. Oshikawa's remark on the Divinity

Even a man like Mr. Nijima, whose orthodoxy seems to have satisfied the foreign missionaries, evidently winked at heterodoxy in his brethren, as is shown by the public statement made by Mr. Tokutomi Ichirō, quoted in the Religious Summary that appeared in the Japan Weekly Mail of Feb. 18th. "In 1881," says Mr. Tokutomi, "I told Mr. Nijima that I was unable to accept certain articles of the Christian Creed and asked him to strike my name off the roll of members of the Church. My belief had not altered in 1890 when I was asked to become a trustee of the Dōshisha. This fact was known to Mr. Nijima." So here we have this champion of Occidental Congregational orthodoxy putting a heretic on the Board of Trustees of the institution that was intended to be a bulwark of respectable American Christianity. It amounts to this, there has been a large amount of trimming and make-believe all around. The Board missionaries have had to satisfy the Board at home while being anxious at the same time not to alienate their best men out here. Their position has been illogical throughout.

The whole Dōshisha experiment was bound to be a failure; as many discerning foreigners and Japanese foresaw. The Board, as they have conclusively proved, never intended to endow any kind of doctrine that chose to call itself Christian, but only the doctrine embodied in the creed of American Congregationalists. This for a very long time the Japanese failed to understand. Why? Because, though for years there were heterodox teachers connected with the Dōshisha, the Board took no steps to bring things to a crisis. Why did they wait so long? Because they were not urged to act by the men on the spot, who, though they had got into a mess, were naturally anxious to get out of it without exposing the weakness and inconsistency of the whole scheme. The final action taken by the Board was regarded with considerable alarm by missionaries who were anxious to preserve the respectable appearance of the gigantic affair. Many outsiders saw that inquiry would lead to a smash up of the whole concern, which was no other than a big speculation, as has been pointed out by several Japanese writers. But some of the Board missionaries were quite angry when it was predicted in these columns that the consequences of the investigation by the Representatives of the Board would be serious. This is human nature. We all hide our weaknesses and object to have our failures blazoned before the world. But the point I want to make is this. The uncertainty and vacillation of the Board missionaries in Japan through a series of years in their dealings with the Japanese heads of the institution was the real cause of the misunderstanding that occurred. On any other theory, it is not for a moment conceivable that a number of well-educated, intelligent Japanese such as constituted the late Board of Trustees should, in some cases through a series of years, be impressed with the idea that their connection with the American Board in no way robbed them of the right to decide on the fundamental principles which should control the institution. The years of indifference to heterodoxy within the precincts of the institution shown by the Board missionaries was undoubtedly the real cause of the failure of well-meaning and highly conscientious Japanese to see that in the last resort the Board would fight to the death for the right to endow their theological dogmas and would resent any attempt to misappropriate the endowment fund. The missionaries no doubt disagreed among themselves as to what ought to be done, and affairs were allowed to drift till certain alarming letters aroused the grave old men who sit on the Board at home and induced them to rely on the conflicting reports of the missionaries no longer, but to send out a special Commission of Inquiry, which was the beginning of the end.

The whole question is bound up with a wider subject, the future of Japanese Christianity. There is a large body of Christians which is anxious to perpetuate all that is best in original Christianity without any of the accretions of Christ quoted in the Summary of the Religious Press in the Japan Weekly Mail of March 18th, after ages. The missionaries must either leave their Societies, or Boards, or disconnect themselves with these Christians. In many cases I venture to think that either course would be regarded with repugnance. The free-thinking Japanese Christians, such, for instance, as Mr. Minami, of the German Church, after reading all that the Germans and others have said against orthodox doctrine, have deliberately and conscientiously rejected it. They rightly think that where Protestantism differs from Roman Catholicism is in the authority it gives to reason as a means of discovering truth. They have followed the lead of reason and it has led them to regions that are far removed from the haunts of typical Occidental Christians. What can the Protestant missionary logically say to this? He dare not say, "you have no business to reason, Christian belief and reasoning are incompatible." If this is the situation with the ordinary Protestant Christian, it is very much more so with the Congregationalist, who extols reason more than his fellows. The Japanese are quite shrewd enough to see that, the infallibility of Churches being totally denied, and it being recognised that articles of belief have been revised over and over again as knowledge advances, no Church and no number of Churches can logically claim the right to dictate to other churches what they shall accept and what reject. "If," say the Japanese, "we can agree among ourselves what we want, that is all that is required. Whether Occidentals condemn us or approve of us is a matter of no moment. We are a thinking, educated people accepting Christianity in the Nine century Century for the first time, after carefully reading all that has to be said against it. The dogmas that have been the growth of ages in the West, which satisfied minds cast in special moulds and unenlightened by modern influences, are not to be saddled on us. Nothing will induce us to subscribe to your 39 Articles, your Westminster Catechism, or other formulae. What is to us credible, if supported by evidence, we accept. The rest we reject. And who shall say us, nay?"

"Take back your Dōshisha," say the old Trustees in spirit, if not in words. "Run it on your Occidental orthodox line; insist on the teaching of things that you think fundamental, and we do not. In the meantime we will follow a more excellent way. We will move with the times and will teach both by precept and example all that is best in Christianity without pretending that we believe the childish superstitions which mar the beauty of an otherwise matchless creed." Apologising for the length of this letter.

I am, yours, &c.,
March 23rd, 1899.

OBSERVER.

MAILS FOR THE SOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

Sir,—I beg to announce through your columns that a daily despatch from this office to Kobe (usually by noon train, but altered, if necessary, on mail days) for conveyance of mails for Hongkong, India, Australia, etc., is now opened. Mail matters for said destinations will hereafter be forwarded to Kobe only, and not to Yokohama.

European mails per P. & O., M.M., and N. D. Lloyd steamers will also be transmitted via Kobe, their times of closing being fixed accordingly.

Yours truly,

M. DOI,
Director of Tokyo Post and Telegraph Office.

Tokyo, March 31st, 1899.

Rear-Admiral Schley was deputed to escort the remains of Lord Herschel from America to England on board the U.S.S. Brooklyn, but before the order could be conveyed to him, the British Government had directed the cruiser Talbot to bring home the body. Queen Victoria has telegraphed her thanks and the thanks of Great Britain for the courtesy and sympathy of the American Government and people.

LAW CONCERNING NATIONALITY.

TRANSLATED BY DR. L. LÖNNHOLM.

Art. I.—A child is a Japanese subject, if the father is a Japanese subject at the time of the child's birth, or, in case he died before the child's birth, if he was a Japanese subject at the time of his death.

Art. II.—If the father before the birth of the child loses his Japanese nationality by divorce or by a dissolution of adoption, the provisions of the preceding article apply with relation back to the beginning of the pregnancy.

These provisions do not apply if both parents quit the house together, unless the mother returns to the house before the birth of the child.

Art. III.—When the father is unknown or has no nationality, the child is a Japanese subject, if the mother is such.

Art. IV.—If both parents of a child born in Japan are unknown or have no nationality, the child is a Japanese subject.

Art. V.—An alien acquires Japanese nationality in the following cases:—

1. By becoming the wife of a Japanese subject.
2. By becoming *nyūfu of a Japanese subject.
3. By being acknowledged by his father or mother, who is a Japanese subject.
4. By adoption by a Japanese subject.
5. By naturalization.

Art. IV.—The requisites for an alien's acquiring Japanese nationality by acknowledgment are as follows:—

1. The child must be a minor according to the law of his nationality.
2. The child must not be the wife of an alien.
3. The parent who first acknowledges the child must be a Japanese subject.
4. If both parents acknowledge the child at the same time, the father must be a Japanese subject.

Art. VII.—An alien may be naturalized by permission of the Minister of the Home Department.

Such permission can be granted only on the following conditions:—

1. The alien must have had his domicile in Japan for five consecutive years.
2. He must be at least twenty years old and a person of full capacity by the law of his nationality.
3. He must be a person of honest behaviour.
4. He must have either property or working ability sufficient for an independent livelihood.
5. He must have no nationality or must lose his nationality on acquiring Japanese nationality.

Art. VIII.—A wife of an alien can be naturalized only together with her husband.

Art. IX.—An alien who has his domicile in Japan at the time can be naturalized even though the condition specified in Art. VII., clause 1 does not exist, in the following cases:—

1. If one of his parents has been a Japanese subject.
2. If his wife has been a Japanese subject.
3. If he was born in Japan.
4. If he has resided in Japan for ten consecutive years.

The persons mentioned under clauses 1-3 can be naturalized only if they have resided in Japan for three consecutive years; but this does not apply if a parent of a person mentioned under clause 3 was born in Japan.

Art. X.—If a parent of an alien is a Japanese subject, and such alien has his domicile at the time in Japan, he may be naturalized even though the conditions specified in Art. VII., clause 2, clauses 1, 2 and 4 do not exist.

Art. XI.—The Minister of the Home Department may with the sanction of the Emperor permit the naturalization of an alien who has done specially meritorious services to Japan, without regard to the provisions of Art. VII., clause 2.

* Nyūfu 入夫 is a man who marries a woman being the head of a house and thereby enters her house.

Art. XII.—A naturalization permit must be published in the Official Gazette.

A naturalization can be set up against third persons acting in good faith only after such publication has been made.

Art. XIII.—The wife of a person who acquires Japanese nationality acquires it together with her husband.

These provisions do not apply, if the law of the wife's nationality provides to the contrary.

Art. XIV.—If the wife of a person who has acquired Japanese nationality did not herself acquire it according to the provisions of the preceding articles, she may be naturalized even though the conditions specified in Art. VII., clause 2 do not exist in her case.

Art. XV.—A child of a person who acquires Japanese nationality acquires it together with the parent, if the child is a minor according to the law of his nationality.

This provision does not apply if the law of the child's nationality provides to the contrary.

Art. XVI.—A person naturalized, a person who, as being the child of a naturalized person, has acquired Japanese nationality, or a person who has become the adopted child or the nyūfu of a Japanese subject, has not the following rights:—

1. The right to become a Minister of State.
2. The right to become president, vice president, or councillor of the Privy Council.
3. The right to hold the position of a Chokunin official of the Imperial Household.
4. The right to become a Minister Plenipotentiary.
5. The right to hold the position of a General or Admiral.
6. The right to become president of the Supreme Court, the Board of Audit, or of the Administrative Litigation Court.
7. The right to become a member of the Imperial Diet.

Art. XVII.—The Minister of the Home Department with the sanction of the Emperor may except from the restrictions of the preceding article a person having been naturalized under the provisions of Art. XI. after five years, or any other person after ten years from the time when he acquired Japanese nationality.

Art. XVIII.—A Japanese woman who marries an alien loses thereby her nationality.

Art. XIX.—A person who by marriage or adoption has acquired Japanese nationality loses it on divorce or the dissolution of the adoption only in case he is to recover his foreign nationality.

Art. XX.—A person who voluntarily acquires a foreign nationality loses thereby his Japanese nationality.

Art. XXI.—If the wife or child of a person who has lost his Japanese nationality acquires the nationality of the husband or parent, she or he loses the Japanese nationality.

Art. XXII.—The provisions of the preceding article do not apply to the wife or child of a person who lost Japanese nationality by divorce or the dissolution of adoption, unless the wife, in case of the dissolution of adoption of her husband, does not procure a divorce, or the child quits the house following the father.

Art. XXIII.—If a child who is a Japanese subject acquires by acknowledgment a foreign nationality, he loses his Japanese nationality. This provision, however, does not apply to a person who has become the wife, the nyūfu, or the adopted child of a Japanese subject.

Art. XXIV.—Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding five articles, a male person of the age of seventeen years or upwards cannot lose his Japanese nationality, unless he has already performed his service in the army or navy or is not bound to perform such service.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding six articles a person who holds at the time a civil or military position cannot lose his Japanese nationality unless after he has lost such position.

Art. XXV.—A person who, having lost Japanese nationality by marriage, after the dissolution of such marriage has his domicile in Japan, may, by the permission of the Minister of the Home Department, recover Japanese nationality. But this provision does not apply when any of the persons mentioned in Art. XVI. has lost Japanese nationality.

Art. XXVII.—The provisions of Arts. XIII., XV. apply correspondingly in the cases mentioned in the preceding two articles.

ADDITIONAL PROVISION.

Art. XXVIII.—This law takes effect from the first day of the fourth month of the 32nd year of Meiji.

JAPAN CONFERENCE OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29TH.—The sixteenth of the Japan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church opened at Aoyama Tokyo, in Goucher Hall at nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, March 29th, with the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, conducted by Bishop Earl Cranston, D.D., LL.D. At the conclusion of this ceremony the Bishop made an impressive address, referring most feelingly to the accidental death of Miss M. E. Simon in Yokohama and of Mrs. Alexander in Hiogo, by fire.

The Conference was organized by Rev. J. Soper, D.D., English Secretary, and Rev. Kawaumi, Japanese Secretary, Rev. C. W. Huatt, Statistical Secretary and Treasurer, and the appointment of the usual Standing Committees. Miss J. S. Vail was requested to act as organist.

The half hour from 10.30 to 11 a.m. was arranged for the introduction of visitors and reception of fraternal delegates. The Rev. Mr. Hara was introduced and spoke on behalf of his work for prisoners. The reports of the presiding elders of the Nagoya and Sapporo districts (Revs. D. S. Spencer and C. Bishop) were read and the character of the presiding elders and each elder in these districts was passed.

The afternoon session was giving up to collecting statistics and reports of money raised by each charge for missions, &c. Monday morning, April 3rd was fixed for the election of a delegate to the General Conference.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30TH.—Second day of Conference. The devotional exercises were led by the Rev. Mr. Kawaumi. Bishop Cranston, at the opening of the business session, referred in feeling terms to the death of Rev. A. J. Kynett, D.D., Secretary of the Church Extension Society of the M. E. Church, which occurred suddenly while he was attending an anti-saloon convention in Harrisburg, Pa. The Church Extension Society was due largely to the efforts of Dr. Kynett, and he was a leading worker in the temperance movement. In the death of Dr. Kynett the Church has lost a most able organizer and leader. The report of the presiding elder of the Hakodate district was read, and showed excellent work accomplished during the past year. The Bishop remarked that some of these Brethren had been making in warm in that cold country. Rev. Ishizaki, presiding elder of the Sendai district, read his report, and was highly commended by the Bishop. Mr. J. L. Cowen, Treasurer of the Japan Mission, and Book Agent, was then introduced to the Conference.

FRIDAY, MARCH 31ST.—Mr. Mitani led the devotional exercises. The Committee reported the examinations of the candidates for admission to Conference. At this point the Bishop said:—I think we have come to the most important work of the Conference. In every conference there are some men who cannot be appointed satisfactorily to themselves and the people. The place to correct this evil is at the entrance to the Conference.

Dr. W. N. Whitney was introduced and spoke on behalf of the Scripture Union. The laymen from the Lay Electoral Conference were presented. When Dr. M. Takaki, lay delegate to the General Conference, was introduced the Bishop remarked, "Here is all there is of the General Conference of 1900." Dr. Takaki, lay delegate, is the first to be elected. He is a graduate of the Anyama Gakuin, was the first to be graduated from that school, is an alumnus of Syracuse University, and of Johns Hopkins University, U.S.A., and at present occupies the position of lecturer in the Imperial University, Tokyo, and Aoyama Gakuin.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1ST.—A large part of the business session was taken up in discussing the question of what to do with a probationer in the conference who was accused of smoking tobacco. The M.E. church requires that all its preachers shall not use tobacco in any form, and any infraction of this rule makes the person liable to trial. A class of three was presented for admission to Conference. The Bishop addressed this class, and among many good things said:—"You are to be faithful and loyal to your country. You have duties to your country that only God can absolve you from. Our Church is not in Japan to create sedition. You expect protection from the Government in the exercise of religious freedom and you are to be faithful in your obedience to the laws. If you cannot love or persuade those of other religions from their errors you must let them alone. Remember how patient the Master has been with you. You should first know and then keep the law of your own Church. There is one peril that is before you, the failure to realize the sacredness of an obligation. The meaning of this consecration is clear. These men certainly have not come here to receive more pay than they would receive in other callings. You are not to institute new church laws, nor to establish a new church, but you come here to say that we like your church and are satisfied with your discipline. We have a right to expect that these men will be faithful to those who have trusted them; and we have a right to expect that a few extra dollars will not bribe them away."

In the afternoon a large part of the Conference and the ladies went to Shinjuku for a picnic, while the Bishop and Presiding Elders remained to wrestle with the appointments. Rev. Mr. Yaman, an evangelist of the M.E. church, held a meeting on Friday afternoon.

SUNDAY, APRIL 2ND.—All the services of the Conference on Sunday were instructive and deeply interesting. The weather was most beautiful, and a large audience gathered at 9 a.m. to attend the Love Feast, and by 10 o'clock the hall was well filled. Bishop Earl Cranston, D.D., LL.D., preached a strong sermon on the credibility of the great fact of Christianity, the Resurrection of Jesus Christ. Rev. T. Ukai, pastor of the Ginza Church, interpreted this sermon.

At 2 p.m. the Ordination services were held, and Bishop Cranston ordained those who had been elected to Deacon's and Elder's offices. The memorial service in charge of Rev. B. Chappel was very impressive. Miss Dickerson read a memorial of Miss M. E. Symons, in English, and Rev. Kawaumi spoke in Japanese. Miss Otto read a memorial of Mrs. Alexander, in English, and Rev. Mr. Nakada spoke in Japanese. The exercises of the day closed with a Missionary sermon by Rev. S. Kurimura, followed by a Revival service.

A SHOCKING CRIME.

Just after 4 a.m. on Monday, Ichibara Kinzaburo, aged 62, a retainer of Marquis Ikeda, ex-Daimyo of Okayama, murdered Nakamura Hagi, chief steward to the Marquis, and his adopted son Asao, and then committed suicide after setting fire to the victims' house. Mr. Nakamura's residence stood near Meguro Station, and was built only three years ago. It was a spacious and pretty building with beautiful garden plots and pine trees surrounding it. It was occupied by four persons, Mr. Nakamura himself, his aged mother, his adopted son, and his wife. Mr. Nakamura, who had made it a habit to get up early in the morning and to assist in the domestic work was engaged in the kitchen with his son on the morning in question, when Ichihara, attired in foreign dress, with an antiquated hat, and carrying a rifle under his arm, came and pushed open the shoji of the porch. After enquiring where the master was, he went round to the kitchen, and shot Nakamura in his shoulder. The latter fell, and the murderer attacked him with a sword and inflicted mortal wounds on the head of the victim, who had attempted to run out of the room. Nakamura's adopted son attacked the murderer, but the latter wounded him first in the left hand and then in the right, and lastly ran him through the chest. He then tore the shoji out of their places, heaped them on a hibachi, and set fire to them, afterwards cutting his own throat with the sword, and also shooting himself with the rifle. The parties had been on bad terms for some time, and Ichihara is supposed to have been specially annoyed by the steward's conduct the other day at a meeting of retainers held in connection with the marriage of their master's daughter.

CHINA NOTES.

Owing to the dangerous state of affairs in Kansu, due to Mahomedan unrest, orders have been sent by the Empress Dowager to Viceroy T'ao of Lanchow, authorising him to raise extra troops for defence and also informing him that large consignments of quick-firing field pieces and machine guns, will be sent at once to him sufficient to arm not only his levies but also all the Manchu garrisons at Hsining and elsewhere. One or two well-known lieutenants of Generals Tung Fu-hsiang and Chang Chiu will also be sent back to Kansu to take charge of the organising of the new troops and defence work generally in Kansu province.

The future Italian squadron on the China station is to consist of the Amerigo Vesputti, Kiba, Etna, Marco Polo, Piemonte, and Stromboli, flagship.

An island in the Mekong, partly under cultivation and with big trees on it, has entirely disappeared. The owner searched for it unsuccessfully for three or four days.

The provincial authorities in Soochow, says a Chinese paper, have decided to adopt foreign drills for the eight battalions of troops in that city and some of the German instructors formerly at Woosung have been engaged for that purpose.

The Universal Gazette states that the Suching Silk Filature in Soochow, under official management, has ceased working, owing to a difficulty with the Provincial Judge who imposed a tax of $3 per picul on 300 piculs of cocoons bought by the Company, which the Directors strongly objected to pay. Negotiations are being made to bring about a compromise. The silk produced in this filature has been pronounced by foreign experts to be the best turned out in Soochow but owing to heavy expenses the Company has not been able to realise any profit.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Kobe Choral Society will give Sterndale Bennett's pretty pastoral, "The May Queen" at the Gymnasium theatre on April 11th.

The Communications Department recently offered prizes for the best design for letter boxes. The first prize was 100 yen, and over 200 designs with illustrations were received. As the result of the examination the first prize was awarded to Mr. Wada Tamotan, of Azabu, Tokyo, whose apparatus combines the advantages of simplicity, strength, and cheapness.

The Japanese Minister and Madame Kato intend to leave the Japanese Legation about the middle of April on their return to Japan. They will be accompanied by Madame Kato's sister, Miss Iwasaki, who has been in England the last two years for educational purposes. The many friends of both the Minister and his wife, says a home paper, will hope to see the one return to the post he has so ably filled on behalf of his Government, and the other to the social position she has gracefully filled, early next year. Mr. and Mrs. Kato proceed via America, and per Canadian Pacific steamer Vancouver to Japan.

A report has reached us of a disastrous collision between the steamers Hokushin Maru and Kilami Maru off Ofuyu Cape, in the province of Teshio, Hokkaido, early on the morning of the 30th ult. The Hokushin went down immediately with all hands, about 36, while the other vessel made for the shore as fast as she could. Some convicts and their guards who were on board the ill-fated steamer are supposed to have been all drowned.

The Superintendent of the Yokohama Police has issued an order that cyclists will not be allowed to ride round the road encircling the Cricket-ground for 15 days beginning April 1st, as the cherry-blossoms will attract such crowds of people to the park that bicycle riding would be dangerous to riders and pedestrians alike. Bicyclists must therefore dismount at the outer gates.

An Islington dog-show recently described itself in the advertising columns of a London paper as a "Colossal Canine Carnival commencing contemporaneously, comprising countless captivated Champion Canine Curiosities, contentedly couching, carefully curled, curiously clipped, creatures; complacently contemplating company congregated; charming costumes, cooking comestibles, cheerful comedians." Was there ever such a carefully concocted concatenation of consecutive "Ca"?

Yokohama appears to have been almost the centre of the earthquake which occurred on Wednesday about 1 p.m. The shake was a decidedly severe one, but fortunately no serious damage has been reported. The shock was apparently not felt over a wide area, for this morning's Japanese papers only contain telegrams from Matsugaki and Urawa, stating that the earthquake was severely felt there.

At a quarter to five this morning Supt. Morgan received an alarm of fire from Lot No. 31, Settlement. It was found that the interior of a two-storied stone godown belonging to Madame Maigre was in flames. The Brigade immediately broke the door open and began work from two hydrants. The police brigade soon followed using the other two hydrants and the fire was put down in two hours, but unfortunately the godown and contents were almost completely destroyed. It is understood the godown was insured for yen 1,200 and the contents for yen 13,000. The fire must have started last night, but the cause has not yet been ascertained.

THE JAPANESE INVASION OF KOREA IN 1592.

By HOMER B. HULBERT, A.M.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

So far as the writer is aware, the following account of the Great Invasion is the first exhaustive one that has been attempted from purely Korean sources and from the Korean standpoint. It is to be expected that every country will colour its own history to suit itself. It will magnify its own graces and explain away its own faults. And yet it remains true that the history of such an invasion as this must be drawn from the accounts given by people who lived on the spot where the events took place, rather than from the accounts which the unsuccessful invaders took back with them to their own land. Nor will it be found that the Koreans have tried to excuse themselves for their inability to cope with the Japanese. Unstinted candour has been meted out to the cowardly and inefficient by their own historians. The account, as here compiled from a number of independent sources, which a long residence in Korea and the kindness of many Korean gentlemen have placed in the writer's hands, will go far to prove that the Korean is possessed of a fair amount of the historical instinct, if it may be so called. Plausibility is not necessarily a proof of accuracy or credibility, and yet we venture to say that the account here given carries on its face the evidence of a fair degree of both. I have not attempted to harmonize the Korean version with the Japanese. This will be found to be a purely Korean narrative. But it must be remembered that at the time when these events occurred Korea was immeasurably ahead of Japan in the matter of literary attainment and general culture, and it must not for a moment be supposed that the present relative status of the two countries can be taken as a gauge of the relative accuracy of their accounts of this great war.

Wherever possible I have given Japanese the names by which they are known to the Japanese but in some cases this has been impossible. In that case they are given their Chinese names. For instance Hideyoshi is commonly known to Koreans as P'yung Sung-il. In some cases where there is danger of ambiguity the Chinese characters are appended in a footnote.

In 1568, as King Kyoung-jong lay dying, his Queen summoned the officials in consult about the succession, but ere they arrived the King expired. They asked her to nominate a successor, and she named Prince Ha-song, a youth of seventeen, second cousin to the deceased King. He is known by his posthumous title, Sun-jo Soryung Taewang. The Queen who nominated him acted as regent until he should reach his majority.

This reign is perhaps the most memorable of any in this dynasty, for in it occurred the great Japanese invasion which brought the land to the verge of destruction, and which has ever since coloured the Korean conception of the Japanese.

The first years of the reign were spent in correcting the abuses brought about by "Little Yun" and in removing from office all those who had been connected in any way with him. The whole kingdom was canvassed for wise and scholarly men to put in the places of those who had been removed. Books intended for the instruction and elevation of the people were published and distributed far and wide.

The wild Ya-in across the Ya-lu were crossing that river and taking possession of fields in Korea proper, near the town of Kang-gŏ. The King sent a force under Gen. Kim Dong yang to dislodge them. The intruders were chased across the river and into a narrow defile, where they turned on their pursuers. Taken thus by surprise, the Korean forces were thrown into confusion and were put to flight, but not till after their general had fallen. A second expedition chased the intruders to their villages, and burned them out.

In the following year the Prime Minister Yi Jun-gyung died, but before he expired he gave voice to a prophecy which has become historic. He said:—"Since I have begun to examine men's minds I find that opposing factions will arise and that in their train great evils will follow. The King should studiously avoid showing favouritism to either of these factions. The first symptom of the rise of such factions should be met with stern resistance."

In the year 1572, the relations with the Japanese were as follows:—Since the seventh year of King Chung-jong, when the Japanese in the three ports revolted, there had been little communication between the two countries, but a few Japanese had been allowed to live in the three settlements by sufferance. But now the Japanese sent a friendly message asking that the old relations be resumed. The prefect of Fusan added his influence in favour of granting the request, and the Japanese were allowed to resume operations at Fusan alone, three $\frac{1}{2}$ below the prefecture, which means about half way down the bay from the present village of Fusan. From that time the former relations seem to have been renewed, but no envoys went from Korea to Japan. It was decreed by the Korean government that should a Japanese land anywhere upon the coast except at Fusan he should be dealt with as a pirate. Officials were set to watch the Japanese and see to it that they did not overstep the strict regulations.

It had not been customary for the people to assume mourning on the death of a royal personage, but when the Queen Regent died in 1575 the custom was begun, and each citizen wore a white hat, belt, and shoes.

This year, 1575, was signalized by another event of far-reaching importance and one which exerted a powerful influence over all subsequent Korean history. It was the formation of the great political parties. At first there were only two, but soon they split into four, which are known as the No-ton, So-ton, Nam-in, and Pak-in. These mean "The Old Men's Party," "The Young Men's Party," "The Southerners," and "The Northerners." These terms are not at all descriptive of the composition of the various parties but arose from trivial circumstances. These parties have never represented any principles whatever. They have never had any "platforms," but have been, and are, simply political clans each bent upon securing the royal favour and the offices and emoluments that go therewith. The story of their rise shows how frivolous were the causes which called them into being, and the remainder of these annals will show how they have cursed the country.

During the palmy days of the odious "Little Yun" of the preceding reign, a man by the name of Sim Eui-gyun, happening to see a blanket in the reception room of the universally hated favourite, asked to whom it belonged. When he was told that it belonged to one Kim Hyo-wun, he exclaimed, "He is called a good man, but if so how can he sleep in the house of such a man as 'Little Yun'?" So he opposed this Kim with all his might, and was opposed by him in like manner. The matter grew into a family feud, and kept on increasing until at the time of which we are writing two hostile clans had arisen, the one called So-in, or "Westerners," because their leader lived in the western part of Sŏn. The other was at first called Tong-in, or "Easterners," perhaps because their leader lived in the eastern part of the city. The two men through whom the quarrel first arose had now left the field of active politics and the So-in and Tong-in parties were led respectively by Pak Sun and Ho Yop. It is said that from this time impartiality in the distribution of offices was a thing unknown in Korea. A So-in would help a So-in and a Tong-in would help a Tong-in, right or wrong.

The long fight was immediately begun. A slave in Whang-ha Province was accused of murder and was held in prison waiting the decision of Pak Sun, the leader of the party in power. He did not believe the man guilty, and delay followed. Ho Yop, the leader of the opposition, took advantage of this and accused his rival of neglect of duty. Then followed a running fire of charge and counter-charge between the leaders and between their partisans. The Tong-in, or So-ton, as they soon came to be called, won in this first encounter, and two of the opposing faction were banished. The Prime Minister urged that this fight was utterly useless, and would cause endless trouble. The King agreed and determined to stamp out the cause of the disturbance; so he banished the two men Kim and Sun, who had originated the factions. This had no effect, however, upon the now thoroughly organized parties, and affairs kept going from bad to worse.

In 1579 Pak Il-gol said to the King, "All the people have taken sides in this senseless war, and even though a man be a criminal there are plenty who will defend him. This means the ultimate destruction of the kingdom, and the King should act as a peacemaker between the factions." Others urged the same point before the King, but they were unaware that it was beyond the power of any King to lay the evil spirit of factional strife. In the fifteenth year of his reign the King threw himself into the cause of literature. He believed that neglect of the classics was the cause of the factional strife in his kingdom. He ordered the publication of the "Religion in the Mind," "Picture of the Good and Evil Will," and "The Legacy of Kim Si-seup." He called together a large company of scholars, and in company with them threw himself into the study of the classics.

The year 1583 beheld a fierce invasion on the part of the northern savages under Pan-ho. The prefecture of Kyŏng-wun, in Hamgyŏng Province, was taken by them, but Sil Yip, the prefect of O-ŭng, went to its succour, and, after a desperate fight before the town, broke the back of the invasion, drove the marauders back across the Tu-man and burned their villages.

A novel method was adopted for raising recruits for the army on the border. A law was made that sons of concubines, who had always been excluded from official position, might again become eligible by giving a certain amount of rice or by going themselves and giving three years' time to border guard duty along the Ya-lu or Tu-man. Two chieftains, Yul Bo-ri and Yi T'ang-ga, advanced by separate roads upon Chŏng-sung with 10,000 mounted followers, but the little garrison of 100 men fought so stubbornly that the siege was raised and the two chieftains marched on to attack Pang-wun. Fortunately government troops arrived just in time to drive the invaders back.

The Minister of War was working faithfully, forwarding troops as fast as they could be got ready, but the opposition made charges against him on the ground of the neglect of some trifling technicalities, and he forthwith laid down his portfolio and retired in disgust. When the King asked the Prime Minister about it, that careful individual, fearing to compromise himself, would give no definite answer, and the King consequently said, "If my Prime Minister will not tell me the facts in the case it is time he retired," so he too lost his footing and fell from royal favour.

Having reached now the threshold of the great Japanese invasion of Korea, it will be necessary for us to pause and examine the state of affairs in Korea and Japan, and institute a comparison between them, in order to discover if possible the causes of Japan's early success and subsequent defeat.

Korea and Japan may be said to have been at two opposite poles. Beginning with Korea, we notice, first, that her relations with the Ming dynasty were eminently peaceful. Unlike the Mongols of an earlier date and the Manchus of a later date, the Mings did not have their origin in the north, and therefore were brought less into contact with Korea along her northern border. They belonged to Central China and were not a horde of brutal pillagers, as were the Mongols and Manchus. Hence it was that, so long as Korea was friendly and held her own way quietly, the Ming Emperors concerned themselves very little about her. To this day Korea looks back to the Ming dynasty as her true patron, and realizes that the Manchu supremacy is an alien one. Korea had been strongly unified by the statesmanship of the first Kings of the Chosŏn dynasty, the present one, and had been ruled so well, as a general thing, that there was no sense of insecurity and no particular fear from the outside, except such as arose from the occasional intrusion of a northern tribe or a piratical raid of a few boat-loads of Japanese. The only need of a standing army was to guard herself from such attacks. The arts of peace flourished, the country was peaceful. There is little reason to believe that she was smitten, as many have averred, into a state of shameful effeminacy. In fact, there is much to indicate the opposite, for almost up to the very year in which the invasion occurred the policy of reform instituted by King Sŏng-jun was adhered to, and the rulers, however unwelcome they may have been, surely did much for the sake of literature, art, and public morals. You will scarcely find in the annals of history that the kings who ruled during times of great public degeneracy when luxury sapped the vital power of the nation, spent their time in giving to the people treatises on moral, scientific, social, and literary topics, as these Kings unquestionably did even up to the day when the Japanese calmly swept the country. It had not been a hundred years since an unworthy King had been driven from the throne by his disgusted people and had been refused the posthumous title. That King was succeeded by one who made the land even puritanic in the severity of its morals, who fostered the arts and sciences as hardly any other had done and who crowned his work by publishing the Ok-pyŏn, which marked an era in the literary life of the people. He had been followed in turn by a King who continued the work of progress, and who, among other things, caused the construction of a complicated astronomical instrument. The following reign was the one in which the invasion occurred. No candid reader can believe that the country was steeped in such absolute degeneracy as the Japanese annalists would have us believe, and which other writers who had not access to the Korean annals have described. But some may say that the good work of the Korean Kings does not necessarily argue a good people. This again is a mistake, for there could scarcely be found a people that has taken their cue more directly from the court than have the Korean people. When the Kings have been lax the people have followed the example, and when the Kings have been true men the people have been brought back to honest living. The reputation of this calumny, then, needs but a careful perusal of the Korean annals; not those which have been written under government sanction and are therefore prejudiced, but those which, like these, have been drawn from the private and popular histories of the dynasty and are presumably reliable. For centuries Korea had been at peace, except for insignificant uprisings on the border, and the arts of peace had gradually taken the place of martial prowess. A man is not an object of contempt simply because he is not a warrior. If he is, then let us go back to the post-smoke of our ancestral hovel.

Having shown this reason for Korea's inability to hold the Japanese in check to have been a false one, it will be necessary to account for it in some other way. This can easily be done. The reason was three-fold. In the first place, the Korean people, having no use for a large standing army, had not been trained in large numbers to military life. Secondly, the Japanese were armed with firearms, while the Koreans had absolutely none. The first firearm that was ever seen in Korea was given the King by a Japanese envoy just at the outbreak of the invasion, as we shall see. This alone would account for Korea's inability to cope with the invaders. In the third place, the rise of the political parties had brought in a spirit of jealousy which made it impossible for any man to reach celebrity without calling down upon himself the hatred of the opposing party and his consequent ruin. This we deem the main cause of Korea's weakness. The following pages will show whether this view is upheld by facts or not. It was the mutual jealousies of opposing parties that proved the bane of the land, and not the supineness and effeminacy of the people.

We must now glance at Japan and see of what stuff the invaders were made. Unlike the Korean people, the Japanese had never been welded into a homogeneous mass. Feudalism was the most marked feature of Japanese life. It has been only thirty years since Japan became a unit. It was feudalism and its consequent spirit of liberty (for feudalism is liberty in embryo) that made possible Japan's phenomenal development during the past three decades. Her feudalism is therefore not to be decried, but one of its necessary evils was a state of almost continual civil war. For two centuries preceding the invasion of Korea, Japan had been one great battle-field. War was the great occupation of the people. While Korea had been busy producing Japan had busy destroying, and when at last Hideyoshi, the great Taiko, found himself the virtual ruler of a temporarily quiet kingdom, he had on hand an enormous army which must either be given occupation or must be disbanded. The latter he dared not do, and the former he could not do without finding a field of operations abroad. But we are anticipating.

It is well known that the government of Japan was not administered by the Emperor in person but by an official called the Taiko, or Kwambak, as the Koreans say. For about two centuries this office had been in the hands of a family named Wun. Hideyoshi had been a retainer in the family of the Taiko. Being a bold and successful fighter, he won his way to a generalship and from this point of vantage killed the Taiko and assumed that title himself. It had been the dream of his life to strike at China. He had tried it once unsuccessfully by boat, attacking her at Chul-gang. He changed his plan and decided to make Korea a stepping-stone to the conquest of the Ming empire. His initial move was based on his statement "Year after year our envoys have gone to Korea, but they never send one in return."

In pursuance of this policy a Japanese envoy named Yamashiro appeared at the Korean court in 1587, bearing a harshly worded and insulting letter demanding that the King send an envoy to Japan. The only notice taken of this demand was a polite note in which the King stated that, as the journey by sea was a long one and the Koreans were not good sailors, he would have to be excused from complying with the demand. When Yamashiro placed this missive in the hands of his master he was promptly ordered into the hands of the executioner.

The opening of the year 1588 found Korea still suffering from outbreaks on the far northern border, and General Yi It took a small force of men, crossed the Tu-man River on the ice, and attacked the Chin do tribe. Being successful in this, he took 3000 men, crossed the same river at four different points simultaneously, and attacked the Si-jun tribe by night, burning 200 houses and killing 300 people.

In the spring of this year there arrived from Japan a second envoy, or rather three envoys, Yoshinoshii, Tairano Tsugimobu, and a monk Gen-sho. Of these, Yoshinoshii was the chief. He is described by the Koreans as being a young man, but coarse and violent, and of such a fierce nature that the other members of his suite dared come into his presence only on their knees. They dared not look him in the face. Yoshitoshi and his suite were comfortably quartered at the Tong-p'ying wwan near the present Japanese settlement in Sô-ul, and, having renewed the demand that Korea send an envoy to Japan, he waited month after month hoping that the King would accede to the demand and leaving to go back without success, lest he should meet the same fate that Yasuhiro, the former envoy, had suffered.

* This is a strong argument against those who claim that Korea has been a vassal of Japan. Korea received many more envoys from Japan than she sent that country.

At last the King announced that he would send an envoy to Japan on one condition, namely, that the Japanese Government seize and send back to Korea a number of Korean renegades who, under the leadership of one Sa Wha-dong, had run away to Japan and had since led marauding bands of Japanese against the southern seaboard of Korea. To this condition the Japanese envoy gladly consented, and Taihano was despatched to Japan to carry it out. But it was not till the seventh moon of the following year, 1889, that the pirate Sa Wha-dong and three Japanese freebooters, together with certain other Koreans, were brought back from Japan and delivered up to justice. With them came a letter from the Japanese Government saying, "We are not responsible for the evil deeds of these men. The Korean Sa Wha-dong is the cause of this trouble; so we send them all to you and you must mete out to them such punishment as you see fit." The culprits were immediately decapitated outside the West Gate. This seems to have thawed somewhat the reserve of the King, and Yoshitoshi was called to the Palace for the first time, where he was presented by the King with a handsome steed, while he in turn gave the King a peacock and some firearms, the first that had ever been seen in Korea.

The debate on the Budget has been concluded in the French Chamber of Deputies.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

The Court of Cassation has terminated the examination of the secret dossier in the Dreyfus case, and has risen for the Easter recess.

THE CHAMBERS.

Saigon, April 1.

The Chamber of Deputies has adjourned until the 2nd of May; the Senate until the 9th May.

"THE FIGARO" IN TROUBLE.

Saigon, April 2.

The Figaro has commenced the publication of documents produced in the Criminal Chamber's inquiry into the Dreyfus affair.

The Figaro has been prosecuted.

THE CASKETS DISASTER.

It is announced from London that the steamer Stella, carrying tourists for Jersey, has been lost on a reef. Ninety persons were drowned.

MARCHAND.

Saigon, April 2.

The Marchand Mission has arrived at Adis-Ahaba, where it was warmly welcomed.

"THE FIGARO."

Saigon, April 4.

In spite of the legal prosecution instituted against it, the Figaro continues to publish the documents relating to the Dreyfus inquiry.

THE BORDEREAU QUESTION.

M. Cavaignac, ex-Minister of War, takes pains in his deposition to demonstrate the guilt of Dreyfus, even though the supposition be admitted that Esterhazy was the author of the "bordereau."

THE DREYFUS CASE.

Saigon, April 5.

The Figaro publishes the deposition of the former Ministers Poincaré and Beville, establishing the fact that General Billot, ex-Minister of War, declared to them the culpability of Dreyfus. General Roget, in his deposition, expresses the conviction that Dreyfus is the only possible author of the "bordereau." He also speaks of a document which, in the most explicit manner, affirms the guilt of Dreyfus.

FRENCH NAVAL REORGANIZATION.

Saigon, April 6.

A decree has been issued regulating the attributes of the Departments of Marine and of the Colonies, respectively, with regard to the points d'appui of French squadrons.

POLITICAL LEAGUES IN PARIS.

The preliminary examination in the case of the political leagues has been concluded in Paris. Several Presidents and Vice-Presidents are cited before the Correctional Police.

SAMOAN TROUBLE CONTINUES.

London, March 31.

Reuter's agent at Apia, Samoa, reports under date of 23rd March, that the German protégé Mataafa is continuing to disregard the treaty. On the British and American Consuls and naval officers sending an ultimatum, the Mataafans responded by attacking Apia. In the engagement which ensued three bluejackets and one American were killed and several wounded. The British and American warships then bombarded the place when the Mataafans and Germans took refuge aboard the Falke (German cruiser).

ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT.

The Times' Rome correspondent wires that the Anglo-French agreement (recently concluded over African boundaries) is bitterly resented in Italy, because it is regarded as excluding Italy from an eventual occupation of Tripoli and its hinterland.

TERRIBLE SHIPPING DISASTER.

London, April 1.

The South Western Railway steamer Stella, having on board 140 passengers and a crew of 41, bound for Guernsey, struck the Casket Rocks, (to the west of the Island of Alderney) during the fog of Thursday afternoon, and sank ten minutes later, the boilers exploding. Seventy-four passengers, comprising mostly women and children, and 19 of the crew, were saved by boats, while upwards of eighty were drowned.

BRITISH PROSPERITY.

The revenue year ending March 31st shows a net increase of £1,841,039.

THE GERMAN OCCUPATION OF CHINCHOW.

London, April 3.

The Norddeutscher Allgemeine Zeitung observes that Germany does not intend to occupy Chinchow permanently, but has only taken temporary possession for the protection of missionaries and experts there.

THE SAMOAN AFFAIR.

Great Britain, the United States, and Germany have consented to hold a conference to settle the Samoan Affair, with King Oscar of Sweden as mediator.

TROUBLE IN THE BALKAN STATES

London, April 4.

Four hours fighting took place between the Turkish and Bulgarian frontier guards at Kizylagach. A number of them were killed and wounded.

THE SAMOAN QUESTION.

It is stated in Washington, D.C., that the three Powers concerned reached an understanding over the Samoan question obviating the necessity of King Oscar's umpirage.

NOTES.

- (a) Better was P to Q B4 or P to Q B3. The P to Q Kt3 and B to Kt2 development is good enough for the defence. By adopting this play White loses time, and, in fact, the advantage of first move.
(b) He could not well play B takes Kt and Kt takes Q P, for White plays B takes B and B takes Kt P. The text move is much stronger. White's centre Pawns are not easily guarded, and Black places his forces so as to bear on them.
(c) Better perhaps, was K to K-q.
(d) Well played. If White captures the Pawn, then B takes P follows. Black obtaining the command of the open Q file. If, however, P to Q5 is played by White, then his opponent continues Kt to Q5, which strengthens the attack.
(e) K takes Kt could not be played. Black answers P takes B, and he will win the adverse Kt at Kt5.
(f) He could not play B (Q3) takes Kt, for Kt to K7 ch would have won the exchange. Nor was Q takes Kt any better. Black answers B to K B4 and B takes B, again winning the exchange. Had White played B (Kt2) takes Kt, then Kt takes Kt would at least have won the exchange.

(h) A powerful move. Black maintains his Bishop, and by continuing P to K B4 will obtain an irresistible attack. White's game is compromised. He can dislodge the adverse Kt from the commanding position it occupies. If B to K2, then Kt takes R P ch and B takes B may follow. If, however, Kt to Q2 is played, then Kt takes Kt, B to B6 ch, P to K5 and eventually Q to Kt5 leads to a winning attack.

(i) With the intention to continue Kt to Q4, followed eventually by Kt to K6 and Kt to B4. Black, however, has a splendid reply on hand, which virtually forces a win.

(k) He could not well play P takes P. Black answers Kt takes P ch, and if K to B5 q is played, then B takes P, leading to an easy win.

(l) Black threatened R takes P ch, Q takes P ch and Q to Kt6 ch, followed by mate, against which the text move guards. Black, however, wins the Kt, for he can safely play R takes Kt. Better, perhaps, was Q to Kt2, but the game was beyond repair.

(m) Threatening Q takes Kt P mate. White can not guard without losing at least a Rook.

WORLD'S CHAMPIONS.

The Chess Champions of the world for the last 113 years are as follows:—
1780—Philidor, unbeaten.
1800—Deschappelles, unbeaten.
1834—L. B. Bourdonnais, unbeaten.
1843—Staunton, lost to Anderssen in 1851.
1851—Anderssen, lost to Steinitz in 1866.
1866—Steinitz, lost to Lasker in 1894.
1894—Lasker, present Champion.
The remarkable fact is that there have been only seven Champions in this long period.

NOTES.

Towards the middle of this year a Northern Chess Tourney is to be held at Copenhagen.

The Vienna and St. Petersburg correspondence match has ended, as has for some time been foreseen, by the second game being abandoned as a draw. Vienna, therefore, wins the match by 1½ to ½.

An interruption has occurred in the arrangements of the details for the forthcoming match between Messrs. Jacobson and Wallace for the championship of Australasia. Briefly, the chief difference lies in the inclusion of a certain clause in the dead of rules governing the match, a strict interpretation of which would mean the exclusion of the press. Mr. Wallace apparently insists on this rule being inserted, whilst Mr. Jacobson is no less firm that it should not be included, pointing out that no such rule obtained in the match by which he acquired the championship. It is to be hoped that an early date for the commencement of this interesting match will be appointed.

The "Pillsbury National Correspondence Chess Association" has now become an institution of great prominence, which, in a vast country like the United States of America, is not to be wondered at. There chess players living far away from cities or towns find it hard or impossible to meet an opponent over the board, for they might have to travel 100 miles to do so. What more natural then that they should indulge their liking for the game, and strive to keep up their practice of it by entering the lists of a great correspondence medium like this. . . . It appears that each entrant in a division or section has to play with every other in that division or section, and that the scores are reckoned by the percentage of games won. The first tournament had 117 entries, the second 86, and the third, which is now in progress, 116; but there are many private correspondence matches going on of members who prefer to take no part in the tournaments. There is also an Auxiliary Association. . . . Arrangements are being made for a team-match, of 100 players a-side, with the Canadian Chess Association, which we think will be the biggest thing in correspondence chess which has ever taken place. —B.C.M.

Dr. Tarasch's favourite remark, says the Pester Lloyd of June 20th, is that "it is not sufficient to be a good chess player—one must play good chess." The doctor is genial in manner, sarcastic, and witty. "Ah!" he said, when one of the Vienna masters brought about a draw. "I am here in Vienna, among the Remismonde." But the Pester Lloyd tells a much more amusing story about an unnamed visitor, who sat for two hours apparently intent on following the progress of a game between Herr Schlechter and Mr. Showalter, and who afterwards acknowledged that he knew nothing about chess. His real interest had been in watching the ceaseless swing, eastward and westward, of Mr. Showalter's American lace shoes, and the equally ceaseless swing, northward and southward, of Herr Schlechter's Austrian patent leather pumps.

THE steamer Kohsu Maru, belonging to Ishimori Saisuke, Ohara-mura, Oshikagori, Miyagi Prefecture, while on a voyage to Ishimaki the other day, encountered a severe storm, and was on the point of foundering when she was rescued by the coast-guards.

A FIRE broke out the other day on the sailing vessel Koro Maru, anchoring off Honmatscho, Kyobashi district. It originated from a quantity of lime on board, and, in spite of the strenuous efforts of the crew, much damage was done before the flames were extinguished.

A PETITION to H.M. the Queen, signed by 21,000 Uitlanders, has been transmitted by Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of Cape Colony, declaring their position to be intolerable and praying for enquiry. The Times asks: "Will President Krüger disregard warning until too late?"

A FORMOSAN despatch dated the 27th ult., states that on the 24th 29 new cases of plague were reported in Tainan prefecture, 19 proving fatal. On the following day three new cases occurred in Taipei prefecture, two of the patients dying. On the 26th, one new case and one death were reported from Tai-chin Prefecture.

A GIRL, apparently 16 years of age, committed suicide on Sunday by placing herself before a train at Shiba, Tokyo. She was completely cut to pieces. The next morning, the body of a girl about the same age was discovered floating in the sea. They were friends, and had decided to commit suicide at the same time for a trifling cause.

RUSSIA is said to have finally settled the Newchwang railway difficulty entirely to British satisfaction, the Czar expressly intimating his desire to give a tangible proof of peaceful disposition on the eve of the Disarmament Conference. It is further said that a Convention defining the respective spheres of influence will be signed shortly.

DET-ILS of the fire at Kawawa-mura, Hamanaguni, Shizuoka Prefecture, are to hand. The fire originated at some wood-cutting works, and extended across the Tenryu river to the town of Kakezuka opposite, destroying 300 houses there. The flames also found their way to Komaba Sodehagi village, and reduced seven dwellings to ashes.

A FEW days ago a party of five students engaged a boat and went for a row in Shinagawa Bay. As they had not returned at a late hour in the evening, and a strong wind was blowing, the owner of the boat went out in search of them, but in vain. Some sailors state that they saw the students tossing about at night in a high sea off Shiba beach. Their fate is unknown.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Saturday, March 25.

There is an evident attempt on the part of some Opposition journals in Tokyo to organize a campaign against the Foreign Office. It is one of the most irrational and inconsequential campaigns hitherto witnessed. The San-moon episode was first taken as a point of attack, and because Japan, like every other civilized Power, remained quiet the officials in charge of her foreign affairs were denounced as incompetent. Then came a rumour that the United States had asked for an allotment to form a settlement in Amoy. That procedure was regarded as infringing the pledge given by China against the alienation of any part of Fuhkien, and again the Foreign Office was condemned for not protecting Japanese interests. Events having proved that, so far as China was concerned, Viscount Aoki knew his business very much better than his assailants knew theirs, Korea is now taken up as a new weapon, and an effort is made to show that Russia has once more appeared upon the scene in Sŏul; that the recent overthrow of the Cabinet was due solely to its hesitation about granting her demand for whaling concessions, and that she is about to send troops to guard the Emperor's palace. Local colour is imparted to this last item by explaining that the Emperor recently ordered the evacuation of a school in the vicinity of the palace, with the intention of providing a barracks for the expected Cossacks. These extremely silly attacks do not appear to interest anyone.

Tuesday, March 28.

We find many comments in vernacular newspapers about the Liberal irruption into Fukushima Prefecture. Originally, as has been already explained, Fukushima was a Liberal strong-hold, and Mr. Kono Hironaka commanded the fort. Mr. Kono Hironaka also aspired to be the head of the Liberal Party; which ambition brought him into such sharp collision with Mr. Hoshi Toru and Mr. Hayashi Yuzo, that he finally went over to the Progressists. The event assumed quite sensational dimensions at the time, for Mr. Kono was the leader of the Party in the Lower House, and it seemed that his disaffection must have serious consequences. Many curious explanations were also offered; some of them not at all creditable to the deserter's integrity. Fukushima then fell under the sway of three politicians. Mr. Kono retained a great deal of his old influence there, but a section of the local magnates followed the flag of Mr. Abe Hankou—the stubborn Conservative who, in 1893, made himself notorious by opposing mixed residence—and another section attached themselves to Mr. Shiba Shiro, the organizer of the numerically insignificant but morally important Reform Party (Kakushin-to). All three sections joined the Progressists at the time when the Kaishin-to and the various minor parties, dissolving their separate organizations, coalesced to form the Shimpo-to (Progressists). It happened, however, that Mr. Kusaka Yoshio was at one time Governor of Fukushima. Mr. Kusaka is well known to foreigners. He formerly controlled the affairs of Kanagawa Prefecture and subsequently those of Nagasaki, and his great abilities would long ago have carried him to a high place had they been accompanied by a more tolerant mood. During his governorship of Fukushima Mr. Kusaka won a large following among the local politicians, and, now that he has joined the ranks of the Liberals, after long abstention from public life, he becomes at once a power in Fukushima. On the other hand, Mr. Kono Hironaka finds himself a nobody among the Progressists. Whether his union with them is incongruous or whether they can not forget his old associations, he does not make head-way, and is disappointed. At this moment of dissatisfaction he sees his influence still further weakened by the loss of supporters who have gone over to Mr. Kusaka, and the general impression seems to be that he will return to his old allegiance. Meanwhile the Liberals have invaded Fukushima, without encountering any of the fierce opposition that the Progressists were expected to organise. On the 25th they had a monster meeting in that town, and their speakers, including Count Itagaki, were excellently received. It seems to be taken for granted that if Mr. Kono Hironaka returns to the Liberal Party, his temporary aberration will be forgiven and forgotten. Tolerance is not one of the virtues that the Japanese lack. En passant we may express our sincere satisfaction at seeing Mr. Kusaka once more enter public life. The Liberal Party has certainly gained greatly in influence and talent since last autumn.

Wednesday, March 29.

The Liberals had a very successful lecture meeting in the Kinki-kan at Kanda on the 27th March. The principal speakers were Mr. Hoshi Toru, Mr. Ebara Soroku, and Count Itagaki. Mr. Hoshi spoke in the plainest terms without any reserve whatever. He attacked Count Okuma and the Progressists vehemently, and charged them with gross inconsistency, inasmuch as, after voting for the post-bellum programme, they declined to agree to the taxes necessary for carrying it out. Altogether he laid no less than twenty-five sins to their charge. He included Viscounts Miura and Tani in his assault, and he then passed on to eulogise the doings of his own Party. The Liberals, he said, had stepped into the breach at a time of great danger. Had they not joined hands with the Government, the Cabinet must have fallen or the Diet must have been dissolved. In either case the suspension of a part of the Constitution would have been probable, and the completion of the scheme of armaments expansion would have been indefinitely postponed. Hence it might be said of the Liberals that they had saved the Constitution, had preserved the people's rights, and had enabled the country to carry out its system of defences. In short, the Liberals deserved to have a vote of thanks from the nation. Mr. Hoshi's speech lasted two hours. It elicited some signs of dissent from the audience, but the voices of applause overwhelmed every other sound. Mr. Ebara Soroku discussed the moral responsibilities of the Party in his usual undemonstrative style, and Count Itagaki, whose oratory is said to have been marked by many graces of language and gesture, set forth the policy of the Liberals.

It is confidently asserted that Count Itagaki is to become a member of the Privy Council. That means, of course, that he will cease to be a party leader, and we presume that Mr. Hoshi Toru will henceforth be regarded as the head of the Liberals, unless—which is very probable—some older statesman joins their ranks.

The Progressists are certainly not riding on the tide of success at present. The wind seems to be filling the sails of the Liberals only. Of course no one imagines that a party led by Count Okuma and including in its ranks at least a score of unquestionably able men, can be permanently effaced. But the Progressists are labouring under the difficulty of not being able to find a platform on which they can raise themselves into prominence. Their recent attempt can not be called successful. They proclaimed a policy of financial retrenchment, declaring that they advocated a reduction of the Land Tax and a diminution of 17 million yen in the Ordinary Expenditures. It was by a Progressist Cabinet, however, that the outlays on account of the second-period armaments-expansion programme were presented for parliamentary approval, and their rivals are not slow to point out that inconsistency. Moreover, the addition of Viscount Miura's name to its roll of members has not enhanced the Party's reputation. Viscount Miura is regarded as a man of obsolete, not to say mediæval methods.

QUEEN AND EMPRESS.

Whatever may have been the personal character of the late Queen of Korea, she was certainly a factor of political unrest. Foreigners coming into close contact with her soon learned to love and respect her, but the outside world knew her chiefly as a centre of Court intrigue and national dissension. Mademoiselle Om, who is now endeavouring to reach the throne, seems likely to wear her predecessor's political mantle. Apparently her influence with the Emperor does not suffice to accomplish her ambition, or—which is more probable—the Emperor is too weak to carry out her wishes without aid from his courtiers. Hence the lady is plotting on her own account. She has already organized a strong following, and of course, as her partisans grow in number, her enemies also multiply. She will probably succeed in becoming Empress, but not without sowing seeds of future trouble. On what foreign Power does she lean? It would be an incredible novelty were any political intrigue conducted in Sŏul without some appeal for alien interference. Rumour says that Mademoiselle Om is pro-Russian. There is also a whisper that she inclines to Japan. At all events, she does not rely equally on both, and it may be taken for granted that she will not help to smoothe the relations of the rival Powers. Many Japanese imagine that Russia has permanently effaced herself in Korea. We do not believe anything of the kind. Even though Vladivostok were to be a mere outlying station of the Trans-Asian Line, Russia could hardly take the risk of having a strong Power sandwiched between that important depôt and the Liaotung Peninsula. But the extensive works now in progress at Vladivostok can not be reconciled with the idea that it is to be a place of secondary grade. The Korean peninsula is destined to play a great part in Far-Eastern history, and the Empress Om may be one of the prominent figures in the scene.

YOUNG JAPAN AND AMERICA.

Young Japan, as represented by the Nippon, shows a strong inclination to espouse the cause of the Filipinos. It was from the distinguished editor of that newspaper that Aguinaldo's Secretary recently received an invitation to meet at dinner a number of Tokyo journalists, and thus obtained an exceptionally good opportunity to ventilate his views. The Nippon devotes its leading columns to some statements which are almost sensational. The Americans, it says, have now a force of twenty-five thousand men in Manila. Yet they are unable to produce any permanent impression on the Filipinos, and if they want to conquer the islands, they must increase their army by fifty thousand, an effort which will tax their strength almost beyond endurance. Then the Nippon goes on to relate, in regretful tones, the alleged excesses committed by American soldiers; the breaking into houses, the violating of women, and the general want of discipline, all of which our contemporary seems to accept with bland credulity. Presently fever, and malaria, and the fierce heat of a tropical summer will range their forces on the side of the Filipinos, and then America will find herself in the dilemma of the Chinese proverb's ram in a bush (shiyō shokushan no himkyō), unable either to advance or retire.

The moral of this gloomy story, according to our contemporary, is that Japan ought to throw her weight into the scale in behalf of the Filipinos. The Nippon alleges that when Count Okuma held the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, he addressed to the American Secretary of State a despatch explaining that if any satisfactory method could be devised for granting autonomy to the Filipinos under the suzerainty of the United States, such a solution of the problem would have Japan's hearty approval. Recently, again, President McKinley, seeking an expression of Marquis Ito's view, received from him also an assurance that Japan had no ulterior designs whatever, and that she would willingly fall in line with any scheme for granting a measure of independence to the Filipinos. Thus Japan is pledged to the policy of an independent nation in the Philippines under American protection, and since the problem has now become extremely difficult for America to solve, a little display of resolution on the part of the Japanese would doubtless tend materially to promote the desired solution.

If the Nichi Nichi Shimbun spoke with authority, its definition of Japan's proper attitude towards the Far Eastern Question would be very interesting. Even as an individual statement of policy it is instructive, statesmanlike, and dignified. Russia and Japan, we are told, have mutually agreed to observe certain limits in their dealings with Korea. We believe that Russia will fulfil her engagements, and that other Powers also will show a like spirit. It is asserted in some quarters that Russia stepped out of Korea on condition that no obstacle to her doings in China was offered by Japan. That is quite erroneous. Japan did not pledge herself to any course in China vis-à-vis Russia. It is further stated that Russia is again beginning to interfere in Korean affairs, and that Japan's powerlessness to check her is palpable. There are no grounds for the assertion, and it may be confidently declared that if Russia violates any of the cardinal conditions of her agreement with Japan, or acts in contravention of its spirit, Japan will not be a consenting party. Russia must be well aware of that fact and will keep it in view. Japan's policy towards China and Korea is perfectly plain and above-board. It may be succinctly stated. "Her first object is to maintain the independence of Korea and to preserve the peace of the Orient. A course of paltry acquisitions and aggressions (koku taru sunjo seikido) is not regarded by her as worthy or necessary. Neither will she trouble herself to offer aid in this quarter or opposition in that because of the selfish designs of one or two States. Her foreign policy is perfectly plain and intelligible. She need not concern herself about securing small footholds and stationing handfuls of troops there in order to establish her sphere of influence and guard it in times of crisis. She is separated from the cardinal points of China and Korea by a mere strip of sea that can be crossed in one bound. Who could measure strength with her in the day of emergency? Certainly no Power that is burdened with the responsibility of guarding many territories. Should Russia take steps leading to a collision with another Power in Korea she would not find Liaotung sufficient for her purpose. We can rely on ourselves. There is no occasion to feel any apprehension."

That is certainly spirited writing. Nor can we accuse the writer of exaggerating the strength of his country's position. Japan occupies a coign of vantage in the Far East. She need not join in any precipitate scramble, but may bide her time quietly. All that she has to do is to prove herself alert, not inert.

MR. ECKHART.

Mr. Eckhart, who has held the position of Musical Instructor to the Imperial Band for many years—some fifteen, if we remember rightly—is about to leave Japan. A farewell entertainment was given in his honour on the 24th ultimo, in the Imperial Musical Academy at Ushigome, their Excellencies Viscount Tanaka and Baron Sannomiya acting as hosts. Mr. Eckhart's departure will be a great loss to this country. A quiet, unobtrusive, but thoroughly competent expert, he has done admirable work. Music in Japan owes him a heavy debt, for not only has he contributed largely to the technical progress of the art, but also his adaptations and compositions have permanently and valuably enriched the nation's musical repertoire.

THE LATEST AMERICAN VICTORY IN THE PHILIPPINES.

It has been remarked that the losses reported to have been suffered by the Filipinos in their latest fight with the United States' troops do not bear a particularly favorable ratio to the American losses. The figures were 400 on the side of the Filipinos and 100 on the side of the Americans. But that question depends almost entirely on the character of the conflict. If it was a battle in the open, the figures would not be satisfactory. But if, as is more than probable, the Americans had to attack the Filipinos in an entrenched position, the relative losses are not by any means unfavourable.

THE "JIJI SHIMPO" ON FOREIGN POLICY.

We do not recognise the eminently sober, practical Jiji Shimpō in the newspaper which now discusses Japan's foreign policy with so much vagueness and so little apparent rationality. Article after article at present appearing in our contemporary's columns may be summarized as nothing more or less than an outcry for a coup of some kind or other, no matter what. There is certainly a great deal of truth in the contention that Japan is becoming more and more dependent on foreign countries for her food supplies, and that, since she closely resembles England in that respect, she ought to follow England's eminently practical example in providing for the safety of her over-sea routes. But we do not see how the people's want of inclination for enterprises abroad can be laid to the charge of the Foreign Office's inactivity. It is apparent that the Japanese have no strength at present to essay commercial or industrial undertakings on the Asiatic continent. They have made no use of the settlements acquired for them in China under the Shimonoseki Treaty. They can not build the Formosan Railway. They have obtained a concession for a Sōul-Fusan line, but there is no talk of commencing its construction. What has all that to do with the Government's foreign policy, however? The Jiji seems to think that there is a good deal of connexion. It avers that when some Chinese recently applied for a loan on the security of a mine, Japanese capitalists declined to render any assistance because they placed no reliance on the strength of the Government's policy in China, and it hints pretty plainly that if some step were taken to convert the Fuhkien guarantee into a reality, a spirit of over-sea enterprise would immediately be developed among the people. Well, that is assuredly a view which finds no confirmation in English history. The British Government has invariably followed, not led, the over-sea enterprise of its people. Nor do Japanese annals justify such a contention. The war with China was a tolerably striking coup. If any act of foreign policy could stir the Japanese people, they ought to have been moved by the drama of 1894-5. But they have not made any resolute attempt to gather the fruits of that war. They have done nothing in China, and very little in Formosa. It may be that we wrongly interpret the Jiji's meaning, but if it really intends to suggest that some bold stroke of foreign policy should be made merely to rouse the people from their languid mood, it is giving pernicious and ill-considered advice.

JAPANESE CONSULAR REPORTS.

A vernacular contemporary refers in terms of strong condemnation to the trade reports compiled by Japan's Consuls abroad. They are declared to be not only belated, but totally devoid of originality and quite useless to commercial folks. Mr. Consul Brennan's report is instanced as an example of the kind of document that should be prepared. The Kokumin says that the Japanese themselves learned a great deal from it about their own country, and that it must have conveyed most valuable information to those for whom it was written.

WILLS AND OTHER THINGS.

Experience has shown that newspaper discussions in this Settlement with regard to questions of law or treaty seldom lead to any useful result. The parties to the controversy think very much more of gaining some paltry verbal advantage than of elucidating the facts, and are content with any argument that serves their turn, however bewildering the effect may be upon the public. An example is before us. On the 13th instant a writer in the Japan Herald, discussing "The Prospect under the Treaties," said:—

Whilst on this line of thought, we may call attention to two very important questions upon which more exact information with proper references should be obtained from Dr. Lönholm. One is the matter of superficies, which he extends in a way that could never be expected from the Civil Codes, and the other is the matter of wills. It might be convenient if all questions on wills were to be determined by the law of the testator's nationality, but we have never heard of such a thing being done, and we are anxious to know whether Dr. Lönholm's statement is correct. If the will is to be governed in the usual way, that is by the law of the testator's domicile, there will arise many difficult questions, and the Japanese Courts may even claim that all old residents are domiciled in Japan.

Now this is a very simple matter. The whole question, as propounded by the writer we have quoted, is whether the Japanese Code provides or does not provide that matters relating to wills shall be governed by the law of the testator's nationality. There is an excellent translation of the Japanese Law concerning the Application of Laws in General. It is accessible to everybody who chooses to spend a few shillings on acquiring it. Yet the writer in the Japan Herald had the splendid effrontery to declare that he had not consulted the translation, though he undertook to publicly discuss the law governing wills! We doubt whether in any other part of the world a journalist would have the impudence to come before the public with such a confession on his lips. Why did he not consult the Law? What did he mean by his nonchalant declaration "we have never heard of such a thing"? If he had not heard of it, his own laziness was solely to blame, for the whole matter is set forth by the Law in the plainest terms. Noticing our contemporary's paragraph and wondering at the ignorance it displayed, we quoted the 26th Article of the "Law concerning the Application of Laws in General," which runs thus:—

The existence and the effect of a will are governed by the law of the nationality to which the maker of the will belongs at the time of the making.

The revocation of a will is governed by the law of the nationality of the maker at the time of revocation.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding two paragraphs, the law of the place where the act is done may be followed as to the forms of a will.

Nothing could be plainer. In the face of these provisions, there is not the most infinitesimal room for doubt. Had it been the object of the writer in the Japan Herald to assist his readers to a knowledge of the conditions that will really exist "under the Treaties," he would have frankly acknowledged the significance of the Law as quoted by us, and let the matter rest there. What he did, on the contrary, was to pen the following reply:—

On the question relating to wills, the Mail refers to Dr. Lönholm's translation of the Code as a proof that Dr. Lönholm's statement in his other book is correct. We are quite aware that the two things are consistent, but what we want to know is whether either of them is a correct statement of the Japanese law, because when it is an universally recognised principle of International law, that wills are to be construed according to the law of the testator's domicile, it is startling to find that, if the will is to take effect in Japan, it will be construed by a law which may be quite different.

It is really worth while to compare this paragraph with the original statements of the same writer. At the outset he declared that "more exact information with proper references should be obtained from Dr. Lönholm." Now Dr. Lönholm could not possibly furnish any information except the provisions of Japanese law itself, or give any references except his own translation of that law. Yet, when the translation is quoted verbatim by us, the quaintly quibbling reply is that Dr. Lönholm is the translator, and that to cite Dr. Lönholm's translation in support of Dr. Lönholm's digest is inconclusive! Moreover, the writer having explicitly informed us in the first instance that "he had never heard of such a thing" as "questions on wills being determined by the law of the testator's nationality," avers, in the second, that he is "quite aware" of the existence of a Japanese law in that sense as translated by Dr. Lönholm. Of course his criticisms are simply persiflage and prevarication. And the most comical point is his latest declaration:—"What we want to know is whether either of them" (Dr. Lönholm's statement or Dr. Lönholm's translation) is a correct statement of the Japanese law." Is not that amusing? Why should not this befogged writer consult the law? What right has he to throw doubt upon the interpretation or the translation of a competent jurist like Dr. Lönholm if he will not take the trouble to examine the meaning of the law himself and to compare the translation with the original? This is precisely on a par with the effrontery of his former assertion that he was "anxious to know" a thing which he should have made it his imperative business to ascertain before venturing to speak at all. He might just as well announce that he is "anxious to know" how a word is spelled, but that really he finds it too troublesome to consult a dictionary. The moral of the whole incident is that the duty of helping to enlighten the public is altogether subverted to controversial ends by writers like those we have quoted. They do not care what confusion they create provided that, like the cuttle-fish, they can conceal their own blunders under an inky cloud. "Superficies" is simply the right to occupy and use land for building or planting purposes during a long term of years. There is not the smallest ambiguity about it. But our local critics, having, more suo, blundered at the outset by interpreting the law without consulting it, applied themselves thenceforth to save their face by quibble after quibble, until they can now claim the honourable record of having perniciously perplexed the public and mischievously discredited a privilege which it is of the greatest importance to foreigners to understand and enjoy.

SILK.

A very marked "difference of doctors" is discovered by contrasting some observations elicited by a Fiji Shimpō reporter from Mr. Nakamigawa, Manager of the Mitsui Bank, with certain opinions recently expressed by foreign experts in these columns on the subject of sericulture and silk-reeling in Japan. Mr. Nakamigawa is a man of much eminence in the business world of his country, and his views deserve to be received with all deference. But we are inclined to think that, in this instance, his information is defective. He asserts that Japanese silk has so greatly improved in quality as to leave its Chinese rival far behind, and even to oust Italian silk for weaving purposes. Starting from that premise, namely, that the position of Japanese silk in the markets of the world is now assured, Mr. Nakamigawa goes on to reason that Japanese sericulturists are cutting their own throats by parting with their product at needlessly low prices. He tells them, in effect, that the quotations in New York are virtually ruled by the quotations in Yokohama, and that if Japan chooses to "keep a stiff upper lip" she can permanently raise the profits on her silk industry to a much higher level than they now occupy. In fact, he predicts that, if his advice be followed, a thousand yen a bale will become the normal figure instead of the exceptional. In the margin of these comments Mr. Nakamigawa avers that, in the face of the low price of Japanese silk, the Chinese found it impossible to run the filatures started by them some years ago. The establishment of those filatures produced an unpleasant sensation of alarm in Japan, and we should have thought that, in accordance with the elementary principles of competition, Mr. Nakamigawa would welcome their disappearance from the field as the removal of a serious danger to the Japanese staple. But his remarks read as though he imagined that Japan's prices ought to be raised so as to leave a margin for rivalry. The foreign experts, whose opinions we recently quoted, take a very different view. They say that Japan's silk trade is gravely menaced owing to defective sericulture and unscientific reeling. European and American manufacturers are beginning to look at it askance, and will not purchase it now if they can get the Italian or French substitute. In short, so far from commanding the foreign market, Japan obtains ready access to it only in the event of a shortage of the European crop. Mr. Nakamigawa may be right when he alleges that, owing to the essentially domestic methods of the Japanese sericulturists, they have no definite idea of what their silk costs, and consequently sell it at prices below the proper figures. We hesitate to think, however, that he can be right when he issues a general invitation to his countrymen to raise their prices. Such a course would certainly deprive Japanese silk of one of its advantages in competition, and, moreover, Mr. Nakamigawa seems to altogether overlook the fact that the foreign middlemen who purchase the silk work on margins of profits so narrowed by their own rivalry that the Japanese seller could not possibly hope to do better though he had direct access to the markets abroad. Several attempts have been made by Japanese middlemen to export silk on their own account. They have always ended in failure, and the plain inference is that the foreigner has so organized the business as to make it yield a maximum of profit to the Japanese grower and reeler. For the rest, it is impossible for any rational person to believe that Japanese silk, which is of limited quantity and represents only a fraction of the world's produce, can be manipulated in such a way as to dictate terms to the world. A special product for which there is a special demand may be sold at monopoly prices; and a product of unlimited quantity for which there is a general demand may control the market by underselling all competitors. But to say that the price of the world's silk can be arbitrarily raised by a demand asserted on behalf of a small portion of it, is a singular and inexplicable proposition. However, the most dangerous feature of Mr. Nakamigawa's thesis is his assertion that Japanese sericulturists and reellers have reached a high plane of excellence and are now in a position secure against rivalry. That is precisely what our foreign correspondents denied most strenuously, and, since Mr. Nakamigawa's words will obtain wide circulation through the columns of the Yû Shimpô, they may work untold mischief; unless, indeed, he is right, and the foreign experts of Yokohama are egregiously wrong.

JAPANESE WOMEN.

The Yû Shimpô's advice to the women of Japan is that they should revolt against the immorality of the stronger sex. Our contemporaries regard its countrymen as hopeless, for the present at all events. They will neither mend nor conceal their evil ways. But the women should differentiate themselves by plainly evincing their dissatisfaction. The tacit consent which they now give to their husband's infidelities tend not merely to encourage the sinner, but also implicate the sufferer indirectly. The near approach of mixed residence is urged as an additional incentive to reform. Foreign ladies, the Yû predicts, will have nothing to do with their Japanese sisters if they see that the latter countenance such abuses.

In this campaign Europeans and Americans will heartily endorse the Yû's efforts. That most execrable of old-time precepts, that a wife's first duty is to divest herself of jealousy, can not be too soon dethroned from the pedestal it has long occupied in Japan. But, after all, what hope is there for Japanese women so long as the law does not recognise their rights? The new Civil Code provides that a husband may obtain a judicial divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, but no such provision exists for the protection of the wife. That is one of the worst features of the new Code, but no protest has been raised against it anywhere.

THE OSAKA HARBOUR WORKS.

The third issue of the Osaka Harbour Works loan bonds seems to have entailed a rather difficult negotiation. The Third National Bank is the Municipality's vis-à-vis for the financing of the loan. It appears that the civil authorities, in view of the greatly improved condition of the money market, thought that the bonds—they carry 6 per cent. interest—should be taken by the Bank at 95; a price slightly higher than their present market value. The Bank fought for more favourable terms, and finally obtained the bonds at 92½. The amount of the issue is 2,600,000 yen. This transaction vividly illustrates the difficulties that beset Japan's attempts to finance her public undertakings in the home market. Six per-cent. bonds sold at 92½ is anything but a rosy operation.

THE COURT OF CASSATION.

It is not easy for folks of ordinary intelligence to follow the reasoning of critics who, like the editor of the London Spectator, arguing from the fact that the French Government asked the Chambers to transfer the Dreyfus case from the Criminal Division of the Court of Cassation to the whole Court, contend that such a course is "to pack the highest Court rather than it should pass an unpopular verdict." That contention admits of one interpretation only, so far as we can perceive. It amounts to saying that, although the Criminal Division of the Court of Cassation could be trusted to do justice, the whole chamber, of which the Criminal Division is a part, could not be trusted. From an English or American point of view it is impossible to endorse, on general grounds, the course taken by M. Dupuy. In truth, so long as the fabric of Anglo-Saxon administration and Anglo-Saxon Society stands intact, the idea of parliamentary interference with the Judiciary's discharge of its functions is scarcely conceivable. That aspect of the incident certainly invites criticism. But surely logic is a little at fault when it is claimed that to enlist the wide wisdom and large responsibility of the whole Court instead of the comparatively limited capacities and authority of one section of it, is to pack the tribunal in the interests of the Anti-Dreyfusites? France has suffered terribly over this Dreyfus business. She has presented to the world the spectacle of a nation dangerously deficient in moral ballast, though in truth the drama derives much of its suggestiveness from the lurid light that racial passion and prejudice have cast on it. But in this matter of the Court of Cassation, it is not difficult to detect special reasons which, in M. Dupuy's opinion, may have outweighed the general inexpediency of inviting the Legislature to interfere with the Judiciary. The Dreyfus problem had assumed colossal dimensions. The reputation of the nation, if not the safety of the Republic, was involved in finding a speedy and satisfactory solution. It had reached the Court of Cassation, the country's supreme tribunal of appeal. If the verdict of that Court did not terminate the pernicious conflict of opinions and collision of races, the very gravest results must be apprehended. But doubts had been thrown on the impartiality of the Criminal Division of the Court by which the case was to be heard. They were proved to be entirely baseless doubts. Still, the mere fact of their existence showed conclusively that the Criminal Division's decision would not terminate the crisis. If it did not, what then? Nothing would remain but chaos. Was it not, therefore, a statesmanlike procedure on the part of M. Dupuy to propose that the acumen and credit of the whole Court should be at once enlisted in the cause of public tranquillity? Beyond a judgment of the whole Court of Cassation, sitting with all its Divisions united, France can not go. That is her last word. M. Dupuy and the two Chambers of the Legislature wanted to get that word at once. They saw that nothing else would suffice. So, at least, we interpret their action. And we must emphatically add that to talk of the whole Court of Cassation as "packed" because it is asked to pronounce a decision which the French nation will not accept conclusively on the authority of only one section of the Court, is as insulting to France as to the intelligence of the public.

"CHINESE CURIOS."

There was recently put up for sale by auction in this Settlement a collection of porcelains and other objects described as "Old Chinese Curios," and the advertisements of the sale stated that the collection comprised:—"Blue Hawthorn Jars, Five-Colour Kwong-hi, and Five-Colour Ming Porcelains, Ming Cloisonné Vases, Old Bronze, Keen-lung Blue and Five-Colour and Tao-wang Porcelains, &c." These things were doubtless offered in perfect good faith by the firm of respectable auctioneers who managed the sale. Auctioneers, we believe, have no responsibility in such matters if they choose to disavow it, as was doubtless done in the case we are considering. A client sends certain goods to an auctioneer, and accompanies them with descriptions which the auctioneer accepts, at the same time warning buyers that they must purchase at their own risk and on their own judgment. We do not know the owner of these "old Chinese curios." He, too, may have been acting in good faith. But we are informed by a connoisseur in whose competence we have full confidence, that the advertised description was grossly misleading, and that the so-called Ming porcelains, Kang-hsi porcelains, Kien-lung porcelains, tao-kwang porcelains, Ming cloisonné vases, and old bronzes, were all—with one insignificant exception—articles of modern manufacture. Possibly it will be said that we are exceeding our journalistic duty when we allude to this affair. But it seems to us that if information of a deception calculated to cause loss and disappointment comes to us, we are bound to publish it, especially when a collection so erroneously described is not merely advertised in the ordinary manner, but is also brought to public notice by an editorial eulogy, as was the case with these particular "Old Chinese Curios." There is a point at which silence assumes the character of collusion, and that point is reached, we think, when sales such as the above are suffered to pass unnoticed by those who are in a position to protect the public against being deluded by them.

THE IMPERIAL LIBRARY.

The building in Ueno Park now used for the Imperial Library is a structure not at all worthy of its purpose, and during the past eight years the officials of the Education Department have been endeavouring to obtain a suitable site for a new edifice. The Shibiya parade-ground and the public garden at the foot of Kudan (Ushigafuchi, as it is called) were contemplated originally, but some difficulty arose in each case, and it appears that a site in Ueno Park, which belongs to the Department, has at last been selected faute de mieux. There is said to be much dissatisfaction about this site. It is proverbial that the Household Department, owing to its significant political influence, can never succeed in obtaining favourable consideration for its projects, and the failure in this instance is attributed to that cause. Certainly Ueno Park is an exceedingly remote place for the principal public library in the country.

A NEUTRAL ZONE.

We observe that the latest charge brought against the Americans at Manila is that they failed to "preserve" a wide neutral zone between the two forces," and their failure is declared to have been the cause of the collision which ultimately occurred. The inventor of that most ridiculous accusation writes as though he were an Englishman, but acknowledges himself to be "a friend of the Filipinos." It is in the latter capacity, we presume, that he sets himself to create ill-feeling between Britons and Americans by pretending that the Government at Washington has been playing fast and loose with John Bull, simulating willingness to negotiate with him about the Alaskan Boundary, and promising to support him in China if he abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, which promise has been unscrupulously broken. It is not surprising that men should be found to concoct malicious falsehoods of that kind. There will be liars and mischief-makers in the world so long as human nature remains human. But it is surprising that any newspaper calling itself British should lend its columns for the circulation of libellous inventions the palpable object of which is to set England and America by the ears in order that the Filipinos may benefit by their dissensions. That is patriotism of a high type. The neutral-zone talk saves the situation, for its comicality disarms indignation. In order that a neutral zone may be preserved between two military forces, it is necessary that each should be a consenting party to the arrangement, and if each is a consenting party there can be no fighting. The sapiently critical "friend of the Filipinos" would have been equally sensible and more direct had he abstained from circumlocutionary prattle about a neutral zone, and declared at once that "General Otis ought to have exacted from the Filipinos a promise not to fight, and then there would have been no fighting." All this talk about the wrongs suffered by the poor unoffending Filipinos, and the cruelties to which they have been subjected by the inhuman American soldiers, is becoming very tiresome. A great many people would sympathise with the Filipinos if they stood up stoutly and fought a straightforward fight for independence, but their attempts to turn the scales in their favour by falsehood and slander are earning for them contempt and ridicule, and if they imagine that by such methods they can demonstrate their competence to be autonomic, a very bitter disappointment awaits them.

THE IMPERIAL ESTATE.

We recently published some figures relating to investments made by the Imperial Estates Bureau in various enterprises. A full list is now given by the Yoji Shimpō, as follows:—

Name of Investments.	No. of Shares.
Yusen Kaisha	80,550
Bank of Japan	60,660
Specie Bank	30,200
Japan Railway	24,422
Tanaka Railway	18,460
Kyoto Railway	3,000
Gan-Yetsu Railway	2,000
San Gu Railway	1,143
Fifteenth National Bank	1,111
Su Bu Railway	720

The total number of shares in 231,266, and their total value at present market prices is 41,970,971 yen.

CHINESE IDIOSYNCRASIES.

It is remarked by a Tokyo journalist that people are mistaken who consider China to be in a parlous condition. The Manchu dynasty is menaced with disaster, but the Chinese nation will always retain its individuality. That is suggestive. We have often thought that the Chinese are the Jews of the East. They seem to rival the Hebrew in extraordinary tenacity of national idiosyncrasies. You can not Europeanise a Chinaman. Indeed, it is more possible to denationalize a Jew; for though the Jews, en masse, have never thoroughly coalesced with the Gentiles, individual Jews have become so nearly German, or French, or English, or Russian, that the type alone differentiates them. Can we say as much of the Chinese? How many Chinamen are there who have obliterated their Celestial spots and put on an American or European skin? There are a great many Japanese. Indeed, the Japanese accomplish the metamorphosis easily enough. But the Chinese are a highly specialized order of beings. They can neither assimilate their surroundings nor be assimilated by them. The repeated object lessons they have received during the past hundred years ought to have taught them the value of protection by mimicry, a principle which their neighbours, the Japanese, appreciated very quickly. But the Chinaman has not mastered even the alphabet of that important knowledge. He appears to constitute one of those types which nature takes peculiar care to preserve. We may not endorse nature's good taste in the matter, but we can scarcely ignore her resolution. The Chinaman seems to be a permanent institution.

FORMOSA.

Telegrams from Formosa are to the effect that the rebel chief Ko Ti-at has made act of submission. This man, though only 26 or 27 years of age, is said to have wielded great influence. He had his head-quarters in the Kagi district, and whenever he raised his standard numbers of insurgents flocked to it. There were originally four recognised leaders of rebels in Formosa; namely, Tin Chiu-kiok and Lin Ho-ong of Taipei; Hong Kok-tim of Taichu, and Ko Ti-at of Kagi, the last being far the most formidable. The three first had already been brought under control, and only Ko remained. The train of events by which his submission was brought about is said to have been this:—When Baron Kodama sent a force to clear out the Tainan rebels, the latter's leader, Liu Tek-sek, was taken prisoner. Finding that Liu had formerly held the rank of Major-General in the Chinese army, the Japanese treated him with due consideration, and, instead of subjecting him to the punishment of a rebel, gave him safe conduct to Amoy. Liu was so moved by this act of grace that he despatched letters to his former chief Ko Ti-at, urging the latter to submit to the Japanese, and Ko has now followed his some-time lieutenant's counsel. It is now expected, according to Tokyo newspapers, that the days of disturbance in Formosa are virtually over. We should be glad to think that the forecast is justified.

OMNISCIENT JOURNALISM.

Under the heading of "Imaginative Journalism" the Japan Times politely charges us with "gratuitous misrepresentation," because we said, "many Japanese imagine that Russia has permanently effaced herself in Korea." Our contemporary is also good enough to warn us that "too frequent a recourse to imagination is dangerous, especially in the field of every-day journalism." We fully appreciate the courtesy of the language in which the accusation is couched, and also the value of a warning coming from such a competent source. But we venture to suggest that omniscient journalism is also perilous, and that when the Japan Times undertakes to declare that "no such idea is entertained by any Japanese of intelligence," it lays claim to a monopoly of knowledge which can hardly be admitted. As a matter of fact several Japanese have expressed to us, and have controversially maintained, the view which our contemporary graciously attributes to our own imagination, and though it is possible that they may not have been qualified to rank as "intelligent Japanese," according to the standard of the Japan Times, they belonged to that category in the estimation of common work-a-day folk like ourselves. Russia's sudden exit from the Korean stage after M. de Speyer's celebrated ultimatum was interpreted by more than one foreign publicist to mean that she had decided to make Talien her chief point of exit in the Pacific, and that, Vladivostok being thus relegated to a secondary place, the Korean peninsula lost much of its strategical value in her eyes. To say that a similar interpretation of the incident commended itself to some Japanese minds also, may seem to the Japan Times like "indulging in the gift of imagination at the expense of the Japanese people," but it appears to us that the "imagination" is chiefly on the side of a journal which thinks that all clever persons must share its own view, and that no Japanese could be so lacking in intelligence as to entertain the opinion which several foreigners held. Our contemporary also indulges in a gracious sneer at "the secluded study of the Editor of the Japan Mail in Nagasaki." We regret to find that the editor of the Japan Times has learned to look back with so much contempt on the place where he received his own journalistic training, but for his sake we ought to be glad, doubtless, that he has reached an elevation which enables him to spurn the ladder that raised him.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

The first pronouncement of the Court of Cassation, as telegraphed this morning, has been unfavourable to the Dreyfus party. Madame Dreyfus seems to have challenged three of the judges constituting the Court, and, having failed to establish the grounds of her challenge, has been condemned to pay a fine of 100 francs. It is, of course, a bad blunder to essay a step of that nature unless success is tolerably certain, for failure creates an impression highly disadvantageous to the applicant. The Court itself, however, may be trusted to discharge its duty with strict justice irrespective of all sentimental incidents.

THE RAILWAY PURCHASE SCHEME.

It is alleged that the Committee appointed to investigate the question of nationalizing the principal private railways are divided into two sections. One, which is called the Government Party, maintains that the price paid for the lines should be twenty times the net annual profit now realized from them. The other, or Railway Party, insists that the price should be twenty-five times the profit. The aggregate net profits of the four roads are 7 million yen in round members, so that the two prices in question are 140 million yen and 175 millions. Evidently, before pronouncing any opinion in such matters, we must know the rate of interest which the bonds are to bear. If the rate is 5 per cent., then the price advocated by the Railway Party means that the shareholders would exchange an income of 7 millions for one of 8½ millions. On the other hand, the property will obviously become more valuable as time passes. If foreign traffic-managers were placed in charge of the lines, the income derived from them could probably be raised, very soon, to 9 or 10 million yen, and even under the present very defective system of control, a greatly increased income will be obtained a few years hence. It is only fair that the shareholders should derive some benefit from the increment. Probably there will be another example of compromise, and the multiplier chosen will be 22½.

NEW DEGREE-HOLDERS.

A degree-conferring ceremony was held in Tokyo on the 27th March. No fewer than 100 degrees were conferred, thirty falling to the lot of teachers in the Imperial University and 71 to specially selected candidates. Among the gentlemen thus distinguished, we observe the name of Mr. Tsubouchi Yuzo, better known by his nom de plume, Sho-yo, one of the best romancists of the time, and of Messrs. Taguchi Ukichi, the celebrated economist, Uyeda Mannen, Professor of the Japanese language and literature, Nakamura Yaro, the prominent politician, Nitobe Inazo, the well-known agriculturist, Sakatani Yoshiro, who has won much credit as Government Delegate for the Finance Department, and Soyeda Juichi, also an able financier.

MANILA.

The news from Manila suggests that a conflict of some magnitude has taken place between the Americans and the Filipinos. It is unfortunate that the telegram is not more explicit, for it leaves us uncertain whether the insurgents or the United States' troops were the assailants. Probably the latter. General Otis is doubtless pushing on with expedition so as to strike the strongest possible blows before the hot weather sets in. So long as he can find the Filipinos in sufficient force to give some signal value to victory over them, he must be counted fortunate. The harassing and difficult situation will commence when the insurgents take to purely guerilla warfare, never offering a sufficient target for effective strokes. It is possible, however, that they will sue for terms rather than see their organization reduced to the plight of fragmentary resistance.

MASSACRE NEAR NEWCHWANG.

The Newchwang correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News writes:—

"The victims of the Liuchiatien massacre are more numerous than was at first stated. Over forty names of the dead have been reported to the Kinchow magistrate, and these, it is believed, do not exhaust the list. Among them are women, children, and others quite unconnected with the deportation, cut down by Russians who were hunting for fugitives. One result has been the emigration of many Chinese from Liuchiatien and the vicinity, who are seeking homes further north among their own people. The matter was reported by the Kinchow magistrate to the Tsungli-Yamen, who made it the subject of representation to the Russian Minister. He, however, disclaimed responsibility, and referred them to the home Government; the inference being that the Russian officials in the Port Arthur district are not under his control."

We (Japan Mail) re-publish this intelligence for what it may be worth, but every reader of modern newspapers has learned that very little reliance can be placed on sensational stories of such a nature. Whence was the information obtained in this instance? Obviously from Chinese sources. We know what that means. Were the same tale told of English soldiers by Chinese peasants, no English paper would credit it for an instant, and the N.-C. Daily News, if it gave the matter a place in its columns, would do so merely for the purpose of denying the canard indignantly. When the Filipinos recently circulated a rumour to the effect that American troops had shot down women and children near Manila, the assertion was greeted with scornful incredulity. Why a similar tale should be blindly accepted merely because Russians are the persons accused, we can not see. Let us first hear what the Russians themselves have to say.

THE TOKYO TRAM COMPANY.

It has taken a long time to settle the question of the Tokyo Tram Company's fares. Perhaps our readers remember that the Police, some months ago, fixed a superior limit for the number of passengers carried by a train-car, and the Company consequently sought and obtained permission to raise its fares. Inasmuch, however, as the shareholders were receiving dividends of about 30 per cent., the public expressed considerable indignation against the new schedule, and the Tokyo City Assembly voted that steps must be taken to restore the old rates. But it appears that the Police could not be induced to modify their regulation restricting the number of passengers. They insisted that the crowding of the cars as previously practised facilitated pocket-picking, impaired morality, and was hygienically unwise. A compromise has now at last been effected. The police regulations are to be enforced and the Company is to charge the increased rates, but, by way of a sop to public opinion, a sum of 5,000 yen is to be paid out of the profits during a term of 3 years for purposes of street repairing.

BARON DE BIEGLEBEN.

We find the following in a home journal:—"The Emperor of Austria has been pleased to confer the rank of Privy Councillor on Baron de Biegleben, late Minister Plenipotentiary of Austria-Hungary to the Court of Japan, who has been a winter resident in Cairo since his retirement from active service."

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The Government has issued important regulations, the effect of which, broadly stated, is to place the Civil Service on nearly the same footing as the Judiciary and to close the higher offices to all persons not specifically qualified. The regulations are divided into three classes, the first relating to appointments, the second to the status of officials, and the third to disciplinary measures.

As to appointments, the qualifications of Sonin and Hannin officials have hitherto been duly fixed, but not those of Chokunin. It is now provided that the only persons eligible to become Chokunin shall be (1) officials of first-class Sonin rank; (2) officials who have held Chokunin posts for a full year, or persons who have passed the examination for high-class officials; (4) officials who have served as Chokunin Public Procurators for a full year.

The regulations with regard to status provide (1) that officials may not be deprived of office unless they have been judicially convicted of crime, or administratively pronounced guilty of fault, or are physically or morally incapacitated; (2) that officials may not, contrary to their own wishes, be transferred to an inferior post unless a reduction of the official establishment is necessary, in conformity with fixed rule or for purposes of reform.

The regulations relating to disciplinary measures provide for the organization of punishment committees of two grades, one for chokunin officials and the other for officials of lower rank. The former is to be composed of a president and six members, the president being a Privy Councillor; and the members, the Chief Judge of the Administrative Court, or Chokunin Judges of that Court, &c. They will be nominated by the Minister President, and will hold office for 3 years. The organization of the ordinary punishment committee need not be described in detail.

Of course the object of these excellent regulations is to make administrative officials independent of political changes of Cabinet; to give security of tenure, and to do away with the abuses of nepotism hitherto more or less frequent. But another palpable effect will be to put an end to the office-hunting propensities of party politicians. Under this new system it would be impossible to pitchfork into the position of Chokunin Councillors of Departments a number of men without any qualification except their prominence on the platform or in the rostrum, as was done last year, and it would be equally impossible to give posts as Chokunin Governors to party leaders.

It is alleged that the publication of these regulations—which are to become operative from April 10th—has greatly offended the Liberals. They recently adopted a resolution that no attempt should be made to obtain official appointments, but they did not propose to carry the virtue of self-denial so far as to refuse appointments if the Government offered them. Moreover, they think that they ought to have been consulted about the regulations, whereas the Cabinet did the whole thing without saying a word to any one. In short, the Liberals think that they have been slighted, if not actually insulted, and they are about to discuss the expediency of taking some decisive steps. Such, at any rate, is the account of their attitude given by Tokyo newspapers.

RIGHTS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

THE Japan Times of the 29th ultimo contains a clever and weighty article with reference to the source from which the subjects and citizens of states other than Germany will derive the right to hold land in Japan as superficiaries, after next July. Sir ERNEST SATOW's letter to Mr. WHITEHEAD of Hongkong is the text of the article. Her Majesty's Minister, speaking, of course, with reference to British subjects only, claims that they will be entitled to acquire a superficies for two reasons; the first based on a point of terminology, the second on the most favoured nation clause.

The question of terminology, though at first sight a little perplexing, is really very simple. In the 3rd article of the Revised Anglo-Japanese Treaty, it is provided that British subjects "may own or hire and occupy the houses, manufactories, warehouses, shops, and premises which may be necessary for them, and lease land for residential and commercial purposes, conforming themselves to the Laws, Police, and Customs Regulations of the country like native subjects." Now it is true that this Article recognises only one method of acquiring land, namely, by lease, and it is also true that in strict legal phraseology a superficies and a lease are two different and distinct things. Hence the apparent inference is that, under the provisions of the above Article, British subjects, though entitled to become lessees, will not be entitled to become superficiaries. But if an agreement between two parties is to be interpreted according to the strict letter of legal phraseology, we must be assured that it was drafted in conformity with that phraseology. In other words, before the Treaty between Great Britain and Japan is read by the light of the codified law of Japan, there must be some evidence that the high contracting parties had that law in view when they negotiated the Treaty. Is there any such evidence? To answer that question, we naturally turn to the Japanese Code, and we there find that the term used for "hiring" (i.e., leasing), is not the term used in the Treaty. The Japanese term is essentially juristic—a term used by jurists only;—the Treaty term is the simple every-day expression for "obtaining on hire." Sir ERNEST SATOW's point, as we understand it, is that the intention of the framers of the Treaty was to enable British subjects to enjoy every method of "obtaining on hire" sanctioned by the laws of Japan, and that, since "superficies" is such a method, they are entitled to become superficiaries.

The same argument was advanced more than a year ago in our own columns, without, however, the same reliance on phraseology alone. Our view is broader. The intention of the Treaty, as it presents itself to us, is that when British subjects are guaranteed the right of "owning, or hiring and occupying, the houses, manufactories, warehouses, shops, and premises which may be necessary for them," an engagement is given that they may resort to every method of ownership contemplated by law. Now the 265th article of the Civil Code says:—"A superficies has the right to use another person's land for the purpose of owning thereon structures or bamboos and trees." Here is a distinctly specified method of owning structures. Moreover, it is the only satisfactory method—satisfactory from a business point of view—provided by the Code, short of owning the land also, which privilege is withheld from aliens. Can it possibly have been the intention of the framers of the Treaty, on the one hand, to enter into an agreement that British subjects should have the right of owning whatever buildings are necessary for trade or manufacturing purposes, and, on the other, to deprive that right of all practical value by limiting its exercise to a term of 20 years? We do not think that the Treaty can be rationally construed in such a restricted sense. Moreover, another consideration presents itself. Sir ERNEST SATOW contents himself with noting that the Japanese word "lease" in the English version is not identical with the Code term, and that, consequently, the restrictions attaching to the Code "lease" do not apply to the Treaty "lease." Without attempting to deny the conclusiveness of that differentiation, we think it may be further urged that the Treaty term is accompanied by a definition which materially expands its force. The language used is "lease land for residential and commercial purposes." The Treaty does not say merely "lease;" it says "lease for residential and commercial purposes." Surely it would be a little farcical to lease land for commercial purposes if the tenure were limited to 20 years? And surely when the high contracting parties agreed that such leasing should be in conformity with the laws of Japan as applied to Japanese subjects, they can not have intended to exclude it from the purview of the only law which makes land-leases valuable for commercial purposes?

It has also to be remembered that the revised Civil Code of Japan was not in existence at the time of the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. Hence the language used in the Treaty must be interpreted in the sense generally attaching at that time to terms such as its framers employed, not in the special sense of the highly technical terminology subsequently employed by the drafters of the Code. The British negotiators of the Treaty, when they spoke of "leasing land for residential and commercial purposes," may reasonably affirm that they intended the word lease to mean simply "tenure" of every kind sanctioned by Japanese law, short of actual ownership.

The interest attaching to this question is chiefly academical. There is not the remotest intention, we presume, on the part of the Japanese Government to attempt to limit the land-tenure privileges of British subjects to twenty-year leases. The Japan Times fully recognises the non-essential character of the issue. We may remark, however, that, in essaying to impose such a limit, the Japanese Government would find itself in the very position which our contemporary condemns when taken by the British Minister. For, to use our contemporary's pithy phrase, mutatis mutandis, "it would be a dangerous principle to enunciate that an intention on the part of the Treaty-framers to exclude 'superficies' from the scope of 'leases' is deducible from the unique fact that the term 'lease' is rendered in a subsequently enacted Code by a word which does not include 'superficies?'"

Let us now briefly allude to the second reason on which Sir ERNEST SATOW bases his contention—namely, the operation of the most favoured nation clause. The Treaty between Japan and Germany was negotiated after the completion of the revised Japanese Civil Code, and the negotiators were consequently led to take the precaution of including "superficies" among the forms of land-tenure guaranteed to German subjects. Sir ERNEST SATOW contends that, under the most favoured nation clause, British subjects are entitled to enjoy the same privilege. The Japan Times denies His Excellency's contention on the ground that "the most favoured nation clause is specifically limited to matters of 'Commerce and Navigation,'" and can not, consequently, be extended to land-leasing. But surely this is a matter of commerce? The words of the British Treaty are, "lease land for residential and commercial purposes." In the face of these qualifying words "for commercial purposes" we fail to see how the non-applicability of the most favoured nation clause can be asserted.

Perhaps we ought to note that all this has nothing whatever to do with the meaning of "superficies," or with its practical value. Our contemporary explicitly recognises that the nature and scope of the rights embodied in the term are correctly defined by Her Majesty's Minister. Yet it may be well to note that Sir ERNEST SATOW's definition is not comprehensive. He says:—"Superficies is the right to use another person's land for the purpose of owning thereon buildings, in consideration of an annual rent, &c." An annual rent, however, is not the only form of consideration, as was recently pointed out in these columns, and great importance attaches to the fact. Sir ERNEST SATOW's letter was obviously never intended for publication in Japan, or, indeed, for publication anywhere, qua a British Minister's pronouncement. Had it been written with that intention its phraseology would have been different and its definitions probably fuller. But it has been very useful, directly for the sake of the explanation it contains, and indirectly because it has prompted this discussion as to the source whence foreigners will derive their title to become "superficiaries" after July next.

SIGNS OF CIVILIZATION.

A correspondent of a Tokyo contemporary says that the roads in Tokyo are the worst in the world. That appears to us to be a slight exaggeration. Until the Tokyo streets can boast of a hole deep enough to drown a donkey, and of mud-lakes large enough to be lashed into billows when strong winds blow, the crown of disgrace must rest on Peking's brows. But Tokyo is well in the competition. Anywhere in the Japanese metropolis after a day's rain one may now see the same cruel sights that are witnessed in Chinese cities: men toiling along under loads made doubly heavy by the terrible condition of the track, and unfortunate animals—oxen and horses—subjected to harrowing brutality because their strength is insufficient to drag carts and carriages through morasses of dirt. This is the very crucial test of civilization. The discomfort and unsightliness of the thing are bagatelles compared with the enormous losses entailed upon the citizens, and the demoralizing effects of such maladministration. Tokyo is not civilized, and there is no use pretending that it is.

CUSTOMS COMMITTEE.

The Shogyo Shimpō makes a good point, we think, when it urges that practical business men should be included among the members of the Customs Committee. According to the new Customs Law, complaints against the action of the Customs officials may be carried on appeal to the Minister of Finance, and by him submitted to a Committee, of which the organization is to be determined by Imperial Ordinance. As yet no Ordinance has been promulgated, but rumour alleges that the Committee is to consist of judges of the Supreme and Administrative Courts, Councillors and Appraisers of the Finance Department, and Professors of the College of Science. Of course such a list is incomplete, but it seems to us very improbable that the Government will fail to employ business men on a tribunal whose chief function is to adjudicate upon questions of commerce.

THE VERBECK MEMORIAL.

We read in vernacular newspapers that the subscription list for the Verbeck Memorial closed on the 23rd instant. The principal promoters of this movement have been Marquis Hosokawa, Professor Hosokawa Junjiro and Mr. Tsuji Shinji. The memorial will take the form of a tomb-stone in Aoyama Cemetery. An independent subscription, as many of our readers probably remember, was got up by foreigners and produced a considerable sum.

THE SHASI AFFAIR.

The fact that the Shasi affair had been satisfactorily settled was published some time ago, and the terms are now stated. They are very simple:—(1) The local officials are to be instructed to apprehend and punish the rioters. (2) The policemen that sided with the rioters are to be dismissed and punished. (3) Liu Siang-pian, who was instructed, a month ago, to resign, is to be further examined and held responsible for his conduct, and the Tsung-li Yamén promises that he shall not be employed, for at least 4 or 5 years, in any office which brings him into direct contact with Japanese subjects. (4) The compensation due to the sufferers by the riot is to be determined by the Japanese Consul and the local officials in consultation, and effect is to be given to their decision within 30 days, if possible, from the time of formulating it.

M. FELIX RÉGAMÉY.

The celebrated M. Felix Régaméy is now in Tokyo. M. Régaméy holds the post of Inspector of Instruction in Designing for the City of Paris. He has come to Japan on a special mission, and is now residing at No. 18, Motomachi, in the Honjo district of Tokyo. On the 26th instant, he was entertained by a number of the leaders of art society in Tokyo at the chambers of the Geographical Society. It will be exceedingly interesting to hear the views entertained by such an authority on the condition of modern, as compared with old, designing in Japan.

NEW PRIVY COUNCILLOR.

The statement that Count Itagaki was about to be made a Privy Councillor has not been verified by facts. Baron Ito Miyoji has received that honour. The ceremony of appointment took place at the Palace on the 29th instant. It is now alleged that the original intention was to appoint Count Hijikata, Count Itagaki, and Baron Ito, but that action has been deferred in the case of the two Counts.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CONFERENCE.

The Japan Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church opened in Goucher Hall, Anyama, Tokyo, on Wednesday morning at nine o'clock and will very likely remain in session until Wednesday of next week. Each session will begin at 8.30 a.m., with a half hour devotional meeting, and close at noon. All the sessions are open to the public.

At seven o'clock on Wednesday evening the anniversary of the Home Missionary and Church Extension Societies was held; the Rev. T. Ukai, K. Ishizaka, and S. Ogata taking part. On Thursday, at 7 p.m., the Temperance Anniversary will be held; the speakers are the Hon. Taro Ando, the Hon. T. Fujita, and Mr. Kanitaka Ito.

On Friday morning, laymen from different parts of the Empire assembled to elect a representative to the General Conference, which meets in Chicago in May, 1900. On Friday evening, a laymen's meeting was held, and addresses given by Prof. E. Asada, Mr. T. Hanagawa, and Mr. K. Ito. On Sunday, at 9 a.m., the Conference love-feast taken place at 10 a.m., preacher, Bishop Cranston; at 2 p.m., ordination service; at 3.30 p.m., memorial service for those who have died during the year.

Miss Simons, of Yokohama, and Mrs. Alexander, of Hirotsuki. Owing to the memorial service, the regular English preaching service at Asabu, on Sunday afternoon, has been given up. On Sunday, at 7 p.m., the Rev. S. Kurimura will preach the Missionary Sermon.

On Monday, at 2 p.m., the Anniversary of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society will be held; and at 7 p.m. there will be addresses on education, by Rev. H. Yamaka, and on Sunday Schools by Mr. T. Ikehara, the representative in Japan of the International Sunday School Association.

The Graduating Exercises of the School of Theology, College, and Academy of Anyama Gakuin, Tokyo, were held in Goucher Hall on Monday afternoon. The day was delightfully fine, and there was a large attendance of both Japanese and foreign friends of the institution.

The following was the programme:—

Vocal Trio "Father, Lead Me by Thy Hand," Miss Spencer, Mr. Watkins, and Mr. Coates.

Devotional Exercises.

Quartet "Lead, Kindly Light,"

Messrs. Miller, Howard, Fisher, and Coates.
The Imperial Edict.—The National Anthem.

Conferring Diplomas and Certificates.

The President's Address.

Students' Reply Takayuki Namao.
Vocal Duett "Oh! that We Two were Maying."

Mr. and Mrs. James L. Cowan.

Address Bishop Earl Cranston, D.D., LL.D.
Vocal Solo "The Birthday of a King."

Miss Cranston.
The National Air.

LADIES' PAPER CHASE.

Emancipated woman is knocking at the door of the present generation, as Ibsen would say, with a vengeance. Our professions, our clubs, our games are invaded by the enterprising superior sex. They have conquered cricket, football, and baseball; they almost live on bicycles; they use the foils like fencing masters, and box like Peter Jacksons, only much more gracefully. But we did think that paper-chasing still remained one of man's few undisputed territories. It seems, however, we were mistaken, for last Saturday these took place the very newest thing in this line—a hare-and-hound race in which two hares—we do not know whether they should be called heiresses—were ladies, and where nearly half the pack were also of the sex which—for the moment—is still content with petticoats. Really the nomenclature of the pastime will have to be altered. The men who turned out on Saturday to chase the two lady hares and Mr. C. K. M. Martin and Mr. Lambert Pummer (the male hares) may be called hounds, but what of the feminine pursuers? We should hesitate to apply a term so unceremonious to Mrs. Anderson, Mrs. Martin, Mrs. Hyde Pearson, Misses Pollack (2), Mrs. Mitchell, Misses Tripler (2), Misses Hartnoll (2), Misses Morse, Powell, Copmann, Eldridge, Nina Smith, and Bishop. Some other name, more befitting the circumstances, will have to be invented if woman's occupation of the field she has invaded proves permanent, and if for the moment, through lack of imagination we retain the old appellation and call them "hounds" it must be understood that we use the term in a purely Pickwickian sense. The mere men who followed were Messrs. Leather, Potts, Fradgley, White, Gann, Hyde Pearson, Davis, Owen, Stewart, Mollison, Lian, and Parlett. The hares set out from the rifle range at three o'clock, and had a start of ten minutes. The course was across the fort, by the skating ground on to the Negishi Road, thence by Hope's Islet to the race course, and down via Miharashi to the rifle range home. The ladies ran like little deer—or little dears, as some admiring spectators said—and if they do not repeat the experiment it will not be through discouragement from want of success in their initial experiment. Vive la femme! Some up-to-date "feminist" author ought to supplement Dumas' Fils Les femmes qui tuent et les femmes qui sont tuées by Les femmes qui font "paper chase."

FOREIGN MAIL REGULATIONS.

The "Universal Postal Convention" was revised and put into force from the 1st January, 1899. The following are some of the amended stipulations and also the gist of the notices that were simultaneously issued, both having relation to the general public:—

1.—"It is not permitted to make use, in the international service, of postage stamps produced with an object special and peculiar to the country of issue, such as the so-called commemorative postage stamps of temporary validity."

2.—"Post cards, which, though fulfilling the conditions (regarding the indications, dimensions, external form, etc.) laid down by the 25th Article of the Detailed Regulations of the "Universal Postal Convention," yet owing to some casualty are considered as unavailable, are charged double the postage for post cards. Those not fulfilling the conditions above mentioned are treated as letters. It should also be noted that the laws of Japan do not permit the circulation of post cards emanating from private industry."

3.—"Engravings or advertisements may be printed on the face of post cards. They must not, however, interfere in any way with the clear indication of the address, or with the stamping or marking of the postal service."

4.—The maximum weight for sample packets was formerly 250 grammes, but it is now enlarged to 350 grammes.

5.—"Articles of glass, packets containing liquids, oils, fatty substances, dry powders, whether dyes or not, as well as packets of live bees, may be admitted to transmission as samples of merchandise, provided that they be packed in the following manner:—

a. Articles of glass must be securely packed (in boxes of metal, wood, leather, or cardboard) in a way to prevent all danger to the correspondence and postal officers.

b. Liquids, oils, and fatty substances easily liquified must be enclosed in glass bottles hermetically sealed. Each bottle must be placed in a wooden box furnished with sawdust, cotton, or spongy material in sufficient quantity to absorb the liquid in case the bottle be broken. Finally, the box itself must be enclosed in a case of metal, of wood with a screw-top, or of strong and thick leather. When use is made of perforated wooden blocks of the thickness of at least 2½ millimetres in the weakest part, with a sufficient quantity of absorbent material inside, and provided with a cover, the blocks need not be enclosed in a second case.

c. Fatty substances which are not easily liquified, such as ointments, soft-soap, resin, etc., the transmission of which offers less inconvenience, must be enclosed in an inner cover (box, bag of linen or parchment, &c.), which must itself be placed in a second box of wood, metal, or strong and thick leather.

d. Dry powders, whether dyes or not, must be placed in cardboard boxes, which themselves are enclosed in a bag of linen or parchment.

e. Live bees must be enclosed in boxes so constructed as to avoid all danger and to allow the contents to be ascertained."

6.—"Transmission at the sample rate is accorded to articles of natural history, dried or preserved animals and plants, geological specimens, &c., when sent for no commercial purpose and packed in accordance with the general regulations concerning samples of merchandise."

7.—"Pupil's exercises with corrections, but without any comment on the work, are considered as commercial papers."

8.—Modifications with regard to printed matter are as follows:—

a. "To add in manuscript, on printed visiting cards, good wishes, congratulations, thanks, condolences or other formulae of courtesy expressed in five words at most or by means of conventional initials (p. l. &c.)."

b. "To add a dedication on Christmas and New-Year cards."

c. "To add, in manuscript or by a mechanical process, to cuttings from newspapers and periodical publications the title, date, number, and address of the publication from which the article is extracted."

d. "Albums containing photographs are considered as printed matter."

9.—"The fee of 5 sen will be charged for enquiries, made after posting, as to the disposal of registered articles, if the sender has not already paid the special fee for an acknowledgment of delivery."

10.—Domestic postage and conditions are applicable to mail matters to and from the following places in China where our post offices are established: Amoy, Chefoo, Hangchow, Shanghai, Shashi, Soochow, Tientsin.

11.—The following are alterations in money order fees: Universal Orders: For the first 100 francs, 10 sen per 25 francs or fraction thereof; and for all sums beyond the first 100 francs, 10 sen per 50 francs or fraction thereof. Hongkong Through Orders: For Straits Settlements only, 15 sen per the same amount.

12.—The business of foreign money orders, except the payment of Hongkong Orders, is now transacted at any branch office.

A CRYPTIC TELEGRAM.

The Japan Times had the following quaint paragraph in its telegraphic news on Sunday:—

ELLIMAN ISSUES MANIFESTO.

A Grand National Manifesto has been issued by Fordoffyne Elliman: (?)

We were genuinely puzzled by this first, never having heard of Fordoffyne Elliman, and being quite at a loss as to why he should issue a grand national manifesto, or to whom it might be issued. Then came a flash of inspiration. The Grand National is run at this time of the year, and the name of the race, as well as those of the first three horses, were evidently telegraphed by Reuter, who apparently relied on the sporting knowledge of the Far East being sufficiently profound to interpret the brief message correctly. The Japan Times attempted the task, with the funny result indicated above. An Australian paper the other day did much the same thing. The winners of the Two Thousand Guineas were telegraphed as "Two Thousand O'Connell, Patriot, Enthusiasm." The paper which received the message constructed the following paragraph:—"The Patriot O'Connell addressed a meeting of two thousand people to-day. Great enthusiasm was displayed." Equally good was the interpretation, by a Sydney paper, of a telegram announcing the capture of Mr. Savage Landor by the Tibetans:—"A savage landor was captured near Lhasa to-day. The landor was dreadfully tortured, and is not expected to survive."

ADMIRAL MORI'S DINNER.

On Saturday night a grand dinner was given by Rear Admiral Mori, Director of the Yokohama Harbour at the Club Hotel. Although 64 invitations were issued only 38 gentlemen sat down. The Consular body was represented the U.S. and the Chinese Consul Generals, the British, Dutch, German, and Danish Consuls. The company also included Governor Asada, accompanied by the Secretary, Chief of the Police, and Councillor of the Ken, the Chief engineer of the Lighthouse Bureau; Mr. Ishibashi; the President and Chief Procurator of the Chitoh Saibansho; the Superintendent of Customs, the Director of Posts and Telegraphs; Mr. Matsunaga, the Private Secretary of the Minister of Communications; Captain Sakii, Naval Harbour Master of Yokosuka; Naval Chief Surgeon Yoshikawa; Mr. Saito, the Director of the Revenue Office; the Mayor of Yokohama; Mr. Otani, President of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Asano, President of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha; Mr. Kurusu, Vice President of the Dock Co.; Mr. Hayashi, Manager, and Captain Iwato, Marine Superintendent of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha; Messrs. H. C. Litchfield, W. W. Tull, F. W. Mitchell, A. Conil, W. T. Payne, F. Wimmer, E. T. Osborn and H. Rose, Marquis de Nembrini Gonzaga, Commander Amano, I. J. N., Commander Squire, R.N., and Dr. Rokkaku, Port Surgeon. The dining and waiting rooms were beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, with the flags of all nations having treaties with Japan, and with anchors, chains, life and boat buoys, ropes, and sounding leads effectively disposed. The menu was excellent and did great credit to the chef de cuisine and to the Manager of the Club Hotel. Several toasts were given, the speeches being very ably translated from Japanese into English and vice versa by Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, H.B.M.'s Consul at Yokohama. The whole affair was a great success.

BARON NAKAJIMA.

Baron Nakajima whose death is announced was born at Tosa, in August of the 3rd year of Kokwa, and was a samurai of the Kōchi clan. It was in the beginning of the Meiji era that he first entered official service, and he has since successively filled the important offices of governor, judge, and senator. He was once the governor of Kanagawa Prefecture. He organized a party entitled the Rikken Seito (Constitutional Party), and was Vice-President of the Liberal Party. When the Diet was convened for the first time, he was returned as a member of the House of Representatives for the 4th Parliamentary District of Kanagawa Prefecture, and was elected the first President of the House. At the extraordinary election that followed, he left party politics, and, again entering the Government, was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Italy. Afterwards he was created a Baron, and nominated by the Emperor a member of the House of Peers. Recently he was attacked by consumption, and has since been endeavouring to recruit his health in retirement at Shonan. He was 54.

THE MEREDITH CULT.

(By A. PHILISTINE.)

The existence of an extensive body of Meredith worshippers is a problem most painful and puzzling to those who still have faith in a great intelligence directing the course of this world. Of Mr. George Meredith himself we need not complain. Nature probably attempted originality when she moulded him, and, profoundly dissatisfied with the result of her effort, sent him into the world a mere eccentric. But that any considerable body of ordinary men, presumably in the possession of their senses, should regard his guarded and inhuman sentences as inspired, and actually form a cult round the utterances of so ungainly and unintelligible a prophet, is a thing to make the angels weep. It is as pathetic a spectacle as would be presented by a body of men who, surrounded by all the luxuries of a French table, preferred to eat cocoa nut-matting and drink dirty ditch-water. If England had produced no literature, but only Meredithisms, we could understand the literary appetite eating greedily of even this barren fare. But with the noble work of the past four centuries behind us, to enjoy and digest as we please, it seems amazing, pitiable, pathetic, that sober Christian people should actually prefer to devour such husks as the Meredithian chaff-cutter produces for their satisfaction.

Mr. Meredith has been at it again. He is a man of unfortunate industry, and grinds out his cryptic verse with much regularity as a Italian nobleman grinds tunes from his barrel organ. His latest crime is of a most revolting character. It is entitled "Epigrams of the Earth"—but anyone sanguine enough to anticipate epigrammatic writing will be woefully disappointed. The essence of an epigram is supposed to be its point, lucidity, and felicity of expression. Mr. Meredith's writing is distinguished, as usual, by an elephantine clumsiness, a most appalling obscurity, and a quite wanton distortion of language. If there were any great thought, any new and striking light, any flash of inspiration behind the wall of unintelligibility with which the poet fences his writing, we might forgive his eccentricities of style. But there is none. The ideas are poor, commonplace, and threadbare. There is not one which has not occurred to every child of school-age from the time of Seth onward. Mr. Meredith's verse is a great, hairy, awkward, hideous cocoon—with nothing inside. One has the labour of cracking it, of tearing off the harsh envelope, and penetrating the inner shell; and after all this work there is neither nut nor milk inside to reward one's misapplied perseverance.

For instance, in this latest volume, the poor, anæmic, washed-out little idea occurs to him that nature, after all, may not be an unnatural mother; that the Earth apparently brings forth the heroic virtues only to destroy them, but that this is not really so—"she reaps them as the sower reaps." Put in plain grammatical English—in language in which subject, predicate, and object follow each other with something like sane ordination—this is as puny an offspring as the poorest intellect might be delivered of. To make it a great and inspiring thought it requires the touch of a Magician (as his admirers call him) like Mr. Meredith. The Wizard waves his intellectual wand, and our pigmy is forthwith transformed into this giant:—

"The sighting brain her good decree
Accepts; obeys those guides, in faith,
By reason hourly fed, that she,
To some the clod, to some the wraith,
Is more, no mask; a flame, a stream.
Flame, stream, are we, in mid career
From torrent source, delicious dream,
To heaven-reflecting currents clear.
And why the sons of strength have been Her cherished offspring ever; how
The Spirit served by her is seen Through Law; perusing love will show.
Love born of Knowledge, love that gains
Vitality as Earth it mates,
The meanings of the Pleasures, Pains,
The Life, the Death, illuminates."

This obscure rubbish is too much even for the Saturday Review, usually so appreciative of the outpourings of this "pious and painful teacher," as it calls him. The reviewer admits that it is "gnomic poetry," and wonders if the bard might not have expressed the same thing in a less contorted form. For myself, having only a common intellect as guide me, I cannot see any meaning in it at all. If there be a Meredithian in Japan, will he kindly explain what is meant by "To some the clod, to some the wraith," or elucidate the proposition that "flame, stream, are we, in mid career, from torrent source, delicious dream, to heaven-reflecting currents clear?" I am quite prepared to be told that I have no spiritual insight, that it requires a gift akin to the poet's to grasp fully the "deep hidden meaning" of his "message," etc. That is the usual manner in which these superior ladies and gentlemen evade the queries of a patient enquirer after truth—a method singularly adroit, as implying that the said enquirer is more or less an idiot, and that they (the superior ladies and gentlemen) actually possess the touch of genius necessary to grasp the "inner meaning."

Here again is a characteristic passage:—

"Interpret me the savage whirl:
And is it Nature scourged, or she,
Her offspring's executioner,
Reducing land to barren sea?"

What is "a savage whirl" in this connection? As a description of Meredithian verse it would be tolerably apt. Here again:—

"Bursts from a sowing flax in flaws
The young green leaflets harrier, sworn To strew the garden" &c.

I have no space for the whole passage, but the context affords no clue whatever to an ordinary mind. There is of course a "deep hidden meaning," "a Sunken Beauty," "a Submerged Truth," in it all; but no one except a Meredithian can detect it, and even he will be unable to explain it to a man of common clay. I have heard these people decanting on some verbal savagery of the kind. "See," one of them will ecstatically cry, "see this living gem snatched from the deep Mine of the Unknowable and Unpronounceable, polished so beautifully by the master hand of this dialecticallapary:—" Yes," reply you, poor plain Common-sense, a little abashed in the presence of the Awful, the Unknowable, the Actual, the Sublime, and other things beginning with capital letters, "Yes, but what does it mean?" "Mean?" is the disdainful reply. "Well, really, if you are an deficient in spiritual insight, if you have no sympathetic imagination, if you have nothing in you that responds to the magic touch of genius, then I must leave you to yourself. You are hopeless. Be content with the Obvious. Read Shakespeare, Æsop, and Mark Twain. Meredith is not for you."

I am indebted to the Saturday Reviewer for some light on Mr. Meredith's literary methods. Mr. Meredith sees reflections in a river, as people have done before. Thereupon he calls it a "reflective river" which is clever and incomprehensible. He sees branches on a leafless tree that remind him of the shape of a hand. These he calls "Sprays that paw the naked bush." A prong that has teeth he calls "toothsome." Can wilful distortion and mutilation of a noble language go further?

I have room for only one or two more extracts. Shakespeare, says Mr. Meredith, "knew thee, Mother Earth," and,

"Thence had he the laugh
We feel is thine, broad as ten thousand beaves
At pasture!"

Here is another cryptic passage, referring, it is confidently believed, to the mental twist of modern pessimism:—

"That little twist of brain
Which moved some weighty leader of the blind
Unwitting 'twas the god of personal pain,
To view in curst eclipse our Mother's mind,
And show us of some rigid haridan
The wretched bondmen till the end of time."

This poetry, according to the Saturday Review, is calculated to foster "bracing, manly virtues." I cannot see that it is calculated to foster anything but a splitting head-ache on the part of a man who tries to read it understandingly, and an intolerable priggishness in those who pretend to see an "inner deep hidden Verity" in stuff which to common intelligence would seem mere high-sounding nonsense, with no strength beyond its impregnability to the ordinary reason.

JAPAN BREWERY COMPANY.

Mr. J. Dodds presided at an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders of the Japan Brewery Co., held on Wednesday afternoon. The others present included Messrs. Bennett, Bent, A. B. Wallford, W. Hayemann, Baehr, F. S. James, Wylie, Hecker, Satter, and Jas. Stewart, Secretary.

The following resolutions, confirming the decision to reconstruct the company arrived at at the meeting some weeks ago, were submitted and unanimously adopted:—

(1).—That it is desirable to reconstruct the Company, and accordingly that the Company be wound-up voluntarily, and that James Dodds and James Stewart be and they are hereby appointed liquidators for the purposes of such winding up.

(2).—That the said liquidators be and they are hereby authorized to consent to the registration of a new Company, to be named The Japan Brewery Company, Limited, with the Memorandum and Articles of Association which have already been prepared with the pivity and approval of the directors of this Company.

(3).—That the draft agreement submitted to this meeting and expressed to be made between this Company and its liquidators of the one part, and The Japan Brewery Company, Limited, of the other part, be and the same is hereby approved, and that the said liquidators be and they are hereby authorized, pursuant to section 149 of the Companies' Ordinances 1865, of the Legislature of Hongkong, to enter into an agreement with such new Company (when incorporated) in the terms of the said draft, and to carry the same into effect with such modification (if any) as they may think expedient.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The death is announced of Mr. Okabe Ynsaku, a member of the House of Peers, who passed away on the 24th.

At 12 o'clock on Sunday night Supt. Morgan received an alarm of fire. It was found that a large pile of lime slaked by rain had set on fire a fence on Lot No. 90, belonging to Messrs. Sieber and Co. The flames were extinguished in a few minutes, and the only damage done was to the lime and the fence.

The Yaami Hotel, Kyoto, which was almost destroyed by fire on Sunday, was occupied by about 30 foreigners. Most of the inmates were out walking at the time, but those still in the house, chiefly ladies, were in a state of great excitement. A strong wind was blowing, and, the supply of water being insufficient, three foreign style buildings and cook's rooms were destroyed before the flames were mastered.

At half-past eleven on Wednesday Supt. Morgan received a call from one of the servants of No. 92, belonging to Mr. H. Grauert. On arrival he found there was a fire between the roof and ceiling near the chimney in Mr. Grauert's office. The fire was put out in a few minutes. The fire superintendent found that the chimney had snapped, and this of course caused the wood work to ignite. Had it been a night fire the result might have been serious.

The Japanese torpedo-boat destroyer Yagiri (Evening Mist), which was launched from the yard of Messrs. John I. Thornycroft and Co., underwent on 14th February satisfactory full-speed official trials at the Maplin Sands. The contractors guaranteed a speed of 30 knots when carrying a load of thirty-five tons, and the result obtained was 30.15 knots, during three hours' continuous steaming.

During a march-out at Kowloon on March 15, in connection with the Fleet, a blue-jacket from the Centurion fell out, feeling faint, and was left leaning against a tree in charge of the doctor and the captain. On the men returning they found their late comrade dead. Heart disease is supposed to have been the cause of death.

The command at Singapore, which falls vacant in April, will be given to Col. J. B. B. Dickson, C.B., now commanding the Cavalry Brigade at Colchester, with the rank of Major-General. Colonel Dickson's successor is likely to be either Colonel Hemming, formerly Military Attaché in Japan, or Colonel Babington, now A.A.G. in the Punjab.

Judgment has been delivered in the Tokyo Appeal Court in the case of Ma Cheong-on and Chan Ming-tai, the Chinese who were sentenced each to a year's imprisonment on a charge of smoking opium on board the N.Y.K. steamer Riojun Maru. The Appeal Court found Ma Cheong-on not guilty, but dismissed the appeal of Chan Ming-tai.

It is mentioned in one of the accounts of the fire at Yaami Hotel, Kyoto, that an English guest, who managed to save some of his property, left behind a bag which contained his money. He had intended leaving that day for Nara. He dug among the debris for traces of his money, but only recovered fifteen sovereigns.

A correspondent writes to a financial paper:—"Formosa has shown decided progress in her trade and internal administration during the year 1898. The natives are apparently increasing in wealth, as their trade has greatly expanded, and the labouring classes have benefited from the great increase in wages. The total sum of the import and export trade for 1896 was 20,033,000 yen, and the trade for 1897 suddenly increased to 25,418,000 yen. For the first half of this year the total trade amounts to 14,421,000 yen; so that the whole year will probably reach something like 28,000,000 yen. This is about double the amount of trade for 1894—the last year of the Chinese administration in the island—and is even higher when compared with preceding years. The import and export trade in tea, sugar, oil, and flour is gradually increasing, but camphor, owing to the low prices in the market, and high wages, has decreased."

Crisanto Lichanco and Gregorio Agoncillo, as attorneys of Emilio Aguinaldo, the leader of the Filipino Forces in the Philippines, are suing the H. and S. Bank for the recovery of a sum of $200,000 and interest accrued, deposited with the Bank on 3rd January, 1898. The Bank is willing to pay, but only to the proper persons whose names are endorsed on the deposit bond, and neither of the plaintiffs appear in this document. Hence the litigation. The China Mail headed its report on the first day "The Spanish Purchase Money," whereupon the Filipinos lost their tempers and got their lawyers to make a motion in Court that the proprietor of the China Mail be committed for contempt on the ground that the heading was distinctly calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the plaintiffs. Eventually calmer counsels prevailed, and the Filipinos decided to abandon any further proceedings against the paper. The action against the Bank is still proceeding.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Oriental Hotel, Co., Ltd., was held on Monday afternoon, at Kobe, under the presidency of Mr. A. H. Groom, when the following resolutions were passed:—

1. That the Directors having borrowed in excess of their powers, and the monies outstanding on the 15th day of March, 1899, having been 120,000 yen, viz.—Debentures to the amount of 75,000 yen, and loans and an overdraft aggregating 45,000 yen, the company does hereby ratify and confirm the aforesaid action of the Directors.

2. That in Article 51 of the Articles of Association the words "one hundred and fifty thousand yen" shall be substituted for the words "twenty-five thousand dollars."

The resolutions were passed without discussion. The first was proposed by Dr. Moore-Graham and seconded by Mr. Lightfoot; the second resolution was proposed by Dr. Moore-Graham and seconded by Dr. Miller.—Hogo Evening News.

A desperate encounter with robbers occurred about midnight on the 21st inst. at a house in Midzuki-dori, Hogo. The robbers had entered the house by cutting away the door. There were six persons sleeping in the house at the time—an old samurai named Ono (50 years of age) and his wife, their two sons (24 and 18 years old respectively), and two younger daughters. One of the sons had been practising stage performances with a sword and had gone to sleep with the sword by the side of his bed. This was one of the first objects the robbers appear to have alighted upon, and then, after the manner of experienced Japanese burglars, they proceeded to arouse the sleepers. Noticing, however, that one of the robbers had taken up the sword the two brothers pretended to be fast asleep until a favourable opportunity occurred for them to show that they were very much awake. The robbers had gone into an adjoining room. By this time the old samurai was aware that robbers were in his house, and, having roused his wife, took up a fulon to try to beat the robbers down (and smother them presumably). The two sons, coming to the assistance of their father, sprang upon the robbers, and a desperate encounter occurred, as each robber had a knife such as is used by Japanese cooks.

CHINA NOTES.

The Volunteers of Shanghai have been shooting down all unmuzzled dogs that they find on the streets. This is due to the large number of hydrophobia cases that have occurred in the Settlement during the past two years.

A fatal accident occurred off Broadway, Shanghai, shortly after one o'clock on Saturday afternoon, March 18th, resulting in the death of three Chinese coolies and the injury of two others. On the property belonging to the China Merchants' Co., adjoining the Old Dock, excavations were being made for the foundation of some offices to be erected for the Shanghai Engineering Works, and whilst the workmen were digging on the Dock side of the area mentioned, some thirty feet of a wall, which partly encloses Farham & Co.'s premises and partly forms a side to one of their godowns, collapsed, burying a number of the coolies at work. Assistance was immediately procured, and every effort made for the prompt extrication of the unfortunate men. Two, however, were taken out dead and three injured, one of whom died on arrival at St. Luke's Hospital.

Shanghai mandarins have received news from Peking to the effect that the Empress-Dowager is about to appoint Yü Ch'ang, only recently made Governor of Honan, and younger brother of Yü Lu, Viceroy of Chihli, to be Tartar General of Fengtien (Lower Manchuria) vice K. k'6 tang à deceased. The probabilities are, therefore, that another Manchus, Ching Sing, the Provincial Treasurer of Honan, will be appointed Governor of that province, while some other Manchus will be promoted to take his place. It is significant, says the N. C. Daily News, that we now hear only of officials of Chinese descent being superseded by Manchus, but very rarely of Manchus being ordered to give way to Chinese.

The dredger St. Enock is doing excellent work in Wei-hai-wei harbour, lifting over 100 tons per hour.

It is reported from Peking that the Grand Secretary Jung Lu, not content with having the powerful post of Generalissimo of the land and naval forces of the Peiyang Administration, or, in a word, the control over more than 300,000 modern-armed troops, is intriguing for the Generalissimship of the Nanyang naval and military forces also. The latter consist of the land and naval troops of the Liang-kiang, Hukuang, and Minché provinces, that is to say of Kiangsu, Kiangsi, Anhui, Hunan, Hupeh, Chékiang, and Fukien provinces. The Empress Dowager is at present afraid to give this immense power to a single subject.

Referring to the sad and untimely death of Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson, the North China Daily News says:—Mrs. Wilkinson was born, brought up, and married here, and was the embodiment of all that is best and brightest in Shanghai. She was the soul of goodness and kindness, and could not have had a detractor or an enemy; her untimely removal by the epidemic that has fallen on Shanghai this winter is a loss to those who knew her which it will take them a long time to forget.

Mr. W. Ferd. Tyler, the Acting Coast Inspector, issues a Notice to Mariners, announcing that the Light at Liuchiao-chiang, at the North Channel entrance to the Yangtze, was exhibited for the first time at sunset on the 3rd March.

Mrs. Rijnhart, the widow of the unfortunate missionary who disappeared in Tibet as recently narrated in our columns, was a month ago at Tachienlu waiting to see what the authorities would do.

The Universal Gazette learns that the recently circulated stories regarding Yü Mantzu are not true. He has not risen in rebellion again, and the erroneous intelligence lately current originated through a band of local desperadoes giving trouble in that region, but they were quickly put down by the soldiers.

The China Navigation Co.'s steamer Tamsui, Capt. Brown, which left Shanghai on March 23rd for Newchwang, was run into by the Norwegian steamer Hermes M. Woosung. The collision occurred at 1.5 p.m. off Gough Island, the Hermes steaming towards Shanghai at the time and flying light. When a collision appeared to be imminent the Hermes went full speed astern, but too late to avoid the crash. The Tamsui received a terrific blow on the port beam, and, while she was apparently not injured very much above the water line, there was a considerable rent below and it is believed several plates have been started. On the wells being sounded it was found necessary to beach her and she now lies high and dry on Gough Island. Lighters were set to work, the cargo being discharged as rapidly as possible. The Hermes was badly injured, but all above water. Her bows were stove in, and rails and stanchions carried away.

M. Duckerts was entertained on the 14th February at the Grand Hotel, Brussels, on the eve of his departure for China with the object of extending Belgian commerce in the Far East. The Minister of Foreign Affairs presided. Great hopes are entertained of M. Duckerts' mission, which has been undertaken on the initiative of King Leopold.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

The port of Archangel, in the north-west of Russia, is open to navigation only for four months of the year. With the gradual development of the railway system in Northern Russia it has been felt that a port with a more favourable situation ought, if possible, to be found. To this end, two engineers, Ollendorf and Tokarev, in the service of the railway running between Moscow, Yaroslavl, and Archangel, set out from Moscow for the purpose of exploring the coast-line of the northern Arctic Ocean. The scene of their labours was mainly confined to the region lying between the 42nd and 45th degrees of longitude, east of Greenwich, where the Kuloi river flows into the Mezen Gulf on the eastern side of the entrance to the White Sea. A careful exploration of the Mezen Gulf revealed the fact that not only is there more than one spot at which navigation is possible for more than four months of the year, but also that the little bay at the mouth of the river Kuloi, about twelve miles south of the Arctic Circle, is open and free from ice all the year. It is said that the local hunters and fishermen have long known and used the little bay, which lies in a sheltered position from the north-east winds. The Moscow and Archangel Railway Company now intends to extend the line from Archangel in a north-easterly direction to the Kuloi Bay, as from the terminus of the projected line the northern Arctic Sea can be reached all seasons of the year. By means of reindeer sledges the two explorers set out from Mezen on their return journey to Archangel on Christmas Day. Their way lay across the desolate region of "Tundra," and, as their arrival at Archangel was greatly delayed, it was feared they had perished by the way. The most likely cause of the delay seemed to be, that as the reindeer along their line of route are suffering greatly from scurvy, their trains had fallen victims to this disorder, and that the explorers were thereby stranded and awaiting relief. However, they at length safely reached Moscow. The results of this expedition are regarded as being highly satisfactory and important. The explorers were extremely fortunate in being able to take and preserve a large number of photographic views, which will be of immense service in confirming their report as to the local conditions of the region in question.

The Hamburg-American Packet Company has just issued its annual report for 1898, showing a gross profit of m 14,745,830 (against m 8,847,569 for the previous year), but including an extraordinary profit of m 3,106,377 for vessels sold. After paying the interest on preference shares (m 540,000 against m 555,000 for 1897) an amount of m 10,082,118 is applied for writing off the fleet and for increasing the assurance reserve by m 1,000,000 (for 1897 m 6,064,063 have been written off). The remaining net profit amounts to m 4,123,711, out of which m 4,000,000 are distributed as a dividend of 8 per cent. on the paid up capital of m 50,000,000, while for 1897 m 2,700,000 have been distributed as dividend of 6 per cent. on the capital, then of m 45,000,000. The traffic of the company has been disturbed by the Spanish-American War, and especially the passenger traffic has decreased. The line of freight steamers to East Asia has developed well, and especially during the last months of 1898 a steady demand for steamers arose in consequence of the approaching Customs increase in Japan. The very good rice crop of that country filled the steamers on their return voyage. The commercial development in Japan and the opening of China also caused an improvement in the commercial relations between North America and East Asia.

An attack of the Chinese Legation in Paris fired a revolver at the First Secretary of the Legation, Lien Yung, on the 10th Feb., and killed him. He then committed suicide. The man had suffered from cerebral trouble, and had an idea that Lien Yung wished to drive him to return to China. The murderer and his victims were both Manchus belonging to the same clan and had been friends from their earliest years.

The financial situation in Turkey, appears to go from bad to worse. The Vali of Salonica lately announced that the army contractors refused to continue their supplies without a payment of at least £30,000. Other messages in the same sense have come from other quarters, and the Council of Ministers has finally compiled a provincial Budget, according to which is provided a sum of £300,000 for the army for nations alone, without pay, and a sum of £170,000 for a month's pay for the officials at Beiram. These £500,000 are to be provided by a loan from the Ottoman Bank of £300,000, guaranteed on the sheep-tax, on the dimes, by the sale of goods in kind taken by the Customs, £30,000, and by £170,000 taken out of the Greek War Indemnity.

The emigration from Hamburg to foreign countries during January, 1899, amounted to 3,076 persons, against 1,225 persons in the same month of 1898. In December, 1898, the passengers despatched from Hamburg amounted to 2,736 persons.

M. Pichon, French Minister at Peking, has been raised to the rank of Minister of the first grade.

The Ottoman Government, says the Saturday Review, is evidently preparing for every eventuality in the Balkan Peninsula. According to rumour, large purchases are being made of arms, horses, and stores. The danger is that the almost insane fears of the Sultan may lead him to inflame racial passions in order to promote massacres, Albanians in Macedonia playing the part of Kurds in Armenia. When the warnings of Russia and Austria will be sufficiently potent to restrain the mutual jealousies of the Christians is doubtful.

Of the six Presidents who have sought to control the destinies of France during the existence of the Third Republic, two have died while in office—M. Carnot, who was assassinated in June, 1894, and M. Faure. The others resigned office, the last to do so being M. Casimir-Perier, whose term of service was the shortest recorded, beginning in June, 1894, and ending in January, 1895. M. Grévy, who was twice President, resigned in 1887. Marshal MacMahon in 1879, and M. Thiers in 1873, after less than two years at the Elysée.

It is stated that the four destroyers recently built for the Chinese Government by Herr Schichau, at Elbing, have steamed at the rate of 35.2 knots over a measured course of 18½ miles with 25 tons of coal, their full bunker capacity being 65 tons. France still sticks to her original moderate speed of 26 knots, but tries her destroyers with their full load, and perfect solidity of machinery to any extreme rates of speed.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before His Honour Judge WILKINSON.
THURSDAY, March 30th.

THE INSURANCE CLAIM: JUDGMENT.

His Honour gave judgment in the insurance claim brought by Ehsanbhai Pabani, an Indian merchant, trading at Kobe, against the China Fire Insurance Company and the China Traders Insurance Company, for indemnity for loss by fire. The judgment was in the following terms:—

This suit was originally instituted as a suit against the defendants, the China Fire Insurance Company, Limited, on a policy of fire insurance effected by plaintiffs with that company. The policy is one for twenty-five thousand dollars running from the fifteenth day of September, 1897, to the fifteenth day of September, 1898, on goods and merchandise stored on or to be stored during the currency of the policy in the godown No. 37 situated at Ono, near Kobe. On the 7th of February, 1898, the policy was at the request of the plaintiffs transferred to cover a similar risk contained in the Per Company's Compound, Kobe. On the night of the second or morning of the third of March, 1898, while the policy was still current, a fire broke out on the Per Company's compound, and destroyed 404 bales of cotton, part of a larger quantity there stored belonging to the plaintiff, and the suit was brought to recover from the Company a portion of the loss thereby sustained.

The Company by their answer denied liability for the loss, on the ground that the same goods were covered from loss by fire by three Marine policies issued by the China Traders Insurance Company, Limited, and that the fire policy was not intended to cover any goods except such as were not covered by a Marine policy. Other defences were set up, but, after the hearing began, and after it had been admitted that the three Marine policies had been issued in respect of the same goods, it became clear that the question mainly at issue was whether the loss was to be borne by the one company or by the other, on the one hand, and the China Traders Insurance Company Limited (which I shall call the Marine Company) were with their consent and the consent of the original parties, added as defendants, so that that question might be settled without circumlocution. All the other defences have been withdrawn by the China Fire Insurance Company, Limited, (which I shall now call the Fire Company) and the issues have consequently been very much simplified.

The cotton for the loss of which indemnity is claimed formed part of two consignments of 500 bales each shipped in Bombay by two separate vessels, and the marine policies, which are dated respectively the 21st, 26th, and 27th of January, 1898, were for the full value of the risks on the voyage from Bombay to Kobe, and had also a marginal clause in the following words:—

"Including risk of loss at loading port and including risk of fire at wharf or quay where ship discharges, and in continuing such risk until arrival at warehouse where to be stored, unless already covered by a Fire Policy, and provided that no risk shall attach hereto for a longer period than to days after landing from the ship."

The cotton forming the portion of those consignments at risk when the fire broke out was landed between the 25th of February and the 2nd or 3rd of March, and consequently within the ten days named in the clause, and the Marine Company admit that, except so far as the loss is covered by the fire policy, it is covered by the Marine policies.

The first question then to be decided is, did the fire policy cover or attach to the cotton referred to? The cotton had been landed and was stored on the Fire Company's compound at the outbreak of the fire, and it came within the words of the fire policy so far as regards the description of the goods, and within the words of the endorsement so far as regards the place of storage. It is said, however, on behalf of the Fire Company that the policy and endorsement ought to be so read as to exclude cotton covered by a marine policy, on the ground, first, that there was an agreement between the Fire Company and the insured that it should be so construed, and, second, that, apart from any such agreement, the words "similar risk" in the endorsement are ambiguous, that the nature of the original risk may be looked at and the effect of the policy limited accordingly, that goods in a godown are never covered by a marine policy, and that the policy should, therefore, when transferred to apply to goods on the pier, be limited to apply only to such goods as were not so covered.

Taking the last ground first, it has not, it appears to me, been shown that marine policies never do cover goods after their arrival in the warehouse. The old form of marine policy certainly would not do so, for it continued only until the goods were "discharged and safely landed." But the marine policies in this case continue the risk "until arrival at warehouse where to be stored," and it may be that there are policies issued which extend beyond arrival at warehouse. The only evidence given on the subject was that of Mr. Tevison, who is in the employ of the agents at Kobe of the Fire Company, and who, in answer to the question put by counsel for the Fire Company: "Would it be possible in the ordinary course for marine policies to attach to goods in the warehouse at Ono?" said, "It is possible, but I don't think it is probable. To the best of my belief it would not," and in further cross-examination by Counsel for the Marine Company, with regard to the form of marine policy in this case, he said, "It attaches up to door of warehouse, but not in warehouse. It is not customary for marine policies to attach to goods in warehouse." This falls short of saying that marine policies never do attach to goods in the warehouse, and that proposition has not in my opinion been established. But it appears to me that, even if it had been established, it would not have been sufficient ground for putting the limited construction on the policy sought to be put upon it.

The question turns on the meaning of the words "similar risk" as used in the endorsement, which is as follows:—

"It is hereby declared and agreed that the within policy is transferred to cover a similar risk contained in the Per Company's compound Kobe to the extent of Dollars Twenty-five thousand only. Kobe, 7th February, 1898. P. P. Monahan, Hermann & Co., W. D. S. Edwards, Agents."

It may be observed that the word "risk" as used elsewhere in the policy seems only to mean the danger or degree of danger of fire to which the goods may be exposed, and as used in this sense the words "similar risk" leave the matter of the goods insured wholly unaffected. But in the co-insurance clause attached to the policy the word "risk" has a wider meaning, and while in matters of insurance generally the word has primarily reference to the perils insured against, it is also sometimes used to include the subject matter of insurance, and that seems to be an admissible meaning in this case, so that the risk in the policy which is referred to in the endorsement, may be taken to be:—

Insuring against loss or damage by fire the following, viz:—On goods and Merchandise Imports in Exports including Raw Cotton, in press packed bales being his own property, or held in trust, or on Commission, or on joint account with others, or sold but not delivered, stored or to be stored during the currency of this Policy in the Godown No. 37 built of brick, with tiled roof, iron doors and shutters, situated at Ono near Kobe.

Taking the risk as thus described, the words of the endorsement, leaving out of consideration extraneous circumstances, must mean simply the substitution of the words "in the Per Company's Compound, Kobe" for the words "in the godown No. 37 built of brick with tiled roof, iron doors, and shutters, situated at Ono, near Kobe." Now, as it has been recognised in a long series of decisions, an assurance on articles answering to a certain description as to their nature, ownership, and locality means an insurance on all the articles answering to that description, and the insurance on the goods and merchandise described in the policy was an insurance on all such goods. A similar risk contained in the Pier Company's Compound must also, when considered apart from extraneous circumstances, be deemed to include all goods in the Pier Company's Compound answering the same description. The only extraneous circumstance we have to consider at the moment is the supposed fact that marine policies do not attach to goods in a godown, and we are asked to say that the fact of marine policies attaching makes such a difference in the risk that the risk cannot be said to be similar. But there appears to be a complete answer to this argument in the co-insurance clause, which it is admitted forms part of the policy, and which says: "This Policy is declared to be in conjunction with any Policies effected, or that may be hereafter effected on the same interest in the within mentioned premises, the assured undertaking to declare such co-existing risks when requested."

It was therefore clearly contemplated that there might be other policies covering the same goods at the same time, and it was as clearly agreed that the effect of the existence of such other policies was to be not the suspension of the policy of the Fire Company as regards the goods so covered, but a concurrence with any such other policies so far as they might cover the same goods at the same time. And no exception is made as to whether any such other policies may also cover marine risks, or cover the risk of fire only and there is no reason shown why an exception should be inferred to exist. A marine policy covering the risk of fire, if concurrent with the Fire Company's policy, would be of the same advantage to the Fire Company as another policy covering the risk of fire alone. How far the case would have been different if there had been evidence of a usage of trade or of a course of business between the parties excluding from the subject matter of fire policies goods covered by marine policies, it is not necessary to enquire. There was no such evidence; and no such usage or course of business was sought to be set up.

We now come to the question of the agreement said to have been made between the Plaintiff and the Fire Company at the time of the transfer of the Fire policy.

The agreement is set out in the following addition, made by way of amendment, to paragraph 5 of the answer:—"The defendant company says that it was then and there agreed by the parties that the transfer of the policy as requested by the plaintiff should be construed to protect against fire only such goods on the pier as might not be protected against fire by a marine policy or policies or in respect of which the fire clause of the marine policy or policies might have expired."

This plea has been objected to as being wholly inadmissible on the ground that it contravenes the rule that in construing a written instrument the meaning of the instrument is to be determined by what the parties have said and not by what they may have really intended, and reading the plea with absolute strictness it may be open to that objection. The rule is thus laid down in Taylor on Evidence: "Although evidence of all the circumstances surrounding the author of a written instrument will be received to ascertain his intentions, yet those intentions must ultimately be determined by the language of the instrument, as explained by the extrinsic evidence; and no proof (however conclusive) can be admitted with a view of setting up an intention inconsistent with the known meaning of the writing itself. The duty of the court in all cases is to ascertain not what the parties may have really intended as contradistinguished from what their words express; but simply what is the meaning of the words they have used."

But I think if a wider construction can be given to the plea it ought to be given. It may be considered, as a plea by way of equitable defence, and taken with the part of the answer immediately preceding it amounts to this, that if the legal construction of the policy and endorsement is that the policy covers all goods of the description mentioned in the policy, then a mistake has been made, that it was agreed between the parties that the policy should be so transferred as to make the policy cover only goods not covered by marine policies and that it is inequitable in the plaintiff now to take advantage of the words of the transfer actually used, those words having been used by mistake. But there it is argued that rectification of the endorsement not having been asked for by way of counter-claim, this action must be treated altogether as a common law action, and must have applied to it the rules governing a common law action, as distinguished from those admitted in a suit in equity. But it is to be observed that since the Judicature Acts this distinction has lost its force. By Section 24 of the Judicature Act, 1873, sub-section (2) it is provided: "If any defendant claims to be entitled to any equitable estate or right, or to relief upon any equitable ground against any deed, instrument, or contract, or against any right, title, or claim asserted by any plaintiff or petitioner in such cause or matter, or alleges any ground of equitable defence to any claim of the plaintiff or petitioner in such cause or matter, the said courts respectively, and every judge thereof, shall give to every equitable estate, right, or ground of relief so claimed, and to every equitable defence so alleged, such and the same effect, by way of defence against the claim of such plaintiff or petitioner, as the Court of Chancery ought to have given if the same or the like matters had been relied on by way of defence in any suit or proceeding instituted in that court for the same or the like purpose before the passing of this Act."

And, although in some of the cases decided under this section relief has been claimed by way of counter-claim, it has also been granted where not so claimed. To allow such a distinction, moreover, would at all times have been contrary to the guiding principle upon which our procedure under the Orders in Council is based, that the rules should be so framed as to secure as far as may be that cases shall be decided on their merits according to substantial justice without excessive regard to technicalities of pleading or procedure. And it would specifically be contrary to the combined effect of Rule 33, which says that every petition is to be taken to imply an offer to equity in the matter of the suit commenced by it, and to admit of any equitable defence, and of rule 48, which, subject to the control of the Court, allows evidence to be given in support of defences not expressly set up in the answer.

In the Courts of Common Law, moreover, before the Judicature Acts a distinction was made in the matter of equitable relief between the cases in which it was sought by the Plaintiff to assist him in his claims against the defendant and cases where it was sought by the defendant, in order to resist the claim made against him. An instance where an equitable defence was admitted occurs in the case of Wake v. Harrop heard in the Court of Exchequer in 1861 and confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber in 1862. The plea in that case was in some respects very like the plea in the present case. The defendants were sued for breach of a charter party in the body of which they appeared to be the freighters and the plaintiff's testator the shipowner. The defendants pleaded the following plea on equitable grounds.

"Plea on equitable grounds, that the defendants entered into the charter-party solely as agents for 'A. Davidson and Company,' of Messina, and that before defendants signed the charter, it was agreed and understood between and by Wilkinson [the plaintiff's testator] and the defendants, that the defendants as aforesaid, so as to bind A. Davidson and Co.; and were not to make themselves liable as principals for the performance of the charter. That the defendants signed the charter party, in the following manner:—'For A. Davidson & Co., Messina, T. W. & J. C. Harrop & Co., agents,' they (the defendants) also Wilkinson bona fide believing at the time that the charter was signed, that the defendants, having so signed it, would not be personally liable to be sued on the charter as charterers, notwithstanding the charter in the body thereof professed to be made between Wilkinson as owner of the ship, of the one part, and the defendants, as merchants and freighters, of the other part. That the defendants had power to bind 'A. Davidson and Company' by signing the charter as their agents, and that 'A. Davidson & Co., are bound by the charter, and are liable to be sued for the breaches of the charter in the declaration mentioned, and that the plaintiff is inequitable taking advantage of the mistake in drawing the charter, so as to make the defendants personally liable as charterers, contrary to the intention both of Wilkinson and of the defendant, to maintain this action against the defendants." This plea was demurred to. It was argued on behalf of the Plaintiff that the plea was bad, that it shortly amounted to this, that it was agreed before the defendants signed the charter party that they should only sign as agents, that the defendants were therefore seeking to give parol evidence to discharge themselves from liability on a written document and that that could not be done, and further that it was seeking to give parol evidence in order to put a construction upon a written document, and that could not be done, that the intention had to be collected from the document itself which was the sole evidence of the contract, and no matter what took place before the parties reduced their agreement to writing, when that is done, that alone is the record of the contract.

These objections of the plaintiffs were overruled by the Court of Exchequer and the judgment of that Court was upheld on appeal. The grounds of the decision were given by Mr. Justice Cotton in his judgment, where he says (31 L. J. R. at p. 454.)

"I am of opinion that this judgment ought to be affirmed. The plea appears to me to raise a good equitable defence; and the reasons for so holding are sufficiently expressed in the opinions of the learned Barons in the Court below, and I agree with the reasons they have given. This is not a case in which it was merely not intended by the party signing that he should be personally bound, but it is a case in which there was an express agreement by both parties to the effect that the defendants, when they signed, were making the principal only liable and not themselves. I cannot help thinking that is an equitable fraud on the part of the plaintiff, somewhat like that in the case of Daines v. Steinbank to sue the defendants when it was agreed that they should not be sued. This again is not a case in which the defendants seek to put a different construction on the written document from that which the plaintiff puts. I agree that that would be no defence; and that if the parties have mistaken their rights under an agreement, they must abide by the consequences; but here the defendants simply seek to show that suing them is contrary to the express agreement of the parties at the time of signing, and it would be monstrous to say that this cannot be taken advantage of as an equitable defence. My Brother Willes in the course of the argument, put the case of an attorney, without fraud, misrepresenting the effect of an agreement before the parties signed, it would be monstrous to say that they could not obtain relief in equity under such circumstances. Suppose there had been a written correspondence, to the effect of the facts set out in the plea, before signing the agreement, and the parties had then signed, at law the previous writing could not be used to show what the intention of the parties was, which must be collected from the written instrument itself; but surely in equity there would be a remedy. There is no case in which equity has interfered when the parties have misunderstood and have acted upon a misapprehension of their rights under an agreement,—granted; but on the other hand, no case goes anything near the length of saying that Story's doctrine is not sound and that equity will not interfere where, by mutual mistake, a document has been signed having an effect in law directly contrary to the express agreement and intention of both parties."

The doctrine of Story which had been referred to is contained in section 115 of his Equity Jurisprudence and is as follows:—

"Equity may compel parties to execute their agreements, but it has no authority to make agreements for them, or to substitute one for another. If there had been any mistake in the instrument itself, so that it did not contain what the parties had agreed on, that would have formed a very different case; for where an instrument is drawn and executed which professes, or is intended, to carry into execution an agreement previously entered into, but which, by mistake of the draughtsman, either as to fact or to law, does not fulfil that intention, or violates it, equity will correct the mistake so as to produce a conformity to the instrument." There was one point of difference between the case of Wake and Harrop and the present case that, in the former case, the effect of the plea was to show that the plaintiff had no remedy at all against the defendant under the agreement there referred to, while, in this case, it is not sought to set aside the agreement altogether. The two cases, however, have this in common that the plea in each goes to show that the plaintiff has no remedy at all against the defendant in the particular matter of the suit, and whatever bearing the distinction may have had upon the power of a common law court before the judicature acts, it has no bearing on the power of this Court to grant relief. And it appears to me that the judgment just read applies to the agreement pleaded in this case, that evidence of that agreement may be given, and that the agreement if satisfactorily proved would be a good ground of defence.

We have now to consider what the evidence is. The agreement set up is a verbal agreement between Mr. Teveson on behalf of the Fire Company, Mr. Versey on behalf of the Plaintiffs, and these two gentlemen are the only persons who can speak on the subject. They have both given their evidence. Mr. Versey's evidence was not so full as that of Mr. Teveson but it in no wise contradicts it, and Mr. Teveson's account of what took place may be accepted as correct in every respect. Mr. Versey had written the following letter to the agent, of the Fire Company:—Memorandum. From E. Papany, No. 42 Concession, Kobe, 7th February, 1898. To the China Fire Insurance Co., Ltd., Dear Sirs, Enclosed please find one fire policy No. 4377 for yen 2,500 covering the risk on goods stored in godown No. 37 which please transfer on goods and merchandise stored or to be stored on the Fire Company's Wharf at Kobe and oblige. Yours faithfully, F. Pabaney.

Referring to this letter Mr. Teveson says:— I remember on the 7th February receiving an application from the plaintiff for the transfer of Policy No. 4377. On receiving that application, acting on instructions of Mr. Edwards, I went and called on Mr. Versey. After the receipt of the Memo. requesting the transfer of the Policy 4377 I went to 42 Concession, Mr. Pabaney's office, I saw Mr. Versey. I told him that I was very sorry I was afraid I could not make the transfer I was requested. If it was for only one or two nights I might possibly oblige him. Mr. Versey in reply said he wished the policy transferred to cover goods that were coming forward or might be coming forward. I inquired if his Marine Insurance Policy did not cover these goods. Mr. Versey replied, in most cases but not all. I further inquired was there not a stamped clause on the Marine Insurance Policy covering fire on the hatoba. Mr. Versey replied, in some cases but not all. I can show you; I asked Mr. Versey not to trouble. I inquired if he wished the policy transferred to cover goods which had not this clause stamped on them or printed on them, or that the allotted time allowed by the Marine Insurance clauses had expired. Mr. Versey replied, Yes. I then returned to the office, and consulted my senior, after which the endorsement was made, and the policy returned to Mr. Versey. I did not see Mr. Versey again about this policy until the morning of the 3rd of March.

And Mr. Teveson on cross examination said:— "This endorsement on this policy is my wording. It is signed by Mr. Edwards. Mr. Edwards is my senior. In a case like that I would refer to my senior. When I left Mr. Versey's office I had not made any arrangement. I said I would refer to Mr. Edwards."

Now upon that evidence, what conclusion ought I to come to as to the existence or mere existence of the agreement set up. One thing is well settled, that, whoever sets up such an agreement as against a written contract must prove it satisfactorily and conclusively. So far from this being done, it appears to me that the evidence that there was no such agreement. Mr. Teveson says that when he left Mr. Versey's office he had not made any arrangement, and after that he had no communication with Mr. Versey whatever until the policy with the endorsement signed was sent to Mr. Versey, and sent, as it appears, without note or comment. It may be conceded that after the conversation between Mr. Versey and Mr. Teveson the sending of the policy to Mr. Versey with the endorsement might fairly be construed by Mr. Versey, in the absence of any remark to the contrary, as giving to him what he had said he wanted—protection for goods not covered by marine policies, and that if the endorsement had failed to give him that protection, he might have good reason to complain. But the endorsement did give him that protection, and I can find nothing to show that there was any agreement that it should stop short at that. The endorsement did go beyond that, but, it was made on behalf of the Company and I am satisfied that it was made deliberately, and not by mistake or inadvertence. Probably, if the exact wording of the particular marine policies had been known, it would have suggested a different wording of the endorsement, and it appears that to meet some of the difficulties to which the fire in question gave rise a new clause has been agreed upon by the insurance Companies. But it has been conceded, and the evidence shows, that the plaintiffs are not responsible for any concealment or misrepresentation with regard to the policies.

I have spoken of the evidence of Mr. Teveson, as if that were the only evidence of the agreement except that of Mr. Versey, and the letter just referred to and, with that exception, it was the only evidence admitted. There was, however, sought to be put in evidence on behalf of the Fire Company; and as an admission of the agreement, a statement made by Mr. Crose, the legal adviser of the Plaintiff, in a letter written to the agents of the Marine Company. But I ruled it was inadmissible as against the plaintiff, on the ground that such letter was written by Mr. Crose as solicitor to the plaintiff before legal proceedings were instituted, and without communicating its contents to the plaintiff. It appears to me that in those circumstances Mr. Crose had no authority to make such an admission on behalf of the plaintiff, and that it is not evidence against the plaintiff. It was not, in any case, in the circumstances in which it was made, such an admission as estopped the plaintiff, as against the Fire Company and certainly not such as estopped the Marine Company, who always denied its truth. It could not, therefore, in the face of Mr. Teveson's evidence, be considered as of any value. I consider then that the defence of the Fire Company fails, and I find that the fire policy does attach to the goods in question.

There is next to be considered the question whether and how far the marine policies attach to the same goods. It is admitted that they attach to the goods so far as they are not covered by the fire policy, but it is claimed on behalf of the Marine company that by virtue of the exception contained in the words "unless already covered by a fire policy" they attach no further or otherwise. On behalf of the Fire Company it is contended that the exception does not apply, on two grounds. First that the word "covered" in the exception means fully covered and the cotton was not fully covered by the fire policy, and secondly, that the word "already" refers to the time when the marine policies were issued, and at the time those policies were issued the fire policy, although issued, was not transferred, so as to attach to goods on the pier. As to the meaning of the word "covered," I cannot find that the word is used in the marine policy in any other clause than in that now under consideration. I can therefore find no assistance from that source as to the meaning of the word, and I have not been referred to any authority. Elsewhere I find it used in two different senses. As applied to the interest of the assured I find the word "covered" to be used in the sense of fully covered. Thus in Arnould on Marine Insurance I find the following (4th ed. p. 16): "The interest of the assured is technically said to be covered by the policy, when the sum or aggregate of sums insured in the policy is sufficient to afford him full compensation for whatever loss that interest may sustain. If the value of his interest exceeds the sum insured, the excess of interest is said to be 'uncovered by the policy' and the insured to be 'his own insurer' to that extent."

And in Bunyon on Fire Insurance (4th ed. p. 5):—"The simple effect of a condition of average is to place the assured in the position of an insurer for the amount uncovered by the policy."

On the other hand when I look at the policy of the Fire Company I find the word used in a different sense when applied to the subject matter of the insurance. It appears in the pro rata condition of average, which is as follows:—

"It is hereby declared, and agreed, that whenever a sum insured is declared to be subject to the Conditions of Average, if the Property so covered shall at the breaking out of any fire be collectively of greater in value than the sum insured thereon, then this Company shall pay or make good such a proportion only of the loss or damage as the sum so insured shall bear to the whole value of the said Property at the time when such fire shall first happen."

Here the very policy in question is spoken of in the policy itself as covering goods, when those goods are only partially insured by the policy, the property comprised in the policy is said to be covered by the policy, although the property is not fully covered by the policy. I am of opinion that this is the meaning of the word as used in the marine policy. I come to this conclusion, not because I consider the Fire Company bound by the use of the word "covered" in their own policy. But their so using it, shows that it is an admissible use of it, and I consider that that is the use of the word which was most probably intended. It appears to me to be highly improbable that the Marine Company should intend to limit the exception to the case where the goods were fully insured by a fire policy. One of the marine policies was for 125 bales only. It might very well have happened that those 125 bales should be the only bales burned, and the only bales landed and the only property at risk. In that case the fire policy would have fully covered them. Could it possibly have been intended that the exception should depend on the accident of more or less goods being at risk at the outbreak of the fire. I think not.

Again, as to the word "already" that may have either of two meanings. It may mean "before the present time," or, "before some time referred to."—in this case, before the issue of the marine policies, or, before the outbreak of the fire, and we have to determine which of those meanings was intended by a consideration of the whole circumstances. The marine policies in this case were, and in most cases usually are, taken out at the port of shipment, while the risk of fire referred to in the clause of those policies under consideration is a risk occurring subsequent to the landing of the goods at their destination, and the fire policy covering such risk in this case was, and in most cases such fire policies usually are, taken out at the port of landing. The clause in each of the marine policies in a clause added to the policy, and provides for a prolongation of the liability of the underwriters beyond the time at which such liability would cease under the policy in its old form without the clause. And looking at the clause as a whole, and in view of the fact that it did not originally form any part of a Marine policy, we may, I think, fairly draw the conclusion that it was intended to afford protection to the owner of the goods until they should come under the protection of a fire policy and no longer. Whatever the goods might be it is a matter of indifference so far as regards the object of the clause how long before the outbreak of the fire a fire policy may have been taken out, so long as it was in existence at that time, and in the case of isolated shipments which must be taken into consideration insurance at the port of landing would not in the ordinary course be effected until the goods were on the point of arriving, and certainly not until after the goods had left the port of shipment. The word "already" then as used in the clause appears to me to mean at the outbreak of the fire. It is in fact the only meaning which will carry out what we must presume to have been the intention of the parties.

I find then that the fire policy in this case is such a fire policy as is contemplated in the exception to the clause and effect must be given to the clause accordingly.

There will then be a declaration first that the fire policy referred to in the pleadings attached to the goods there referred to, and, second, that the said fire policy is a fire policy within the exception to the fire clause in each of the marine policies referred to in the pleadings, and effect is to be given to such marine policies and to such fire clause accordingly. The parties will, I have no doubt, arrive at what the contributions of each company ought to be under these declarations, but there will be a formal reference to the Registrar to determine what under such declarations and the admission made and evidence given at the trial, and such further evidence as he may require, are the sums payable by each defendant company to the plaintiff and what repayment (if any) ought to be made by the Plaintiff to the defendants the China Traders Insurance Company Limited, and an order that such sums be paid accordingly, and that all parties have liberty to apply. The defendants the China Fire Insurance Company Limited will pay the Plaintiff his costs of the suit and reference.

H. S. WILKINSON, Judge.

Yokohama, March 30th, 1899.

Mr. Walford—As to the costs to the China Traders, your Honour?

His Honour—I have considered that, Mr. Walford, and I consider the costs of the suit have not been naturally increased by joining you, and the justice of the case does not require that you should receive any costs. You will understand by that that I think both offices have acted very properly in the way that they have done. As a matter of cost, I think you should not have costs.

Fire broke out about 8 o'clock last night, at Wakayanagi-machi, Aitihara-gun, Miyagi prefecture. The flames raged till 2 a.m. to-day, and more than eighty houses were burned.

HOTEL DESTROYED BY FIRE.

Kyoto, March 25.

This afternoon the Maruyama Hotel here was burnt down. The fire originated in a chimney in the cook's room.

A JAPANESE VESSEL FOUNDERS.

Kobe, March 28.

About 2 p.m. yesterday, a small Japanese vessel collided with a schooner. The former was sunk. Thirteen sailors and passengers are missing, but it is thought probable that they were rescued by the schooner, which went on its way.

THE OCHA-NO-MIZU MURDER.

Sendai, March 28.

The trial of the Ocha-no-mizu murderer Matsumura Noriyoshi was opened to-day, when the accused stated that he had killed his wife by mistake. The Public Procurator asked for the quashing of the original judgment and a new prosecution.

SHOCKING AFFAIR.

Utsunomiya, March 28.

At 1 p.m. to-day, Murata Monji, of Hirado village, Kawachi district, was found murdered. His wife and adopted daughter were suffering from serious wounds. The affair is a mystery.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 413.

WHITE. 1—R to B3 2—Q to R2! 3—Kt to Kt4!! mate if 2—K to B4 3—Kt to K3 mate if 2—Any other 3—Q to Kt sq mate 2—P to Kt4 ch 3—Q to K3 mate Only "Marco" sent in a correct solution. "Voila" went wrong in this variation: 1—B to B3 2—Kt to K3 ch 3—Q to Q4 mate (?) No! R takes Q.

The Japan Mail problem competition for this year begins with the problem printed below. The Prize is given by W.H.S.

PROBLEM No. 416 By A. C. CHALLENGER First Prize, Hampstead and Highgate Express Tonnage.

WHITE. White mates in two moves.

GAME No. 493. Played at Cheltenham on November 24th, Lasker contesting against 30 members of the district, winning 24 games, drawing 4, and losing 2 to Colonel E. Law, of Deenhurst, and Rev. E. B. James, of Gloucester. The following is Colonel Law's win:—

ALLOAIER-THOROLD GAMBIT. WHITE. Lasker. 1—P to K4 2—P to K B4 3—Kt to KB3 4—P to KR4 5—Kt to K5 6—Kt takes P 7—P to Q4 8—Kt to B3 9—B takes P Col. E. Law. 1—P to K4 2—P takes P 3—P to K Kt4 4—P to K5 5—P to K R3 6—K takes Kt 7—P to Q4 8—Kt to K B3! 9—P takes P

Notes by James Mason. Capture of the Pawn may be delayed, but up to and including move 10, on both sides, the opening may be accepted as a model of correctness in this hazardous game.

10—B to B4 ch 11—B to K5 Now, however, 11—Q to Q2, with choice as to Castling, would yield a much more enduring attack. The exchange of this Bishop is unfavourable; even assuming no further sacrifice of force involved.

12—Castles 13—Q to K2 If 13—Kt takes P or 13, Kt to Q5, the reply might be the same, that is, 13..... Kt takes B; and Black's superior force would about as easily assert itself. Anyhow, the attack fails, and the solid difference of the piece remains.

14—P takes Kt 15—K to Rq 16—Kt takes P 17—Kt takes B 18—B takes Q 19—Q R to Q1 q

.....Or 16.... Kt takes Kt; there would be no harm in 17—R to B7, R to B7+, etc. White could not seriously prolong the contest two pieces behind.

17—Kt takes B 18—B takes Q 19—Q R to Q1 q

20—K to R2 21—R to Q4 22—P to Q B4 23—P takes P 24—B takes P With this Black makes further gain—wins as a matter of course. Here Lasker might have gracefully resigned.

25—B takes B 26—K to R3 27—B to Q5 28—R to Kt4 ch 29—R to Kt6 30—R to K B6 31—K to Kt4 32—R to Q5 33—R to Q7 ch 34—R to R B7 35—K to R5 36—R to Q7 37—K to Kt6 25—Kt takes R ch 26—K R to K sq 27—R to K2 28—K to R q! 29—K to R2 30—R to K6 ch 31—Kt to Q7 32—Kt to R5 33—K to R q 34—R to K q 35—Kt to Q3 36—K R to K4 ch 37—R takes B And White resigned.

GAME No. 494. The Singapore Championship Tournament has been won by Mr. P. A. Rentens with 7½ points out of 8 games played. He has been fortunate enough to win 7 games, and draw 1 with Mr. Elenn.

The following games were played in the Tournament:—

White—G. S. Rentens. 1 P K4 2 R B4 3 P KB4 4 Kt KB3 5 P x P 6 B K2 7 Kt Kt5(a) BxKt(b) 8 P x B 9 Castles Black—P. A. Rentens. 10 P Q4 11 R B4 12 BxKt 13 R x B(d) 14 B B5 15 BxPch(e) K x B 16 Q R5 h 17 Kt R3(f) Q KBch 18 Resigns.

NOTES FROM THE "SINGAPORE FREE PRESS." (a) A queer move. (b) Black is enticed to take the piece in view of gaining a pawn.

(c) And thereby falls into a trap by which he must lose a piece in order to save his Queen. Q to Kt3 best.

(d) But he lost two pieces by castling instead of retiring his Queen. White was in a high state of glee while Black was perspiring profusely, in contemplation of his ruined prospects for the championship.

(e) A rash sacrifice which revived Black's hopes. (f) A fatal mistake. Kt to B3 would afford White a chance of still winning.

GAME No. 495. White—P. A. Rentens. 1 P K4 2 Kt QB3 3 B B4 4 Kt x Kt 5 B x P 6 Kt QB3 7 P Q3 8 Kt B3 9 Kt K4 10 P KR3 11 Kt Kt3 12 Q x B 13 B K3 14 Ctl. KR 15 B K5 16 Kt K4 17 B B6 18 Q O-q 19 P QB3 20 P QKt4 Black—W. Craig. 21 B x B 22 Kt B5 23 Kt x R 24 P QB4 25 Q R2 26 Q K4 27 P x Q 28 P K3 29 K K2 30 QR Q-q 31 P B4 32 R B3 33 R B2 34 P Kt5 35 P x P 36 Kt R 37 R x Kt? 38 K K3 39 K B3 40 K K4 41 K x P and wins (f)

NOTES. (a) Q to B3 seems best. (b) Q takes Kt P wins a P (c) This loses the exchange. (d) Kt takes P best. (e) P to KR4 best. (f) The game, not without some interesting points, was finished in about 15 minutes, which is far too fast for tournament play. After White had given up his R to his opponent's Kt, it should have ended in a draw.

LASKER ON THE "MODERN SCHOOL" Early in December last the world champion delivered a lecture on the Modern School, at the Insurance Chess Club, London, which the Standard reported as follows:—"The theme was the Modern School, a difficult subject, which Mr. Lasker handled diplomatically by emphasizing the principle of the pawn ending. What is the modern school, or the old school, for the matter of that? Up to late in the seventies no mention was made of a modern school. We played the games of the past and contemporaneous masters, and distinguished only between good and bad games. All of a sudden, Steinitz started the new war cry of the quasi modern school, finding out suddenly that he was speaking prose all his life. It came about at the time when the correspondence match between the city of London Chess Club and Vienna was played. Steinitz then adopted a new style, which he caught from the late Mr. Potter, with whom he was constantly closeted, working upon the correspondence games. In earlier days before chess was so widely disseminated through the medium of the press and clubs, the ordinary amateur had no means of improving beyond what he could learn from the standard works on the game. Therefore, the first class players stood head and shoulders above the usual run of players. Now a days, the line of demarcation between master and first class amateur is thinner, owing to the facilities of publication mentioned; therefore, the former brilliant variations with which the master could vanquish the amateur fall to the ground, because the latter knows them as well as his opponent. The master has, therefore, to resort to steady, sound and careful play, and all he can achieve is a strategical advantage, or a better pawn position for the ending—and this is the Modern School! Careful and unimaginative players of all times may be said to have practised the principles of this Modern School. What we maintain may be noticed in a striking manner in simultaneous performances. Even the apostle of the Modern School in such a stance would adopt the Old School—viz, lively variations and attacking style against the bulk of his opponents, whilst he would resort (and will have to) to the style of the Modern School against the few top players of the team opposed to him, or, in other words, he would play what Lasker calls psychological chess. There are, however, exponents of the modern style, Lasker and Dr. Tartasch, for instance, but only because they have been educated in this style, and because they have adopted the sound principles of "position play." Charousek, for instance, belongs to no school; he adopts both styles—because he does play "psychological chess."

NOTES. At meeting of the Selection Committee, at the British Chess Club, the following were chosen to play in the forthcoming match by cable against America: Atkins, Brillingham, Blackburne, Burn, Jackson, Jacobs, Locock, Milk, and Wainwright. Reserves:—Trenchard, Walker, and Ward.

It is announced that an international tournament is being organised under the auspices of the Grand Cercle et Cercle des Echecs de Paris, to be held during the Exhibition of 1900 at the rooms of the Cercle. The committee have subscribed 10,000fr. towards the prize fund, and make besides the liberal offer to admit as temporary members to their club all subscribers of 100fr. The latter offer will swell the fund considerably, the Grand Cercle, 16 Boulevard Montmartre, being one of the best social clubs in Paris. This fin de siècle tournament should prove not only the grandest of the century but the greatest ever held.

It cannot be said that the French have been prompted to this step in a spirit of rivalry to the tournament which is being organised in this country, for they have held two tournaments before—during the Exhibitions of 1867 and 1878—and both surpassed every previously held tournament in any country.—Westminster Gazette.

During the past three months great progress has been made in the movement to organize an International Chess Tournament, to be held in London during the coming summer, and it is now announced that the committee have made arrangements to hold the tournament in the St. Stephen's Great Hall, adjoining the Royal Aquarium, Westminster. Play will last six or seven weeks, commencing on the 30th of May. Some little difficulty was anticipated in finding a suitable hall, the tournament being fixed to take place during the height of the London season, and the committee are to be congratulated on securing such a fine hall, capable of holding a very large company, and so well situated for sight-seers.

A very strong committee has been formed, of which Sir George Newnes, President of the British and City of London Chess Clubs, is President, and including, among the hundred or more names, the Marquess of Ripon, Viscount Cubham and Folkestone, the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Rayleigh, F.R.S., a strong contingent of members of the House of Commons, including the Attorney General, Sir Wm. Hart Dyke, and Mr. Henniker Heaton, and the presidents of all the leading chess clubs and associations throughout the kingdom.

It is proposed to hold two tournaments the first a double round tournament limited to about 16 players, which, it is hoped, will include all the finest players in the world, and secondly, a single round tournament of 20 or more players not competing in the double round tournament. The prize fund will, it is anticipated, amount to about £1,500, and towards this promises have been received by the committee of about £1,000. The joint honorary secretaries of the tournament are Mr. Junius L. Cope, honorary secretary of the British Chess Club, which is taking a leading part in the matter, and Mr. J. W. Russell, honorary secretary of the City of London Chess Club.

A performance of chess with living pieces recently took place on the grounds of the Vienna Jubilee Agricultural Exhibition. It was intended to represent the victory of Prince Eugene over Kara Mustapha in the battle of Zenta. No less than 340 persons and 15 horses were engaged in the contest, and the field was divided into 61 yellow and black squares, each of 16 square yards. Before the game commenced a grand procession was formed, with music and banners, Prince Eugene with his generals and his queen, all appropriately caparisoned, coming last, on the side of the White army. On the Black side there was a similar formation, and at a trumpet call they all arranged themselves on the field in battle array. The two kings stood on their squares on horseback, surrounded by eight generals or pachas, and all the other pieces and pawns were represented by groups of persons, varying from three to nine in number.

The Advantage of the First Move.—The general deduction derived from an examination of a grand total of over 3,000 games, is that White on the average wins 55 and Black only 45 out of every 100 games played.

REPORT.

The meeting is called by Rule XV. for the purpose of receiving the Report of the Committee and a statement of Accounts, to elect a Committee for the ensuing year, and for general purposes.

THE MINUTES of the last meeting have been circulated among the members.

From the Customs returns the Export Trade shows a decrease of yen 10,776,200, the figures being for 1898 yen 68,905,300 against yen 79,681,500 in 1897. Taking a glance at the tables, given at the end of this report, it will be seen that the decrease is chiefly to be found in the export of Raw Silk, the figures being yen 42,047,500 for 1898, yen 56,173,300 for 1897. The production was less than last year, but the figures are somewhat deceptive, the war between the United States and Spain having caused shipments to the first of these countries to be delayed till the spring of this year. Silk Manufacturers, on the contrary, show a satisfactory increase, the Export becoming steadily of importance, and taking second place in the list to Raw Silk.

HARBOUR MASTER—Vice-Admiral Mori, having been appointed by the Japanese Government to that post, Port Regulations have been issued, and the Committee desire to acknowledge the courteous attention that they have received from this official whilst bringing before his attention the suggestions of their sub-Committee.

THE QUESTION AS TO WHAT THE PICUL WEIGHT is to be under the new Tariff has had the attention of the Committee. They have placed the matter before the Japanese Chamber, but without obtaining further information than was given at the last general meeting, viz., "The only mentioned in this Tariff is the Japanese weight. It is equal to 600 grammes of the Metric System of Weights, or 1.3227 lbs." This weight is adopted in paying Duties, but the custom of trade in buying and selling is unaltered. The Picul bought and sold is still 133.33 lbs. avoirdupois.

FRIENDLY RELATIONS WITH JAPANESE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.—On the 21st March a meeting was held by Representatives of the Committees of the Japanese and Foreign Chambers, at which the following subjects were introduced:—

Courts of Arbitration; Weight of the Kin; Harbour Improvements; on all which a friendly discussion ensued. Our guests were in favour of the proposed idea as to Arbitration, and asked for a translation of the Rules of our Chamber on the subject, which were supplied, without, however, bringing the matter to any conclusion. This subject is treated later in the Report.

As to Harbour Improvements, they informed us that they had prepared a Report, which included many of the suggestions for improvement made by the sub-Committee of this Chamber, and we hope that the joint action of the two Chambers will have had its influence in the proper quarters. The meeting concluded with an hospitable invitation from the Chairman of the Japanese Chamber to a social meeting, which was accepted with thanks, but no definite time arranged for it.

The Committee are glad to be able to report that the relations of the two Chambers are of the most cordial nature, and they specially desire to acknowledge the readiness of the Chairman of the Japanese Chamber, Mr. Otani, to be of service to this Chamber.

AUCTION SALES.—The abuses brought before this Chamber at the last general meeting by combinations amongst Japanese buyers has been the subject of communications with the Japanese Chambers of Commerce, both here and in Tokyo, but they do not seem to have been able to make any suggestions to do away with the abuse.

COURTS OF ARBITRATION.—The Committee, being of the opinion that the subject was one of importance, have appointed a sub-Committee to report on the same, and the result of their labours will be found in the Memorandum placed before you, and on which the Committee hope for your opinion at this meeting. There can be no doubt of the practical utility of the suggestions made, if they can only be carried out effectually. With all respect for the new Codes, and for the Judges appointed to administer them, most Foreigners here will prefer to save the expense and risk of litigation if they can have matters of business dispute settled by Arbiters whose honesty and common-sense have been known to them for years, and on whose impartiality they can perfectly depend; whilst in disputes on commercial matters, both Japanese and Foreigners will soon find that such Courts of arbitration will serve to prevent friction and minimize differences of opinion at a much smaller cost of labour and money than by an appeal to the Law Courts, whose procedure is of necessity slow, and where expenses often run into larger amounts than that of the original claim.

CUSTOM HOUSE AND HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.—The sub-Committee of this Chamber having drawn up a valuable and exhaustive Report on this subject, this was sent in to the Customs Authorities by your Committee, and will have had its weight in the subsequent arrangements, which seem to be working satisfactorily. The subject has also been brought directly before the Foreign Office in Tokyo, and they have assured us that it has had, and is having, their attention, and we are led to hope that great improvements are on the eve of being commenced.

BONDED GODOWNS.—This has been a frequent subject of correspondence during the past year, and hopes are held out by the Authorities that more satisfactory arrangements will shortly be introduced, especially as to bonding Kerosene, Alcohol, and Explosives.

DRAWBACKS.—This subject has also had the attention of the Committee, and by one of the recent circulars issued by the Chamber it will have been seen that it is having the attention of the Authorities at the Foreign Office.

SILK BOUNTY BILL.—In spite of the protests of this Chamber, this Bill became Law on 1st April, but its duration was so short that it did but little harm, and it has since been repealed.

THE REVISED TARIFF came into force on the 1st of January. As was to be expected, goods had been hurried forward to come in under the old scale of duties, and considerable over-stocking has been the consequence, but, as they work off, it is hoped that trade will not be materially injured by the increased duties.

FORM OF CONTRACT FOR THE IMPORT TRADE.—The Committee now submit a form that they consider suited to the wants of the Import Trade, and the opinion of the meeting is solicited upon it.

DEATH OF MR. O. KEIL.—Unanimous feelings of regret have to be expressed by the Committee of the Chamber of Commerce at the loss they have sustained in the death of Mr. Keil, a man of high intelligence and great industry, having the interests of the Chamber at heart, whose loss will not easily be made good. It has been unanimously decided to place on record in the Minutes of this Chamber an expression of regret at his death.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.—The season treated in this report is from 1st January to 31st December. The export figures for 1898 show a falling off of no less than 30 per cent. in the quantity exported, and of 25 per cent. in total value, the average value per bale being Yen 60 greater than for the previous year.

The crop of 1898 was estimated to be about 15 per cent. short of the previous season, but this only partly accounted for the falling off in export, which was chiefly due to the war between the United States and Spain having disorganised manufacturers' business for the time being in the United States; also to the state of political unrest in Europe, which curtailed the demand and left the market in Japan with an unsold stock of about 12,000 piculs at the end of December, which will go to swell the Export of 1899.

Another reason for the falling off in the Export is to be found in the growing complaints of inferiority in the quality of Japan silks, especially from the United States. Manufacturers in that country were compelled to give a preference to European silks, and it will be seen that very much of the shortage in the export of Japan silk to that market was made up by increased importations of Italian Raws towards the end of 1898. It was partly due, thanks to the falling off of supplies in Italy, that American buyers were again induced to return to purchases of Japan Filatures.

It is of the utmost importance to all interested in the Silk trade that these causes of complaint should be removed, for, with the astonishing increase in the production of Filature silk in China, especially in Canton and elsewhere, Japan silks will surely lose their place in consumption if the quality is not improved. This is all the more to be regretted because naturally the silk of Japan is quite among the finest in the world, and where Filature owners have followed the times in accepting the latest improvements the Filature silks thus produced have given the greatest satisfaction. The faults chiefly complained of are irregularity of size and that the silk, notably among Shinshu Filatures, is often "duvetene." But probably the most regrettable complaint is that well-known Filatures which have established a reputation for the excellence of the silks produced from the cocoons of their own districts are now in the habit of bringing cocoons from inferior districts, and, reeling from them, produce an inferior article which is sold under old and well-known chop tickets. By this consumers are often deceived and do not feel that they can depend on the quality. They therefore turn their attention to other silks which are dependable.

The following are the Export figures for the past two years:—

	America. Bales.	France. Bales.	Other Countries. Bales.
1898	28,717	13,820	4,821
1897	38,972	23,397	6,299
	Total. Bales.	Value. Bales.	Average value per Bale. Yen.
1898	47,358	42,047,500	887
1897	68,668	56,173,300	818

Japanese direct exporters shipped during the past year 11,359 bales, or nearly one-fourth of the total export.

The year commenced with No. 1 Filatures quoted yen 900/920. An increased demand then set in from America, and likewise for native consumption, which caused prices to advance to yen 920/940 by the end of February.

About the middle of March buying for Europe almost ceased, owing to the unsettled state of politics in that quarter, and prices commenced to fall, the decline being accentuated by the outbreak of war between the United States and Spain in April, when prices reached their lowest point, viz., yen 800/810 for No. 1 Filatures of coarse sizes, and yen 850/860 for No. 1 Filatures of fine sizes. May brought an increased demand both from Europe and America, and prices for coarse-sized Filatures rose yen 50 per picul, fine sizes remaining stationary. In June the market opened for the new Silk at yen 870 for coarse sizes No. 1 Filatures. But owing to unfavourable advices in regard to the new crop here, and the high cost to producers, prices rapidly advanced in July to yen 940/950 for fine-sized Filatures and to yen 900/910 for silk of sizes suitable for America.

Buyers for Europe continued to pay this advance, prices remaining steady until the end of October, when fine-sized Filatures No. 1 were quoted at 950/960. But the American market would not follow the movement, and at the same time silks suitable for that trade could be had at yen 880/890. In November there was a general decline in values of yen 35/50 per picul all round, owing to the accumulation of stock to 16,400 piculs and the eagerness of holders to sell. In December a revival took place, chiefly owing to large purchases by Japanese of silk for direct export to America, which brought prices up yen 45 per picul for coarse-sized Filatures, and a slight rise of yen 10 on fine-sized Filatures was also effected.

One good feature has been the decrease in the production of inferior qualities of Re-reved My-bashi, which have now almost disappeared from the market.

HAMATZKIS and SENDAI Silks of the best qualities have for the greater part come forward in the shape of Kakedas; whilst the lower qualities have mostly been absorbed by native consumers.

LAST YEAR'S SILK CROP.—The area of land devoted to the cultivation of the Mulberry steadily increases. According to the investigations of the Agricultural and Commercial Department, it is now reported:—

	Cho.
1896	288,937
1897	298,203
1898	305,856

This increase is particularly noticeable in the Bushu and Tokyo districts. The crop of cocoons was smaller than the previous year, but the chief deficit comes from the fact that the yield of silk from the cocoons was unusually poor owing to climatic influences at the critical period.

WASTE SILK.—At the beginning of 1898, the stock of Waste Silk was only 8,000 piculs, against 14,000 piculs on the 1st January, 1897. Prices were lower than during the previous year, on about the following basis:—

	Yen.
Oshiu Noshi	100 /110
Jo-shiu Noshi	57/60
Kikai Kibizo	80 /84

In spite of these low prices the market has ruled dull until the end of the season.

From the commencement of the season till towards the end of October, transactions were rendered comparatively small by the firmness of holders. During November and December our market was much more active, but, in spite of the advance in silk, prices remained almost without change. In January, however, prices advanced from 5 per cent. to 6 per cent., and the stock was rapidly exhausted without further advance being obtained.

At present the stock is reduced to piculs 1,500, most of which is very little suited for export, and we have seldom seen the market so poorly supplied. With the exception of some articles like Oshiu Noshi, which have sold at yen 120/125, prices for Waste Silk have not varied much during the season, the slight advance noted in January being very small in comparison with the rapid advance noted on Raw Silk. Our market closes quiet and dull, in spite of the small stocks, for consumers in Europe refuse to pay the prices asked here. Export for the year 1898 is as under:—

To Marseilles	Piculs 19,324
To Switzerland	5,662
To London	1,854
To America	300
To other Ports	6,591

The trade in SILK PIECE GOODS during the year under review has been marked by some noteworthy features. The total quantity shipped shows a decided advance on previous records, while the excited demand and increase in value have not been equalled in the history of the industry. The year opened with a firm market and fair demand, the leading feature being a good enquiry for exceptionally light Yechizen Habutai. Fancies shared in the brisk trade which developed during the month, and in February all lines were moving at a good rate, scarcity of satisfactory material somewhat curtailing the business in plain goods. The Spanish-American imbroglio naturally had an effect upon the New York market in the Spring, and during April-May demand from that quarter fell to a minimum. Prices weakened somewhat, but soon revived under the increased activity in Europe, for which destination a brisk trade was done in all grades of Yechizens. In June, the heavier Joshiu weaves came in for a share of the business, and buying was fairly general. In July, some New York speculators started operations which affected prices, but demand from Europe continued steady, and August opened with considerable activity. American purchasers quieted down again, until the Spanish question appeared to be approaching a solution, when they re-entered the market, and throughout September all lines of Silks were moving at a good pace. European demand eased off early in October, but revived later, the principal feature of the month being the very heavy deliveries of goods which had been contracted for during the preceding weeks of activity. November opened on a brisk trade, with prices on the upward track. Demand set in strongly from both America and Europe, and rates responded to the activity by rising to an unprecedented level. The excitement continued throughout December, and the year closed with prices showing an increase of from 10 to 15 per cent. upon the opening rates of the most popular lines. Naturally, the brisk trade has caused a scarcity of good material, and contracts have been heavily booked ahead, practically controlling the supply for the first six weeks of the new year.

The past year has seen a marked development of the trade with the Indian and Burman markets, which now absorb considerable quantities of light Brocades and low-grade Plain goods.

The Export of Silk Handkerchiefs to France shows a decrease, but that to other countries shows an increase. Prices have naturally been affected by the increased cost of Habutai and a higher scale of wages.

TEA.—The Tea Season of 1899 has been one of the most remarkable recorded for many years past, owing principally to the long talked-of duty imposed by the United States Government having come into effect on 14th June. Early in May, arrivals began to pour in freely, and the market opened at prices averaging fully 15 per cent. higher than those of the previous year. Throughout the season the quality of both cup and leaf—especially the former—was very satisfactory. The new Restriction Act for preventing the importation of inferior Teas into the United States continued strictly to be enforced and many rejections have been made. Common Teas have, therefore, mostly found their way to Canada, which country has not yet adopted a similar Act, although from recent discussions in the Canadian Houses of Parliament it is evident that the time is not far distant when they, too, will realize the necessity of protective measures. The levying of a duty has had a most disastrous effect on the trade in general, orders of considerable magnitude were cancelled in consequence, and a regular stagnation in the trade set in. Not only has the cost of labour, material, &c., used for Tea-firing greatly advanced as compared with previous years, but the prices paid to the Japanese for their Teas since the duty came into effect advanced also, a most extraordinary feature in the annals of commerce. A duty of 10 cents gold per pound seems abnormally high, and affects the pockets of the consumers to such an extent that they have been driven to find a substitute in coffee, 4 lbs. of the latter being retailed in the States for 25 cents gold. Dealers are therefore pushing the sale of coffee to the detriment of Tea, the ratio in price between the two commodities being so apparent as to greatly curtail the demand for the latter article.

Only a small percentage of New Season's Tea has been taken out of bond in America, dealers preferring to buy from old stock duty-free Teas the only good resulting therefrom being the clearing up of all the old Teas in the country. With the bulk of last year's Teas still to be disposed of the outlook for the coming season is not very encouraging.

COPPER.—The past year is notable for an active demand at improving prices, large contracts being entered into for forward delivery.

Values have consequently risen considerably, but, though production has to some extent increased, the quantity shipped is not largely in excess of former years.

FISH OIL.—The insignificant stocks carried over from 1897 were sold out at from Yen 4.50 to 5.40 and were entirely exhausted by April. The summer catch netted about 2,000 tons, which may be looked upon as satisfactory. Holders managed, however, to further improve upon the price and up to Yen 6.15 was paid by exporters. The October catch was very short, and upon it becoming evident that the winter catch would prove a complete failure values went up Yen 2, and all sorts of "paper filtered" were also being disposed of at extreme rates.

The year 1899 opened with stocks totalling not much more than 2,000 cases.

The total RICE CROP of Japan for 1897 was smaller than for any year since 1890, being 33,039,293 koku, or about 12 per cent. below the average of ten years previously. There was, therefore, a very large import of Foreign Rice, amounting in all to 221,666 tons, valued at Yen 4,748,780, nearly the whole of which passed into consumption before the end of the year. The Export trade was consequently restricted in, say, piculs 1,050,000 of a declared value of Yen 5,920,181, as prices ruled too high to compete with the supply from other countries. The new crop is an exceptionally fine one, and according to Government returns it is estimated at 47,387,666 koku, while the average for the last ten years is only 38,564,468. Thus there is an excess of 40 per cent. over the previous year and about 25 per cent. above the average of the previous decade. The price of the new crop of 1898 opened in November at Yen 10.60 per koku, and fell to Yen 9.17/9.20 at the end of December.

As a large Rice Crop contributes to the prosperity of the country, this bumper harvest ought to improve trade prospects, as there is not only sufficient for home consumption but a margin for export.

Tobacco.—Since the operation of the Monopoly the Government have been paying very high figures for all grades of Tobacco, the effect of which upon the exporter has been to practically prohibit exports, the London market refusing to take the Tobacco at such rates, except a few special qualities. As a matter of fact, apart from the question of price, Europe is using less and less Japanese Tobacco. Unless, therefore, the price falls considerably, it is to be feared no business will be done. Most of the Tobacco shipped this year is old stock. Should a decline take place there is one regulation of the Government which will tend to facilitate the business, that is, the growers are being made to grade the Tobacco, and the bad, indifferent, and good leaves are now segregated.

IMPORTS.

Taking a general review of the total Import Trade of the country, we find from figures published by the Customs Authorities, that the imports into Japan have shown a rapid and continuous increase during the past seven years, as follow:—

YEAR.	YEN.
1892	71,324,776
1893	88,257,172
1894	117,481,955
1895	129,260,578
1896	171,674,474
1897	219,300,773
1898	277,270,728

But this remarkable development has been accompanied during the past two years, at least, with a distinct feeling of depression, and the difficulties of Trade have been very serious to the foreign merchants. By analysing the figures for the past three years of the principal articles of Import, the tendency of trade may be better observed and the reasons discovered for the position pointed out above.

The following figures show that the general improvement in living which has taken place since the China-Japan War has led to a steady growth in the import of Food Stuffs. The deficient Rice harvest of 1897 accounts for a large proportion of the increase, but by no means for all of it.

IMPORT OF FOOD STUFFS.

	1896. Yen.	1897. Yen.	1896. Yen.	1897. Yen.

	85,264,066	49,201,662	24,374,211	24,645,800

The spirit of enterprise brought about by the result of the war with China reached its climax in 1896, and many undertakings commenced in that and previous years have been in progress during 1897-1898. This accounts for the comparatively large imports of Machinery and Railway Material in 1898, and even the larger ones of 1897; but the reduction during the past year is significant, and the falling off of private undertakings is even more marked than the figures would show, because Government purchases have not suffered any restriction.

	17,069,081	24,139,786	10,613,031	1,898,318

This decline in the way of industrial enterprise is to some extent reflected in the smaller ratio of increase in imports of materials for manufacture. The Cotton Spinning industry no longer advances by leaps and bounds, and if there had not been a very good demand from China for Japanese yarns, the figures would show this more clearly.

The largely increased imports of Dye Stuffs is an interesting feature of this year's trade, and the continued progress of the Match trade is shown by the imports of Phosphorus, Wax, and Potash.

The import of Cotton Yarn in the foregoing tables shows a diminution, and while the following table exhibits an increase in the import of Textiles (this may reasonably be attributed to imports in anticipation of the New Tariff. Compared with 1896, there is a great falling off, and the figures for the three years seem to show that the tendency is for Japan to supply her own needs in the way of Textiles, a tendency which will be fostered by the New Tariff. The serious decline in this branch is reasonable evidence of the difficulties experienced by traders during the past two seasons.

One of the principal features of the following table is the steady growth of the merchant marine of Japan by the purchase of high-class vessels, but these additions are the result of contracts given in times of prosperity, and it is not likely that the immediate future will see any further purchases of similar extent.

The largely increased imports of Alcohol, Wines, Tobacco, and Watches may be attributed to the prosperity of the masses.

From this general review it is evident that the increased trade of 1897-1898 is largely due to the wave of progress and expansion which passed over the country in 1895-1896, and that the impulse thus given to imports has continued during 1897 and 1898, although actual progress during these latter years had largely ceased.

The capitalists were the first to experience the result of the depression. The lower classes continue prosperous, as a result of work still on hand and probably also of the continued heavy expenditure by Government, which now averages about 240,000,000 yen per annum, against about 80,000,000 yen in 1894. But even the working people are beginning to realise that times are altered, and it seems not improbable that 1899 will show a diminished Foreign Trade in Imports.

The "liquidating" process of the past two years has not, however, been without its advantages. It is probable that if the period of financial development had continued the labour question would have become a very serious one for employers. As it is, there has been a pause in the upward tendency of wages, and, on the other hand, an increase both in cost and in the standard of living, and as a consequence, the labourer is coming more within control than was the case when a day's earnings were so largely in excess of actual needs. Further, the people have been able to take stock of their achievements, and it seems likely that the lessons gained will sooner or later result in further progress of a less spasmodic nature and based upon sounder principles.

The items mentioned in the above table account for about 90 per cent. of the import trade, and the figures have been taken from monthly and annual returns of the foreign trade of the Empire, as compiled by the Department of Finance.

The Cotton Spinning Industry in Japan does not seem to have done well of late, as the following information from reliable native sources shows. The returns for the latter half of the year give a very poor result. The mills at work in the second half of 1897 returned an average nominal profit per spindle of yen 1.23; in the latter half of 1898, some of these mills only earned a profit averaging less than 2 yen per spindle, and the remainder made a loss of 2½ yen per spindle, so that the outcome is a net loss per spindle of about 50 sen.

Proceeding to recapitulate, we come first to the returns giving the paid up capital and reserve, and here the record is sufficiently disheartening:—

	2nd half 1898. Yen.	2nd half 1897. Yen.
Paid up	21,695,357	21,167,791
Aggregate reserve up to the end of the previous half-year	4,795,005	5,585,366
Reserves for the half-year	210,850	251,875
Total	26,701,212	27,005,032

Now, during the last half-year some of the spinning mills set apart rather larger sums, comparatively, as a result of their having procured loans from the Industrial Bank. Even in spite of that, the aggregate reserves were cut into by about 800,000 yen, while, compared with the previous year's reserves, the corresponding sum for the last half-year was more than 45,000 yen less. All these facts are significant. Under the circumstances, the average rate of dividend declared for the last half-year was the poorest on record.

At the same time the exports during the half-year under review were far more satisfactory than those of the corresponding period of the previous year:—

	Quantity Exported. Cottias.	Value. Yen.
Latter half of 1898	39,053,290	12,547,736
Latter half of 1897	27,194,970	8,868,020

One of the principal causes that have brought about the discouraging result in the financial situation of the mills, in spite of such marked activity in export, is doubtless to be found in the extraordinary rise in the cost of production, as shown below:—

	2nd Half- year. 1897. Yen.	2nd Half- year. 1898. Yen.
Coal (per 10,000 catties)	30.040	27.460
Average daily wages } male2817	.2601

The item of coal decreased by 8½ per cent., but that of wages increased by 13 per cent., on the average. It is true the market of raw cotton fell by about 10 per cent., but to counteract this the market for yarns fell by as much as 20 per cent., another potent factor that worked disastrously on the business of the mills.

Altogether, it would seem that the spinning companies have been too prodigal of their resources during the few years they have been working. Running the machinery night and day without providing sufficient for a repaying fund; distributing their earnings too lavishly without thought or provision for a rainy day; and other actions of the same kind bring them into trouble when bad markets or other causes reduce their earning power.

COTTON YARNS.—The year 1898 must be recorded as a most disappointing one to all engaged in the Trade, the proximate cause being undoubtedly a belief—shared alike by Japanese and Foreign merchants, on what were considered good grounds—that the Revised Tariffs would come into operation not later than the 1st October. This belief led to an enormous amount of speculative buying from the middle of January until well on in March, the business done during that period exceeding all previous records within a similar limit of time, and Japanese dealers, when the excitement subsided, finding themselves committed to engagements that only exceptional trade conditions could possibly enable them to fulfil. These conditions, as said, before, did not exist. With definite knowledge of the postponement of the enforcement of the new Tariff came the inevitable reaction, and unfortunately Manchester values, under the influence of increasing estimates of the American cotton crop, and deprived of all support from Japan, began to fall, making the position a serious one. Contract Yarns kept arriving freely, and stocks accumulated to an alarming extent without the slightest attempt at clearance being made by dealers, until at length things came to such a pass that in self-defence a number of the principal importers were compelled to make a combined effort, which fortunately proved successful, to enforce the payment of interest and holding expenses on all Yarns increased after a certain period. This was timely, and, whether the result of this combination or not, the tact remains that from July to November deliveries showed a marked improvement. Unfortunately this arrangement was only for Yarns, and the Trade in Textile Fancy Goods remains in the former unsatisfactory condition. During September also a very considerable amount of fresh business was done for arrival before the end of the year, consequent upon the official notification that the new Duties would come into force on 1st January 1899. December was, however, another very dull month, and the year closed with a depressed market and a lack of confidence as regards the future in both Foreign and Japanese business circles.

GASSED YARNS continue to represent the bulk of the business in imported Yarns, being as yet comparatively free from the competition of Japanese mills, and they will doubtless maintain their position for some years to come, for, thus far, the attempts to produce this article in the Japanese mills have been more or less a failure—neither the quality nor the amount of production having been satisfactory.

2/4's and 3/2's, on the other hand, besides being specially overdone during the speculative movement already alluded to, are now largely produced in this country and of a quality good enough to compete with all but the very best imported spinnings. The outlook, therefore, for 2/4's and 3/2's is far from encouraging. 28/32, from the same cause, have almost been driven off the market, whilst in 16/24 only certain kinds are now wanted and only in decreasing quantities.

The comparative total Import figures, in piculs, are as follows:—

	1898.	1897.	1896.	1895.

and if these figures show an increase on the previous years' importations the explanation undoubtedly is that shipments were pushed forward in come in under the old duties, and from the commencement of this year we shall see a great reduction in imports.

GRAY SHIRTINGS have moved pretty much in the same groove as Cotton Yarns, namely, a large speculative business from January to March and practically none whatever afterwards, the result being long delayed clearances of contract goods and heavy stocks carried forward. Demand continues to increase for long-length goods, 46/48 yards, and to decrease proportionately for the ordinary 9 lbs. 38½ yards, whilst only a very limited quantity of 8½ lbs., chiefly of the better makes, is now imported.

The comparative total Import figures, in picers, are as follows:—

	1898.	1897.	1896.	1895.
	852,639	700,300	804,900	604,295

T. CLOTHS would appear to have been imported to about the same extent as in 1897. Nevertheless, trade is undoubtedly dwindling in the face of native competition, and will eventually be lost to Lancashire.

INDIGO SHIRTINGS—Imports are considerably in excess of the previous year, but deliveries have kept pace with the arrivals, and stocks show a slight reduction. It is only the best qualities that continue saleable.

DYED SHIRTINGS AND TWILLS—Deliveries less than previous year.

COTTON BROCADES AND SILKES appear to be going entirely out of fashion.

COTTON PRINTS—Consumption of these appears to be increasing. Imports last year were very heavy, viz.: 216,180 pcs., but the deliveries almost balance these figures, and are 45,591 in excess of the average deliveries of the past six years. Stocks are rather heavier than they were last year, say, sufficient for 3 to 6 months' normal requirements.

COTTON ITALIANS AND SATENS—Deliveries under the average for the preceding six years and stocks carried over very heavy.

TURKEY REDS—Trade in these has again been disappointing after the revival shown last year. Deliveries dragged all through the year, and much of the business reported in 1897 was not closed up until well on into 1898. Although the imports are 16,600 pcs. less than in 1897 the stocks carried over are very heavy.

BLACK VELVETS—A larger business has been transacted in these, but owing to increased imports a large stock of common qualities has to be carried over. Prospects for these, however, look favourable owing to the large increase in the Import Tariff and substantial advance in cost of manufacture and dyeing. Deliveries exceed the average of the preceding six years by 6,853 pcs.

VICTORIA LAUNES—Business continues to be done in these and deliveries are in excess of the 1897 figures.

FLANNELS—Trade in these was of larger dimensions than shown by 1897. A fair business in Printed Cotton Flannels was put through last year.

BLACK ITALIANS—Business has been disappointing, the deliveries being about 30,000 pcs. less than the average for the preceding six years. Although the imports are less by 20,000 pcs. than in 1897, yet the stock carried forward shows an increase of 4,000 pcs. The cheaper qualities have been difficult to move, and their place in the consuming markets is being taken by the superior qualities of Cotton Italians.

MOUSSELINES—Imports have been considerably in excess of requirements, no doubt principally in expectation of the new Tariff. The native spinning and weaving establishment, to which reference was made in last year's report, in the meantime has commenced working. So far as appearances go, they are meeting with greater difficulties than they were prepared for, but in course of time they will no doubt cut largely into the foreign trade in this staple.

BLANKETS—The ordinary scarlets are being rapidly displaced by coloured striped rugs.

METALS—BAR IRON—Very large contracts were made for arrival in the first six or eight months of the year, dealers having been very confident that the new tariff would come into operation from July, or at latest, September. This anticipation was not fulfilled, and so excessive were the supplies that not only was there much trouble in handling the arrivals but it was a serious difficulty to find storage accommodation. Judging from appearances at the close of the year, it will be a long time before the stocks in native hands will be reduced to their normal dimensions. The situation has been much relieved by a diminution of imports in the closing months of the year and by a rapid rise in prices in sympathy with increased cost in Europe.

PIG IRON—The imports have again increased, but supplies have been in excess during the last nine months of the year, and large quantities have to be carried over to 1899. Latterly prices have been affected by the sale of some thousands of tons of condemned water pipes manufactured by the now defunct Tokyo Cast Iron Company.

PLATE & SHEET IRON—The decrease in this branch noticed in 1897 still continues, but it is probable that the high prices which have been ruling in England for Ship or Boiler Plates have checked the demand.

GALVANIZED IRON—Imports are about the same as last year. This market could probably have taken a larger quantity, as the demand for its use for building purposes is growing, but imports have been deterred by the difficulty in dealing with corrosion, and until makers can provide some way of preventing this damage or dealers become more lenient in their claims, the business will remain unprofitable.

WIRE NAILS shows a further decrease; the imports are now mainly from America, and the larger sizes are being supplied by the Tokyo factory, which is not, however, a financial success.

TIN PLATES—The excessive supplies brought over from 1897 are reflected in the smaller imports for 1898, only 26,920 boxes having arrived against 56,000 boxes in the previous year.

KEROSENE OIL—During the period under review, the market has shown a gradual advance and the tendency has been upwards, an advance of 20 to 23 sen per case being established. Closing prices were as follow:—

American Oil-Chester.....	2.25 per case.
Russian Oil Anchor Brand ...	2.20 "
Russian Tank Oil in bulk	1.70 per unit.

Arrivals of all descriptions were 3,020,991 cases, or an increase of 143,472 cases on the previous year.

Deliveries were as follow:—

American.....	1,558,813
Russian	1,104,681
Langkat	132,125

AMERICAN OIL shows a decrease of 74,504 cases, and Russian an increase of 39,951 cases over the previous year.

LANGKAT is a new description, but ceased to arrive towards the end of the year, owing, it is stated, to a falling off in supplies at Langkat.

The production of Japanese Oil in the Echigo District continues to increase, but is not of sufficient importance to seriously interfere with the sale of the imported article, as the output is estimated at only 600,000 cases per annum.

SUGAR—BROWN—The receipts for the year were: from Formosa, 319,635 picls.; China, 258,499 picls.; Manila, 701,766 picls.

The import from Formosa, and, to a large extent, from the Philippines, has fallen into the hands of Chinese and Japanese, so that the business ceases to have much interest for other Foreign residents.

WHITE REFINED KINDS—The trade in this article showed further marked expansion, the importation being stimulated to a very large extent by the pressure towards the end of the year to get the Sugars in before the operation of the new Duties. The increase from Hongkong in this way was considerable and on German Beet Sugar very marked, the import of the latter showing an advance of no less than 125,000 piculs on that of 1897. Prices also ruled high almost throughout the year.

While refined Sugars have also come from Vancouver to the extent of 10,500 piculs, and from Glasgow to 7,140 piculs.

The traffic receipts for the fiscal year ended March, 1898, amounted to yen 9,727,489, and the expenditure to yen 4,786,048, leaving a balance as profit of yen 4,941,441.

These figures compared with the previous year show an increase of yen 1,453,847, or 17.6 per cent.

Of the Private Companies reliable information is not obtainable for the purposes of this report.

EXCHANGE opened on 1st Jan., 1898, with T.T. at 2.04, and 4 months Credits at 2.04. The fluctuations were very small until December, and then the maximum rates were T.T. 2.04, and 4 months Credits 2.12, so a half-penny may be said to be the entire extent of the fluctuation during the year.

Owing to the failure of the previous year's Rice Crop, large imports of Rice took place, and consequently money became plentiful, and, rates admitting of Gold shipments, large quantities of the metal were shipped away to America and Europe. This ceased, however, in great part at the end of May, and from then on a firmer feeling was apparent in the Exchange market.

During the Autumn a large Silk business was done, which gave full use to money, and in fact caused it to be very tight at the end of the year.

It may be pointed out that the result of the Rice crop has the greatest effect on the economic position in Japan, and the money market will be always to a great extent guided by this.

The REVISED TREATIES come into force in a few months' time, and your Committee has had under its consideration the many changes that thus surround the Foreign Community, and decided that steps ought to be taken to ascertain the status of Foreign Residents under Japanese Laws. They would have preferred to call a public meeting and thus learn the views and wishes of the whole community, but it was felt that under existing circumstances it was better not to do so. They considered that the Committee of this Chamber of Commerce is a representative body, elected by the Foreign Community, and that it was empowered under the circumstances to nominate a sub-committee, to specially study this question. With this object in view the International Committee was formed, comprising one representative of each of the nationalities in the Chamber of Commerce, with power to add to their number.

By them it had to be admitted that, as the Treaties with the various Powers were practically settled, Foreigners were bound to come under Japanese jurisdiction within a comparatively short time.

Accepting, therefore, accomplished facts, it was decided to ascertain the status of Foreigners under Japanese Laws; to watch their interests; to consider those points which appear to be detrimental to them; to endeavour to obtain by constitutional means amendment of those laws which appear to require it, and especially to furnish to Foreign Residents information as to the New Codes in a form that can be better understood than by a bare translation in strictly legal phraseology. With this object in view they sought the assistance of Professor Lönholm, who, having been engaged in assisting to form the Codes, seemed to be specially suited to explain them, and they also consulted Dr. Hatoyama Kazuo, the ex-President of the House of Representatives and a man of high standing in the legal profession of Japan. To them the Committee submitted certain leading questions, as SANCTITY OF DOMICILE, ARREST OF GUILTY OR SUSPECTED PERSONS, DETENTION UNDER SUSPICION, RIGHT TO OBTAIN BAIL, TENURE OF LAND, &c. To these questions Dr. Hatoyama gave his written replies which have been printed and circulated among the supporters of the International Committee, but Professor Lönholm suggested that what was really required was a Digest of the Codes, pointing out those laws which interested Foreigners, and the Committee, agreeing with him, accepted his offer, and published for the International Committee a Digest of the Codes. The work was completed rather more hurriedly than the Committee had expected, as Professor Lönholm was suddenly called away to Europe, but he volunteered that he intended to complete it by a supplement with all the New Laws and by answering any questions that might be put to him by the International Committee or their supporters. This supplement will not appear for some weeks, as the Law that have passed the Diet have not yet obtained the Imperial sanction, but when completed it will be found to contain a great deal of valuable information that no Foreign Resident should be without.

The International Committee then took up the question of JAPANESE PRISONS, and visited three of those in Tokyo, reports on which were circulated, and the Committee have the satisfaction of knowing that their suggestions and recommendations were attended to, and that Prison Reform is having the serious attention of the Japanese Government. Since then their efforts have been given to obtaining useful information for their fellow-residents, and the result of these efforts is before the Community in the form of printed circulars. In certain directions they have the satisfaction of seeing that their work has been crowned with success, and they have at any rate the satisfaction of establishing the assurance that among the Japan official classes there is a strong desire to make the working of the Revised Treaties as smooth and easy as possible for Foreign Residents. The Committee have been invited to come to the Foreign Office direct with any difficulties that presented themselves, and they have cordially to acknowledge the great courtesy with which they have always been treated by the officials of that Department of State.

In the case of the Business Tax, the representations of the Committee resulted in the rectification of the law which dealt hardly with the Foreign Insurance Offices, and in several other matters information and assistance have been obtained by them of the greatest value.

It now remains for the Community to decide if the work of the International Committee has served a useful purpose, and if it is desirable to continue it by electing a new Committee who will now be able to learn from the Residents what their views and wishes are.

YOKOHAMA GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

MEMORANDUM RE ARBITRATION.

Yokohama, March 24th, 1899.
In drawing up suggestions for Arbitration, the greatest difficulty has been to adopt some scheme whereby the final reference to a single umpire may be lessened, if not altogether done away with, and another great object has been to do away with personal feeling in the matter, which is so apt to attach to simple arbitration by two parties, one chosen by each of the disputants. Experience of foreigners has been that their Japanese friends, to whom any dispute may have been referred, do not appreciate the main point of an arbitration, say to arrive at a fair and equitable decision on the merits of the case, but rather appear to look on arbitration as if each arbiter held a brief for the litigant by whom he was appointed, and that it is their duty to do the best they can for their side of the case. Arbitration thus becomes litigation, the only difference being that the dispute is between the arbiters instead of the parties themselves.

The present suggestion places the matter in the hands of an Arbitration Committee or Joint Committee (the actual number not stated, but may be arranged according to the importance or merits of each particular case), who appoint Arbiters, which Arbiters report to them, and the final decision rests with the Committee, the award being issued by the Chamber of Commerce, so as to eliminate all names of either the Arbiters or of the Arbitration Committee. An Umpire is permitted under the 13th Clause, but only in the event of the votes of the Arbitration Committee being equal, and it is a question whether even this is advisable, and whether it would not be more likely to induce the Committee to come to some decision, if this possible reference to an Umpire were omitted.

The Committee desires to circulate these proposed forms for Arbitration and form of Contract for the Import Trade, hoping that the members of the Chamber of Commerce will kindly give these subjects their consideration prior to the General Meeting on the 29th inst.

R. D. ROBISON, Chairman.

ARBITRATION.

1.—The Chambers of Commerce of Yokohama (Japanese and Foreign) shall organize Arbitration Committees consisting of 10 members of each Chamber, to whom references for Arbitration may be made.

2.—For disputes between Japanese, the Japanese Chamber of Commerce shall act, and between Foreigners the Foreign Chamber of Commerce, shall act.

3.—For disputes between Foreigners and Japanese, a joint Committee, consisting of an equal number from the Arbitration Committee of each Chamber shall act.

4.—Applications for arbitration shall be made on the Chamber's authorized form, stating the points of dispute, agreeing to submit to the rules of the Chamber in the matter of the Arbitration and to their award.

5.—Applications must be accompanied by a Deposit of yen 50 from each party, and a guarantee to lodge such further amount as the Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, may consider necessary, before proceeding with the Arbitration, not exceeding the amount in dispute together with the estimated amount of expenses.

6.—The Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, may accept guarantee from a Bank in lieu of cash called for under Clause V., in whole or in part.

7.—If cash is called for under Clause V., same to be lodged in a Bank in the name of the Chamber of Commerce or joint names of the Chambers of Commerce interested.

8.—The Committee, or joint Committee, shall appoint such of their or other Members of their Chamber of Commerce, as they deem fit, hereafter called the Arbiters, to examine and report to them as to the matter in dispute, it being agreed that, if Foreigners and Japanese are interested, an equal number of Foreign and Japanese Arbiters shall be appointed.

9.—The Arbiters may hear the parties interested, examine goods &/or samples, receive documentary evidence, and examine witnesses or experts.

10.—If legal points are involved, the Committee themselves, or through their Arbiters or Representatives specially authorized in writing for that purpose, may take such legal opinion on the points of law involved as they may consider necessary.

11.—The Arbiters shall submit their decision, if a joint decision be agreed on, to the Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, and same shall be accepted as final.

12.—If the Arbiters cannot jointly agree on a decision, they shall submit their several opinions to the Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, who shall consider them carefully and arrive at a decision by votes of the majority of their number, which decision shall be accepted as final.

13.—In event of the votes being equal, the Arbitration must fall through, unless the Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, agree to appoint an Umpire whose decision shall be final.

14.—The Fees and other necessary expenses incidental to the Arbitration shall be defrayed by the parties interested, in such proportion and to such amount as the Arbitration Committee, or Joint Committee, may determine.

15.—The award shall be issued in duplicate over the seal of the Chamber or Chambers of Commerce interested, and signed by the Chairman and Secretary, and copies served on the parties to the Arbitration, the original, together with the documents of service, to be retained by the Chamber of Commerce of the parties benefitting under the award, and the duplicate by the other Chamber of Commerce interested, and shall be produced in such Courts of Law as may be required.

16.—The award once issued shall have the effect of a final and conclusive judgment relating to the dispute in question, and shall not be subject to any appeal to any Court of Law or any person, persons, or Guild whatsoever.

FORM OF CONTRACT.

Contract made between hereinafter called the Sellers, and both jointly and separately, hereinafter called the Purchasers.

The terms of this Contract are equally binding on all signing it, both jointly and separately, whether their names are specially mentioned herein or not.

1.—The Purchaser hereby agrees to buy from the Sellers the Goods as per particulars at foot, and on the following terms:—

2.—If Shipment date is specified, the date of the B/Lading is to be accepted as conclusive proof of date of Shipment.

3.—If arrival date is specified, the date of the arrival of the Vessel in Yokohama is to be accepted, but over-cargo &/or miscarriage to be at Buyer's risk, subject to any claim recoverable from the Ship.

4.—Should the Goods be late the Buyers have the option of cancelling on giving immediate notice to the Sellers, and, should part only be late, this option only extends to the part late, and the Buyers agree to take delivery of all that fulfils the shipment or arrival date specified.

5.—The Sellers are in no way responsible for any delay in shipment or arrival, if caused by circumstances beyond their control, including strikes, break-down of manufacturers' machinery, or accident to the Vessel carrying the Goods, and in event of delays from such causes the Buyer agrees to extend date of Shipment or arrival as may be necessary.

6.—The Buyers bind themselves to take delivery by the time stipulated, or to pay Customary Storage expenses and also interest. Said interest to be at the rate of 2½ sen per 100 yen per day, and this liability shall not be disputed by the Buyers. It is further agreed that, if the delay exceeds 60 days, this Contract is at the option of the Sellers, who may resell the Goods, and in that case the Buyers shall reimburse the Sellers for all short proceeds, charges, and interest at the rate as above stipulated.

7.—Should the Goods on arrival prove to be somewhat different from sample (although not to such an extent as to alter their character), it is hereby mutually agreed that they shall be accepted under this Contract on a reduction in the price being made to the extent of the difference in the Market value on the day of arrival between the Goods as received and the Sample.

8.—The Goods shall be inspected by the Buyer within 15 days after they have passed the Customs, and no claim for any alleged difference in quality or other fault will be allowed after the lapse of these 15 days or after delivery has been taken, from which times all faults are at Buyers' risk.

9.—It is distinctly understood that Sellers are not responsible for condition of Goods if stored beyond the time stipulated for final delivery.

10.—Duty on this contract is calculated as per memo, at foot, and any difference between this and the Duty paid, whether arising from alteration in the rate of Duty or a different classification by the Custom House Officers, is to be for Buyers' account, either "for" or "against."

11.—For Contracts made in foreign currency the conversion to Gold yen to be made at the rate for Bank demand Bills of the day on which the Buyer takes final delivery as per Contract, unless otherwise arranged. If delivery be delayed the rate of Exchange to be calculated at the rate of the day on which delivery was due, or of the day of final delivery at Seller's option.

12.—The Buyers, in affixing their Seal hereto, hereby agree to all the conditions of this Contract.

13.—The Sellers hereby agree to all the conditions of this Contract, provided it bears the signature of their Firm or their Manager, or his duly authorised substitute.

If an Arbitration Clause is advisable, it is suggested:—

In the event of any dispute under this Contract, either party to it may claim an Arbitration through the Chamber of Commerce to which he belongs, to be arranged through the Chamber of Commerce in which the other party belongs, and both Buyers and Sellers hereby agree to the decision of such Arbitration.

THE LEOPOLD BANKRUPTCY.

RESUMED EXAMINATION.

The examination of Charles Emil Leopold, a bankrupt, now undergoing imprisonment in H.M.'s gaol at Yokohama, was resumed on Friday morning before His Honour Judge Wilkinson. Counsel appeared as before, Mr. Lowder for the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, and Ahrens & Co.; Mr. A. B. Walford for the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation; and Professor Terry, of Tokyo, for the debtor.

Mr. Lowder said there were one or two more points on which he should like to examine the debtor.

Mr. Lowder—In the particulars of securities sent by you to the Chartered Bank on the 31st April there are two items of 400 tons of coal valued at 3,400 yen. Can you tell me what has become of that coal?—I don't know. Nakajimeya will tell you what has become of it. If you refer to Uyeda he will know.

Do you know nothing about it?—Except through speaking to him about it at the time of making up my list of assets. It was unencumbered at the time, and should be now. It should be available for my creditors. Payment for the coal is included in that list of cheques I handed in.

This coal is not scheduled as an asset?—No, it is not in my possession now—Japanese possession.

Do you mean to imply that there is anything unlawful in the possession of this coal on your behalf by Uyeda?—Not that I am aware of.

I asked you the other day whether the lease of Lot 125 Settlement had been sold to the Laundry Company for 3,500 yen, and you told me that it had?—No, I did not.

At Mr. Lowder's request the official notes were referred to. They showed that debtor stated "I sold the lease of Lot 125 to the Laundry Company for 3,500 yen."

Debtor—I did not say that. I specially mentioned that I sold it to Mrs. Langfeldt.

And you wish to correct that now?—Yes.

A note was taken of the point.

I asked you what became of it, and you said that some was used in paying lawyers' fees, for trips to the north, and some for paying interest, you thought?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—Mrs. Langfeldt is the wife of August Langfeldt, is she not?—Yes.

And August Langfeldt holds from you a lease of Lot 125, Settlement, for 12 years from September 1st, 1897?—Yes.

You held a lease of the same property from Mr. Lindau for 30 years from Oct. 1st, 1897, did you not?—Yes.

Where is it now?—I don't know. It may have been left in my office.

Where was it kept?—It was usually kept in my deed box. I haven't got it, because I searched for it when that other lease was made out.

Do you recollect when you last saw it?—No. It may be in the possession of Ahrens & Co. I don't know.

Why do you say that?—They took some documents away on the day I arrived in the hospital. But I am not certain.

Have you asked Ahrens and Co. for that document, or whether it is in their possession?—I believe I did ask them once, but I did not get it.

Whom did you ask, and state the exact answer you got?—I don't recollect, probably I wrote to them.

You must have a recollection?—There were so many things at that time that I cannot remember. I think they took it with them at the time I was in the hospital.

Who?—Wisner.

Have you asked Mr. Wisner for it back?—Yes.

When?—Oh, I can't remember. Probably last May or last June.

At the first meeting of creditors you were examined with regard to what property you had, and you said you could not say beyond certain leases and a life insurance policy in favour of Ishi Riye that the settlements on Ishi Riye were made for value received, and that you were unable to produce any copy of the originals, and that they were in the possession of Ishi Riye?—Yes, but that referred to 98 and 100 Bluff, and I think to a copy of what Mr. Lowder has in his hand—a duplicate. I think so, but I am not certain.

And not to No. 125?—No.

Then when you wished to make this sub-lease did you not make application to Mr. Wisner for the original lease?—No.

Now have you charged that lease in any way except to August Langfeldt?—Yes, to Ishi Riye, 98 and 100 Bluff being almost valueless at present.

Where is the document charging this lease in favour of Ishi Riye?—I have made out no documents. I gave her the leases of 98 and 100 in her possession; further leases I have not made out.

Then there is nothing but what you tell me now to verify the fact that Lot 125 is charged in favour of Ishi Riye?—Nothing in writing.

The lease itself is for 30 years from 1st October, 1897, is it not?—Yes.

At a rent of 105 yen per month?—Yes.

The lease itself is not in your possession, and you don't know where it is?—No.

A term of the lease is that it may not be assigned without permission of Lindau, the lessor, is it not?—Yes.

Has his permission been obtained for assigning it to Ishi Riye?—No, she being a Japanese subject, I did not ask.

You wish me to infer that you did not consider it necessary because she was a Japanese?—I don't think she could hold it till the coming July, and therefore I didn't trouble about getting his permission.

When did you assign it to her?—I think it was about July. The date can be traced by the time Ishi Riye insured 98 and 100 Bluff.

You are quite certain it was not later?—I don't think so. The policies of insurance will show that (After reference to a document). The 6th August.

Mr. Lowder read the document, which was merely an application for the insurance of 98 and 100 Bluff.

There is no reference to No. 125 there?—No, I had torn all the buildings down; there was nothing on the plot. It was not transferred later than that.

The policies of insurance—did you procure them and hand them to Ishi Riye?—Yes. She paid the premiums.

Now, did you not at the same date give her the lease for 30 years from October, 1897?—No, it was not then in my possession.

Now, how do you make out that she, being a Japanese, could hold property on the Bluff and not on the Settlement?—I referred to both the Bluff and the Settlement.

But the leases of the lots on the Bluff, I understand you to say, are in her possession?—Yes.

And yet it was not necessary to get the permission of the lessor of Lot 125 because she could not hold it?—I was under the impression at the time that she could not hold it.

Did she ask you for an assignment of the lease of this property?—I really don't recollect what conversation we had on the subject. She did say something about making the documents out in order, so that we should have no bother on the subject, but I don't recollect anything more.

Then at all events, as far back as August last, so far as it was in your power, you had assigned this lease to Ishi Riye for her own?—Yes.

You couldn't touch it then?—No.

And three months afterwards, in November, 1898, you granted A. Langfeldt a sub-lease of the same property for 12 years from the 1st Sept., 1898?—Yes.

At an advanced rent of yen 200 per month?—Yes.

So that there was a profit of 95 yen per month for 12 years?—Yes.

And that was what you meant when you said the lease was of the value of some 13,000 yen?—Yes.

And that is the lease you allege that you sold to Mrs. Langfeldt for 3,500 yen?—That I sold; not that I allege I sold.

And you say that was the best you could obtain for it?—Yes.

And you refer to that in illustration of the manner in which all your securities were depreciated?—Yes.

Now what was it that you sold to Mrs. Langfeldt?—That lease that you've got in your hand.

Did you endeavour to sell it to any one else, and if so to whom?—Yes, I tried to sell it through Eyton and Pratt. There was a buyer, I don't know who—but after consulting their lawyer they would not buy. I tried Mr. Johnstone, too.

This that I hold in my hand, look at it again, please. It is a sub-lease for 12 years of 125 Settlement from you to August Langfeldt. Therefore he already held the sub-lease, and I don't understand how you could sell it?—I could sell it. He was paying me every month 200 yen. He had the sub-lease from me.

Mr. Lowder—Here is the lease, and this note:—"In consideration of the sum of 3,500 yen paid to me by Mrs. A. Langfeldt I hereby transfer to her the within-mentioned lease of 125 Settlement, Yokohama, for the unexpired term of twelve years." This is dated December 5th, 1898?—Yes. It was written by Mr. Lloyd at the request of Mr. Langfeldt and signed by me.

And approved by the attorney for the lessor, Mr. Lindau?—Yes.

Now it appears to me that August Langfeldt held the sub-lease. Now how can you assign a lease that you had already granted to him?—I was paying 105 yen a month rent for the lot, and was getting 200 yen a month, and for 3,500 yen I made it over to him, and Mrs. Langfeldt would collect the rents from him. I practically sold the profits of the lease.

Mr. Lowder—Oh (continuing)—This transaction took place on December 5th, 1898. That was the day before your trial commenced?—Yes.

Now where did this transaction take place?—In my house.

And who were present?—Myself, Mr. Langfeldt, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Kildoye. There might have been some Japanese there too.

Mrs. Langfeldt was not present?—No.

Had there been any negotiation with Mrs. Langfeldt prior to 5th December?—Yes, through Mr. Langfeldt.

You did not see Mrs. Langfeldt at all?—No.

And how long had these negotiations been going on?—I don't recollect exactly. Probably a fortnight or three weeks.

And did you tell Mr. Langfeldt or Mrs. Langfeldt that the lease was already vested in the name of the Japanese woman Ishi Riye?—I don't recollect it. I may have.

Her consent was not obtained?—Probably I told her I had let it. Yes, certainly I did.

There is no mention here?—No, not in writing.

And did you also tell her that you had appropriated the proceeds, 3,500 yen, to your own use?—Yes; she knew the reason I was selling it.

So that Mrs. Langfeldt purchased property for 3,500 yen which you estimated to be of the value of 13,000 yen?—That would have brought in 13,000 yen ultimately. It has to be capitalised, you must remember.

You yourself estimated it at 13,000 yen?—Yes, that would be the profit in 12 years.

What do you estimate the value of the lease will be after this term of 12 years is cut out of it?—I don't know. It would be impossible to estimate it.

When was this sum of 3,500 yen paid to you?—On the date of the transfer, as far as I recollect.

Who paid it to you?—Mr. Langfeldt.

Was it paid by cheque or in cash?—Some cheque and some cash, I believe.

Have you got any note in any book you can show me to indicate when that money was paid, and how it was paid?—No.

Have you got any entry in any book to show me what you did with that money?—No.

What makes you think part was paid in cash and part in cheques?—I recollect there was cash. I don't remember how much in cash and how much in cheques.

On what bank or banks were the cheques or cheques drawn?—I don't recollect.

To whom did you give the cheques, and how were they cashed?—I sent some one out for the cash. Whom I don't know. I was so confused that day that I don't recollect all these small details.

Did you give a receipt for the money?—No, nothing beyond that endorsement.

By whom was this 3,500 yen handed you?—Mr. Langfeldt.

Now you received this 3,500 yen on the 5th December, and on the 6th your trial commenced. Did you dispose of it before your trial commenced?—Yes.

Then you paid it away on the 5th December?—Yes.

Can you tell me to whom you paid it?—I can't tell you exact details. Some I sent up to my lawyer, and some was paid for a trip to the north.

Who paid it?—I did myself. Mr. Lloyd might have paid some. There were a lot of bills paid that day, and who paid them I don't know exactly now.

You can point to no entry in any book or paper pointing to the receipt or disbursement of that money?—No. I never had an opportunity after my trial.

You spoke just now about a laundry company. Are you interested in that laundry?—No.

Never been?—Never.

Are you interested in the Oriental Hotel?—No.

Never been?—No.

Mr. Lowder—I am unable, your Honour, to hand this sub-lease into Court, but I ask that a certified copy of the endorsement may be taken. Those are all the questions I have to put.

His Honour—Do you wish to examine, Mr. Walford?

Mr. Walford—No.

His Honour—Does any one else wish to put questions to the debtor?

The Official Receiver (Mr. C. D. Moss)—I have some questions I should like to ask. (To Debtor). Are the answers you give to questions No. 1 to 50 and signed by you before the first meeting of creditors true?—Yes.

And you do not wish to amend them?—No. Lot 125 you valued at 13,000 yen odd. How do you arrive at that?—By the profits for the twelve years.

But that is only just over 13,000 yen itself? Do you think anybody would pay 13,000 yen cash down for that?—No, I expected about 5,500 yen.

After the twelve years have expired who will come into possession?—Ishi Riye.

On what title?—I have nothing beyond what I have told the Court.

Why should it not come into the possession of the Official Receiver?—Well, she has advanced me moneys, and I have given that as security.

No. 98 and 100 Bluff, who were the sub-tenants?—Capt. Ekstrand and Capt. Carst. I do not know if they are still there.

On what tenancy do they hold possession?—They are monthly tenants.

I see you purchased two dozen clocks from Ahrens and Co?—I never received the clocks. I believe they were clocks for H. Ahrens and Co. for their own godowns.

Can you explain the discrepancy between 65,997 yen which you are charged with on the Phoenix Saw Mills account and 30,000 yen with which you are credited?—It is apparently what they have paid to Respe and Co. I understand it has been 15,000 yen indemnity on kerosene boxes. I only authorised 10,000 yen.

Can you give me the names of your clerks and other employees since March, 1898?—Uyeda Yoshizo was in my employ, and Hoshino Torakichi, Yoshiwara Ginzaburo, and young Yoshiwara, and Mr. Lloyd. They were in my actual employ. Tada Ginzaburo was entrusted by me with property. In Kanazawa my agent was Kana Tokinawa; in Niigata or Aomori, Kondo or Wakabayashi; Hakodate, Tada Takakichi; at the mine Takahara.

Did you ever do business on your account in the names of either?—Yes. In the names of all of them more or less.

Did you send or receive bank drafts in their names on your account?—Those two lists of cheques that I gave you will show.

Is the house at the corner of Minato-cho yours or in your control?—No.

Has it ever been?—No. My family moved there since I have been in prison. The owner of the lease of the ground is Takashima, and the house belongs to Wakao.

Has anyone any deeds or securities of yours that have not been mentioned at this examination?—No.

Why did you at times select such peculiar places in which to transact business? Why not principally in your own office?—I don't understand.

You know what I mean?—No.

You remember one of your securities withdrawn under peculiar circumstances?—Oh, yes, that was in drawing up the transfer of the Yoshida Shinden to the owner of a certain house, and we were asked to come there to see him.

Debtor added something which was not intelligible to our reporter.

In Exhibit G, you write:—"I closed my books on 31st March, and shall hand you copies of my profit and loss account?" Did you produce these?—No.

Were the particulars you furnished to the Chartered Bank full, true, and particular accounts of securities against moneys advanced by them?—Yes.

You actually held those securities?—Yes, some were inspected by the Bank.

Did your letters to the Bank represent the truth?—Yes.

In reference to the Yoshida Shinden property, if, as you say, Uyeda and another protested against the sale, why did he give his consent to the sale?—Uyeda never protested.

He gave his consent?—Yes.

Do you think if I apply to Uyeda for your Hakodate account I shall have any difficulty in getting it?—I don't think so.

Why are exhibits R. and S. made out separately?—There is no reason.

This (produced) is a memorandum received from you of specific expenditures for Yoshida Shinden, Kanazawa land, and the Jiwakisha Company. Are they included in Exhibits R. and S.?—Yes.

If you signed receipts in full for the Nagasaki Hotel, how do you arrive at the conclusion that money is still due,—I considered it due, as it cost double the money.

Was the contract price paid you?—Yes.

What became of the bank drafts from London received from you since May, 1898?—They were used in house expenses, paying interest on Yoshida Shinden land, lawyers' fees, and so forth.

How many were there?—I don't recollect.

Will you give the amounts of as many as you can?—There were two at £100, I think; the rest I don't really recollect.

What bank did they come through?—The Shokkai Ginko.

All?—Yes.

From the rough books and memoranda that I have could a complete set of books be made up?—Yes.

How long would it take you to make these books up?—Probably months; it depends what time I am allowed to work.

Suppose you are allowed to work as long as you have been?—Probably two months. It might be less.

Have you kept any books during the last three years besides those in my possession?—No.

This is the last question I am going to ask you, and it is to give you the opportunity of clearing up anything that is not clear. Is there anything that you should have disclosed that you have not made clear?—Nothing, sir, I have disclosed everything.

This concluded the Official Receiver's examination.

His Honour—Are there any further questions or has any one anything to say against the examination being closed?

Mr. Lowder put one or two additional questions, and then, addressing His Honour, said:—"With reference to what your Honour asked just now as regards the public examination of the debtor, it is impossible for me to ask all the questions I should like to ask until the books are made up. If the examination is closed I should, I presume, be precluded from asking any further questions. If the books are to be made up—and I think it is very desirable that they should be—I should like an adjournment till that time.

His Honour—What time would you like to adjourn to?—

Mr. Lowder—Taking the answer elicited by the Official Receiver it would take two months for the books to be made up.

His Honour—Yes, but I think it is desirable that an effort should be made to do it more quickly than that. (To the debtor) I think if the books are made up you must do it as quickly as you can, and you ought to have it ready by the 5th May—that is, six weeks from to-day.

The Debtor—Yes.

His Honour—I think that should be sufficient. I will adjourn until Friday, the 5th May.

Mr. Lowder—There is certain other evidence which I should like to have an opportunity of taking, but I presume that should be the subject of special application either through myself or the Official Receiver.

His Honour—Yes, that must be a special application.

The Court then adjourned.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

ENGLISHMEN in Yokohama will give a St. George's Ball on April 25th.

THE troubles in the Philippines still continue but the rigorous press censorship prevailing in Manila prevents any news from circulating outside the lines.

AT Tainan 30 new cases of plague were reported on the 23rd; 9 proved fatal.

THE construction of the Shimbashi Bridge, Tokyo, will be completed next month.

MR. KANG YU-WEL, the Chinese reformer, left for America on Wednesday by the Idzumi Maru.

THE rowing season formally opens in Yokohama to-day with a procession of boats round the harbour.

THE Nippon Yusen Kaisha will hold a Spring Athletic Sports meeting at Mukojima, Tokyo, on April and.

A ZAROS fort is to be constructed at Kamishima, Ise bay, as soon as the Bu-ho Railway line has been finished.

SIGNOR MARTINO, the late Italian Minister in Peking, has left for Rome, and a successor has been appointed.

FRANCE and Great Britain have arrived at a definite agreement whereby France obtains access to the Nile.

IT seems that the Pope recently underwent an operation for the removal of an abscess on the thigh. He is now out of danger.

THE concert given in the Public Hall on Wednesday evening by the Junkei Choral and Orchestral Society drew a very large audience.

A CHINESE Language School has been established at Tottori and is to be opened on April 1st. Over 40 military officers will receive lessons in the language.

AT 2.50 a.m. on the 15th, a fire broke out in the house of Hayano Hasuhei, a shoemaker, at Shichome, Honcho, Higashi-ku, Osaka. Two lives and two houses were lost.

ACCORDING to an official telegram from Söul, dated March 22nd, Ma-san, Kun-san, Söng-jin, and Phöng yang will be thrown open to foreign commerce from May 1st.

THE Financial Department on Thursday issued war loan bonds to the amount of yen 28,000. This sum is to be employed in gifts in connection with the Japan-China War.

SEVERAL mysterious explosions have occurred of late in French Government arsenals and many lives have been lost. No clues as to the perpetrators have been discovered.

IN consequence of the adverse vote in the Reichstag the German Government consents to fixing the effective peace loaning at 495,000, instead of 502,000, as demanded in the Army Bill.

MR. OKUBO TOMITAKE, secretary of the Department for Home Affairs, is to marry the daughter of Mr. Kundo Rempel, president of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. The ceremony will take place early in April.

IN view of the operation of the new treaties, chief inspectors and clerks who understand English will probably be appointed at Tokyo, Yokohama, Osaka, Kyoto, Kobe, and Nagasaki jails in June next.

H.M. THE QUEEN REGENT of Spain has signed the Treaty of Peace with America, without admitting the same to the Cortes, owing to the unwillingness on the part of successive Cabinets to accept the responsibility of ratifying it.

As already reported, over 50 scholars were awarded the degrees of Hakushi (doctor) on Wednesday. Mr. Teubouchi, the famous dramatist, and Mr. Taguchi, who is widely known as a master of economic science, are among the number.

MR. CECIL RUODAS has succeeded in the negotiations at Berlin to construct the Cape-Cairo telegraph through German territory, instead of via the Congo. A similar arrangement for the railways is almost complete.

FOR the enforcement of the new Tariff regulations, the Yokohama Customs house has decided to establish inspection offices in Uraga, Chiba, Choshi, Ishinomaki, and Kamimiyata, and will build a 70 ton steamer to be called the Olina Maru as a revenue boat.

ON the 18th, the opening ceremony of the Daido School, established by Chinese residents in Yokohama, took place. Count Okuma, Governor Asada, Mr. Midzokami, Superintendent of the Customs and others were present, and Count Okuma delivered a speech.

COUNT GOTO, president of the Shinagawa Tram Car Company, and Mr. Takasugi Kiyoshi, the manager, have been charged at the Tokyo Chihō Saibansho with a violation of the commercial law. The former was sentenced to a fine of 70 yen and the latter to one of 50 yen.

NAKAZATO HEIJIRO (58), Osawa-mura, Koga-gori, Kanagawa Prefecture, murdered his father-in-law Sohei (85), on Tuesday morning. The offender had formerly shown every respect to the old man but being somewhat angered by the harsh treatment accorded him, finally lost command of himself.

DETAILS of the explosion of dynamite cartridges at Kirino Colliery, in Fukuoka Prefecture, show that Isobe Katsunari, an officer, was handing five cartridges to a workman, when a spark from his cigarette fell into a box containing over 80 detonators. They exploded, killing the officer and injuring the workmen.

YOSHIDA SHIKAJIRO, aged 21, Mayeka Kosaburo, 21, and Nishimura Tamakichi, 16, coolies, of Hanazekicho, Yokohama, have been arrested by the water police on a charge of stealing window fittings (valued at yen 210), belonging to the N.Y.K.'s Yawata Maru. Ito Chujiro (28) has been arrested for buying the property thus stolen.

A RICE dealer named Matsubashi Zosaku (48), inspector of the Hakodate Rice Exchange, was arrested on the 13th instant. It appears that he suspected one of his employees of peculation, and mercilessly beat him, and confined him in the second storey of his house from the 3rd ult. to the 13th inst. These acts at length reached the ears of the authorities, and Matsubashi was arrested.

TWO wood-cutters, named Yasuta Kijuro (58), belonging in Kozu, Kanagawa Prefecture, at the close of their day's work at Yamato mura, partook of a quantity of sake and then said "good night." Both, however, had become quite intoxicated, and on their way down the mountain path Kijuro must have stumbled for his dead body was afterwards found in a forest, while his friend Tokujiro was discovered in a dying condition on a farm in Ono-mura.

DURING the discussion on the French naval budget in the Chamber of Deputies, the Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy, declared that the state of the fleet was excellent, and said that most of the squadrons in distant waters had been improved, and that the fortified naval bases had been commenced. He enlarged the submarine vessels, and announced that the Gustave Zide is now provided with vision apparatus which enables her to approach an adversary at will.

JAPANESE PUBLIC OPINION AND THE CHINESE AFFAIR.

Saturday, March 18.

The views expressed by Japanese journalists with regard to Italy's coup in China have been very distinctly but very unequally divided into two camps. The great majority of the Tokyo editors consider that the incident precludes China's final dismemberment, and urge that Japan must not sit with folded hands but must step boldly into the arena and claim her share. The Fiji Shimpō leads these publicists. They do not waste many words on abstract questions of international morality. There is none of the surprise and indignation that were evoked by Germany's performance at Kiaochow. Apparently the Japanese have taken fresh stock of the morals of Europe, and are prepared for anything. They recognise that China's old game of playing off one Power against another is at an end. She overlooked one rather important card, namely, her own proportions. No European Power has sufficient confidence in its digestion to contemplate swallowing her whole. She is so huge that she can be dissected into fragments large enough to satisfy any reasonable ambition, and numerous enough to go round the whole of the claimants. Further, when a State like Italy wants to take a hand in the cutting up, there is no longer the least reason for diffidence or compunction on the part of other countries. Italy qua Italy is the object-lesson that makes the Japanese "sit up." "Here is a Power," they say, "which has no material interests in China; which is financially crippled; which, to reach the Chekiang coast, has to send its ships across ten thousand miles of ocean; which is of all European leading States perhaps the worst equipped for an over-sea enterprise. Yet this impecunious, unprepared, pretextless Italy stretches out its hand to clutch some of the Chinese spoils, while we, the moribund empire's next-door neighbours, with an unquestionable title to its estates and a life-and-death interest in its fate, remain passive, neither helping ourselves nor seeking to prevent others from absorbing the whole." The sequel of these reflections is that to have obtained China's promise not to alienate Fukien, is counted of small value, and the newspapers urge the Government to prefer a demand for some part of the guaranteed province, so that Japan may have a basis of operations and be prepared for any contingency. The very small minority who object to this policy have nothing to say about the quality of its morality. Led by the Asahi, they simply contend that China's promise having been clearly given with regard to Fukien, there need be no apprehension of her ceding any portion of it to a foreign Power without previously consulting Japan, nor is there any likelihood of a foreign Power's demanding any portion of it at the certain cost of provoking Japan's enmity. The wisest plan, therefore, is to remain quiet instead of joining the depredators who are combining to partition China.

Count Okuma, also, has been delivering his views upon this topic, and, as usual, they are statesmanlike views. He is not surprised at Italy's action. Causes for it may be discerned in the state of her domestic affairs. But he agrees that it may be taken as an index of the Occient's very unscrupulous mood towards China, and he concludes that there now remains only one Power which the Peking Government can trust, namely, Japan. England long enjoyed China's confidence, but England, by supporting Italy in the San-moon enterprise, has destroyed her own credit and is now ranked with the general body of depredators. Against Japan only there is no score. China has been learning of late to trust her neighbour more and more. She is sending her military men and her students to receive their education in this country, and is showing in many ways that if Occidental civilization is ever to receive a friendly welcome from her, it will be by Japan's introduction. To destroy that happy state of affairs by a rash act at the present juncture would be, in Count Okuma's opinion, a fatal blunder. To put the matter briefly, he believes that events are driving China into Japan's arms, and that this country should be careful not to make any deviation from the friendly policy hitherto pursued by it. He looks to see Chinese troops organized and trained by Japanese military instructors, and the Chinese empire led by Japan into the only path where there is any safety against disintegration.

Monday, March 20.

The unexpected always happens. The public looked to see Italy enforce her demand by arms, or some friendly Power step in and effect a compromise, but it turns out that all the commotion was caused by a diplomatic blunder. So, at least, it is said, but we can not close our eyes to the fact that for several days before the finale, the Italian Representative in Peking had been conducting his negotiations with the Tsung-li Yamèn in such a manner as to convince the world that an appeal to arms would certainly follow China's refusal to yield peacefully. Yet, during all that time, the Government in Rome did not enjoin gentler methods. We are now told that M. de Martino exceeded his instructions when he sent in an ultimatum, but truly an ultimatum appears to have been the inevitable sequel of his procedure, and it is a little difficult to understand why he was not restrained at an earlier date if there was no intention of allowing him to follow to its natural goal the route upon which he had obviously entered. Information received in Tokyo goes to show that the so-called "ultimatum" was not accompanied by any threat. It was certainly couched in peremptory terms, for the Chinese were informed that an evasive answer, or an equivocal answer, or no answer at all, would be construed as a refusal. Still if M. de Martino's methods were not in excess of his instructions before the despatch of that last message, the message itself does not suggest any violently novel departure. In short, if the Italian Minister blundered at the end, he blundered also from the very outset, and if his Government imagined that he was managing things in a conciliatory manner up to the eleventh hour, the telegraph must have been used in a very misleading fashion. It is necessary, of course, to accept the explanation offered by Italy, and to congratulate her upon having chosen a wise exit from an embarrassing dilemma, but we regret that the situation was not controlled so as to avoid the necessity of a somewhat equivocal sacrifice. The only good likely to result from this unsightly incident is that it will stiffen China's back a little. She can scarcely fail to discover that she still possesses some capacity for resistance. It is to be feared, however, that she will greatly misinterpret the part England has played in the affair. The Japanese press seems to appreciate that, from the outset, England had no intention of countenancing any violence, but we suspect that China will be slow to arrive at the same conclusion.

Tuesday, March 21.

The fact that Italy has withdrawn her application for a lease of San-moon and disavowed her diplomatic agent because of his menacing methods does not appear to have allayed the excitement of Japanese journalists. A majority of them continue to insist that this country must not sit with folded hands, and that affairs have reached a pass demanding decided action. What is advised, however, is not an attempt to bolster up the Chinese Empire, but some step to insure Fukien against the encroachment of any Western Power. It appears to be considered that the safety of Formosa would be immediately imperilled were a foreign country to obtain a footing on the opposite coast. The Fimmin, for example, thinks that Fukien occupies towards Formosa a position precisely similar to that occupied by Korea towards Kiushiu in ancient times. The rulers of Japan found it quite impossible to preserve peace and tranquillity in Kiushiu so long as its coasts were exposed to the onsets of raiders from Korea, and they had no choice eventually but to strike at Korea itself. Hence it is argued that the guarantee given by China about Fukien must be converted from a mere paper promise into a tangible reality by obtaining a Japanese basis of operations in that province. There is quite a striking similarity, almost an identity, between the articles published by the Fiji Shimpō, the Kokumin, and the Fimmin on this subject, and when three journals of such influence speak with a common voice, we may be sure that a large section of the Japanese nation is listening.

FOREIGNERS AT PILOTS.

The question of granting licenses to foreign pilots is producing the usual crop of tergiversations and prevarications in the journalistic world of Kobe. It is insisted that when we referred to the danger of "allowing persons of alien nationality to acquire competence which endows them with highly dangerous potentialities in the event of war," we were thinking solely of competence to navigate a vessel safely among the shoals and rocks of the Inland Sea, and not at all of the special knowledge which a pilot possesses when military engineers have supplemented such difficulties of navigation by laying submarine mines and other obstructions. Our explanation that we referred solely to torpedoes and cognate obstacles is politely dismissed as false, and our extremely courteous contemporary persists in running tilts at his own interpretation of our words. Well, it really makes very little matter whether this thing or that thing was meant at the outset. The only point of interest is—would the licensing of foreigners as pilots be dangerous for Japan in the event of war. We say "Yes," because—and the remark applies with special force to a body of water like the Inland Sea—, although modern science enables a country to organize in its territorial waters a system of obstructions which defy the approach of foreign war-vessels, modern civilization requires that such obstructions shall not interrupt the course of commerce, and the pilots of the country are consequently supplied with information by means of which they can steer a merchant-vessel safely through the zones of danger. Hence if some among the pilots were foreigners, the information they possessed might become available to war-ships of their own nationality. We are answered that, in such a case, a special body of pilots would be organized for the special service, and foreigners would be excluded. That, of course, is a frank admission of our contention. It is a confession that the foreign pilot would have to be excluded from the practice of his profession in case of war, or, even though war had not broken out, in case Japan deemed it necessary to place her coasts in a state of defence. In our opinion the most prudent plan is to exclude the foreign pilot altogether. There are only very few men engaged in the trade, and they will not be subjected to any hardship, since their licenses will doubtless remain valid. As to the latter point, however, it is to be observed that the new Law says nothing. It provides for the permanence of licenses granted to foreigners within five years after the date of its operation, but it is silent about licenses granted prior to that date. We recommend the present holders of licenses to assure themselves on this point, or, if necessary, to get their licenses renewed after the Law goes into force.

JAPANESE STATESMANSHIP.

Japanese publicists are usually in a hurry; Japanese statesmen generally act with great deliberation. On the present occasion many voices have been raised against the Foreign Office in Tokyo because it did not leap into the arena the moment Italy struck China's shield, and because it did not make San-moon a stepping stone to a Japanese basis in Fuhkien. The incident is temporarily closed as between Italy and China, but the clamour of reproach still echoes in Tokyo, and we have not yet heard any comment on the position in which Japan would now find herself had she acted as these "strong foreign politicians" recommended. The idea ought to present itself forcibly, however, for a very painful position it would be. Japan claims to be walking in the same path of foreign policy as England, and the claim is probably sincere. She says that the partition of China must not be contemplated except in the last resort, and that, in the meanwhile, every reasonable effort should be made to avert such a contingency. She says, further, that the best way to avert it is to keep the trade door open, and to lead China peacefully away from the conservatism which cripples her capacities for resistance. Suppose, then, that so soon as the Italian stiletto was pointed at China's breast, the Japanese Government had stepped forward and put a pistol to her head, declaring that this country also insisted on joining in the game of robbery, and suppose that it had transpired, as it would speedily have transpired, that the Italian weapon had been unsheathed by mistake, what course would Japan have adopted? Could she have extricated herself from the false position by discrediting an envoy and declaring that she did not wish to embarrass her friend England? It would have been a humiliating repetition of an unsightly drama, but truly one fails to see what other bridge could have been found for retreat. Or perhaps Japan would not have retreated. Perhaps she would have pressed her point and obtained a pound of her neighbour's flesh. If so, she would have had to break away from her fellowship with England, and she would have stood confessed as an aggressor awaiting only an opportunity to strike at China's heart. Do the men who cried out for peremptory action, and those who still cry out for it, think of these things? Does it occur to them to reflect what kind of countenance their country would now show to the world had she been guided by the impulses that prompted their outcry? They ought to be very thankful that abler hands than theirs held the helm, and they ought also to be visited by a glimmering notion that the Foreign Office in Tokyo had probably much sounder materials for constructing its judgment than the flimsy fancies out of which their own conclusions were spun.

MARQUIS ITO AND THE SAN-MOON COMPLICATION.

It has been stated confidently by several Tokyo journals that the Chinese Government, acting through its Representative in the Japanese capital, sought counsel from Marquis Ito about the San-moon complication, and that the Marquis despatched a long telegram to Li Hung-chang, who, though he does not appear openly upon the stage, is exercising considerable influence behind the scene at this crisis. Such items of intelligence do not derive any additional credibility from the fact that they appear in several papers. That only means, as a rule, that they emanate from some news agency to which the journals publishing them subscribe. But there would be nothing at all surprising in an appeal from China to Japan at this juncture, for the most short-sighted of Chinese statesmen must have discovered ere now that safety from Occidental aggression is to be found solely in the path trodden by Japan. However, if the above intelligence was given forth with considerable assurance, contradictions of it are now published with still greater confidence. Marquis Ito, it is alleged, never regarded the San-moon affair seriously, or foresaw the least probability of its leading to war. He felt certain that England was not supporting any demand on Italy's part, though she might be endorsing a request, and that if her influence were thrown into the scale at all, it would be on the side of peace. That forecast does much credit to Marquis Ito's political foresight, but it does not prove that the Chinese Government did not consult him. It is added, however, that the exchange of telegrams with Li Hung-chang was a mere matter of courtesy. Probably the public will say that the time was ill-chosen for such civilities, and will prefer to believe the original version.

SILENCE OF POLITICAL PARTIES.

The Mainichi Shimbun is the severest censor that Japan has at present. It criticises her in uncompromising terms, and the things that it says, though they often sound cruel, even ruthless, seem generally to have a substratum of truth. Thus, we can not choose but endorse the contrast it draws between the activity shown by party politicians in the field of foreign affairs two or three years ago, and their remarkable quiescence to-day. With such vital problems before their eyes as Italy at San-moon and America in the Philippines and at Hawaii, they seem quite indifferent to everything outside Japan, and occupy themselves only with selfish questions such as the emoluments of members of the Diet, the State purchase of private railways, the Law of Election, the restoration of hereditary pensions, the disposal of forests and moors, and so forth. The Mainichi compares the present mood of party politicians to the sleep of a drunken man, who slumbers on unconscious of the sun climbing above the horizon. These criticisms are a gentle specimen of our contemporary's style at present. It spares no one. As an outspoken denouncer of abuses and honest censor of morals it occupies an unique place among Japanese journals, and, indeed, among the journals of any country.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

The Industrial Bank of Japan offers a discreditable spectacle at present. The officers and shareholders do not appear to be able to compose their differences. From accounts published by Tokyo journals we gather that the proximate cause of the trouble is the desire of the shareholders to obtain a larger grant in aid from the Treasury. Many of them purchased the Bank's shares at a premium, and, now that they find the institution paying only 5 per cent., their speculation looks far from rosy. A sweeping reduction of staff has been effected, but that seems to have injured the confidence reposed in the directorate, for the reduction was made under pressure and in the face of declarations by the President that it could not be accomplished. The question appears to have now narrowed itself to a determination on the part of the principal shareholders to choose a President themselves, instead of accepting a Government nominee.

THE JAPANESE AND CHINA.

The Doshikai, an association of influential Japanese having for its object the promotion of friendly intercourse between Japan and China, held a meeting in the rooms of the Geographical Society in Tokyo on the 17th instant. Among those present were Viscount Enomoto, and Messrs. Hanbusa, Shibusawa, Okura, Yokoyama, etc. It was decided that a school should be opened in China for the study of Japanese and a school in Japan for the study of Chinese, and that, in connexion with the schools, a Japanese-Chinese club should be organized to promote all kinds of enterprises in China. Methods of raising capital were discussed, but the decision arrived at is not reported by the press.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN POLICY

The Fuji Shimpō seems determined to employ its great influence in the interests of a strong foreign policy. Although the San-moon incident has been closed, for the present at all events, our contemporary continues to insist upon its contention that the guarantee obtained from China with regard to the non-alienation of any part of Fukkien, must be converted into a practical reality by obtaining a naval port in that province. The Fuji reopens the discussion of this subject in a somewhat sensational manner. It asks whether the people who so strongly advocate interference by Japan to maintain the independence of the Chinese empire, have fully considered Japan's competence to maintain her own independence. The time is not far distant when she will cease to be self-supplying in the matter of bread-stuffs. Her population grows much faster than her power of agricultural production, and since she will have to make constantly increasing purchases of food from abroad, it is essential that her sales of manufactured articles to foreign countries should increase correspondingly. China is her chief market. Were China closed to Japanese industrialists their existence would be seriously menaced. Hence the open-door policy is absolutely imperative, and it should be Japan's object to obtain a position which will enable her to insist on the observance of that policy. She must not take any risks. China is weak and irresolute. Under the menace of a strong State she might at any moment violate her engagement to Japan and surrender a part of Fukkien. Such a conjuncture would bring Japan vis-à-vis with an Occidental Power, and compel her to pay a heavy penalty for her procrastination. The Fuji thinks it wiser to take time by the forelock.

There is a great deal of sound sense in our contemporary's reasoning. We can well appreciate Japanese anxiety. But, after all, do not these reflexions lead us to the old goal that, instead of robbing China to prevent her from being robbed by somebody else, a much sounder and more logical plan would be that the Powers interested in preventing her spoliation should combine to rouse her to the necessities of the situation? Suppose that England and Japan addressed a joint note to the Chinese Government warning it that, in the interests of free trade, no alienation of the territories to which Japanese and British subjects have access by treaty would be tolerated. Does it not seem that such a course might effectually guarantee China's remaining possessions against foreign aggression? We should like to hear the Fuji's view upon that point, but, at the same time, we repeat our often-expressed conviction that China is doomed. The individual Chinaman has all the attributes that go to make a successful and respected member of society, but the trouble is that he is simply an individual, not an unit of a nation. The national side of his character has been obliterated, and nothing in the history of the world warrants us in supposing that the loss can be remedied. Still less does anything in his own recent history suggest that he can be roused to real solicitude for his country. The writing on the wall needs no Daniel to interpret it in China's case.

NORTH VERSUS SOUTH.

A very interesting problem is propounded by the Fuji Shimpō, a problem which has often presented itself to our minds, namely, the future centre of Japan's commerce, industry, and wealth. Probably the great majority of our readers will be disposed to answer without hesitation, "Tokyo." It is true that as the official capital, as the residence of the Court, and as the largest city incomparably in the empire, Tokyo's status seems assured. The second of these reasons would alone have sufficed, and sufficed amply, up to modern times. Before the Nara epoch, the metropolitan title of a Japanese city endured for the reign of one sovereign only. At his death another city received the honour. Nara ranked as the capital for three quarters of a century. Its successor, Kyoto, held the rank for nearly eleven centuries. Yet Kyoto, from the moment of its abandonment by the Court, fell from its high estate, and yielded the pas to the Emperor's new residence, Tokyo. To-day, as of yore, no conservative Japanese would admit the possibility of acknowledging any city to be the capital unless it was the residence of the Sovereign. But when we look behind these white-haired notions, we find that Tokyo's elevation to the place of capital was a paradox. The victory which carried the Emperor's Court northward was a victory of the south over the north. Tokyo may be said to have been invaded and captured, and Japan, from the point of view of the Restoration, may be regarded as two neighbouring States, the southern of which overthrew the northern and occupied its territory. It often happens, though such a sequence of events is abnormal, that an invader finds valid reasons for transferring his capital to the chief city of the invaded district. Such reasons undoubtedly existed in Tokyo's case. But they exist no larger. There are no political arguments in favour of Tokyo's continued supremacy. Are there, then, any commercial or industrial arguments? Perhaps the easiest way of answering is to set down the civic pretensions of the northern Japan side by side with the civic pretension of the south. When we do so, we find in the former catalogue Hakodate, Niigata, Yokohama, and Tokyo; in the latter, Kyoto, Osaka, Kobe, Shimonoseki, Moji, and Nagasaki. These lists are eloquent. Then again, looking back five years, we are struck by the recollection that during the war of 1894-5 Tokyo was like the proverbial "home left desolate." It stood wholly outside the circle of interest and activity. The Sovereign went south; the Diet met at Hiroshima; the millions poured out by the Treasury flowed into the bosoms of the southern folks; the troops, travelling to their rendez-vous, did not even visit Tokyo en passant. In short, the great city found itself untouched by the main currents of the crisis. It would be so hereafter. Japan's belligerent frontier is now her south-western coast. The shores that face Formosa, Fukkien, the Yangtze Valley, the Gulf of Petchili and Korea—these are the strategic lines, and there the nation's strength will be concentrated in any future emergency. Osaka, Kyoto, and Kobe seem to have insensibly responded to these considerations. They are growing much more rapidly and solidly than Tokyo. We can not say that Tokyo is without industrial enterprise. It has its factories, and their number grows year by year. But they are to the factories of Osaka much as their pipe-strius flues are to the columnar chimneys of the southern city. Tokyo, indeed, is a comically striking example of old-fashioned Japan. Its citizens cling to the narrow domestic grooves of primæval industry. Instead of organizing large establishments and erecting substantial factories of imposing dimensions, they run up flimsy timber-and-tin structures in lanes and alleys, and furnish them with chimneys like over-grown stalagmites. There is no sense of dignity in Tokyo's mind nor any impulse of progress. Its instinct seems to be against accepting the honours thrust upon it as the capital of the empire and the residence of the Court. Perhaps that instinct is truly prophetic.

KOBÉ'S DEMONSTRATION.

Unless the Kobe community's sense of humour be very blunt, they must have long ago recognised the ridicule which the excessive zeal of their self-constituted champion is bringing upon them. The reception they gave to the Emperor some months ago was a very pretty and a very commendable affair, no doubt, but its value does not appear to be much enhanced by the perpetual clamour raised about it. Evidently it was a great disappointment to some of the folks in the southern port that the Japan Mail did not fill its leading columns with descriptions of the reception, and we confess now that had we better appreciated their feelings, we should have taken care not to disappoint them. But we foolishly imagined that to procure, at considerable expense, a long telegram descriptive of the event, and to produce one of their own newspaper's accounts of it, was, on the whole, a very liberal measure of notice. Now, however, the newspaper which we thus honoured declares that "the Japan Mail's careful avoidance of any reference to the demonstration was of set purpose." Certainly such modesty is admirable, but it would look better were it linked with a little veracity. The Kobe Journal may count its own utterances of so little account that their reproduction by another journal is tantamount to a "careful avoidance of any reference" to the subject they discuss, but it should not rate a detailed telegram at such an insignificant value. At all events, to affirm that a journal which calls its readers' attention to an incident by means of a lengthy special telegram and the production of a minute notice, has carefully and of set purpose avoided any reference to the incident, must seem just a little risky in the eyes of common-place individuals, who do not recognise that telegrams and articles emanating from Kobe are regarded as ciphers by Kobe newspapers. For the rest, as a mere tribute to artistic principles, we would point out that all this talk about the "demonstration" is apt to make people tired, and to turn Kobe's fire-works into a fizzle.

On Thursday, at the Yokohama Chiho Sai-banisho, Yamamoto Kozo (21) was charged with stealing 8 copper pipes from the English steamer Formosa, now lying at Yokohama pier, on the 13th instant. He was sentenced to 2 months' major confinement and 6 months' police surveillance, the property being returned to the owner.

SLANDAR.

We apologise to our readers for occupying any part of our columns with references to the wretched slanders continually published in Kobe about the Japan Mail. It is not right, however, that the public should be grossly misled by devices which are ingenious owing to their limitless unscrupulousness. A Kobe newspaper recently stated that "a short time ago the Japan Mail was quite prepared to acquiesce in the restriction of newspaper ownership and editorship to Japanese subjects." Now that is a flagrant falsehood. We are advisedly using emphatic terms, because no milder expressions are justified by the facts. The accusation being that "the Japan Mail, a short time ago, was quite prepared to acquiesce, &c.," we replied that "the Japan Mail never for one instant expressed acquiescence in the idea that the ownership and editorship of newspapers in Japan should be restricted to Japanese subjects." To persons of elementary honesty it will be apparent that our denial was direct and unequivocal. Yet so extraordinarily tortuous and pettifogging are the Kobe Chronicle's methods that it pretends to discover want of veracity in the phrasing of our reply. It accuses us of "twisting the phrase used so that it becomes something entirely different from what was said." Psychologists have concluded that the habit of prevarication, perpetually indulged, warps the mind so that truth and falsehood cease to be distinguishable. That seems to be the Kobe Chronicle's case, and perhaps we ought to pity rather than to chide it. But until the nature of its malady is sufficiently recognised to secure for it complete segregation from decent society, we must treat it as a public nuisance. Fortunately it has its amusing aspects, for could anything be more ludicrous than to find a journal gravely writing:—"What the Mail denies is not that it was quite prepared to acquiesce in the restriction of newspaper ownership and editorship to Japanese subjects, but that it had never for one instant expressed acquiescence in the idea, which is a very different thing?" A very different thing indeed! The Kobe Chronicle accused us of having been quite prepared to acquiesce, and we replied that we had never for one instant expressed acquiescence in the idea and then the miserable quibbler pretends to think that its charge and our denial are "very different things." If more contemptible shuffling was ever resorted to by a public writer, he has to be discovered. Meanwhile the palm of prevarication rests on the brows of the Kobe Chronicle. However, if the case were limited to that laughable display of deceit we should not waste a line on it. But the dissembling exordium has a fraudulent sequel which concerns us much more closely. "We are always prepared," says the Kobe Chronicle, "to support any statement made in our columns," and it then proceeds to make the following quotation from the Japan Weekly Mail of April 3rd, 1897:—

It will be for the Japanese Government alone, or in consultation with the Governments of the Treaty Powers, to determine whether and under what conditions license to carry on such professions ["medicine, the law, journalism, and so forth"] shall be given to foreigners in Japan. We shall be surprised and disappointed if any illiberal spirit is displayed in dealing with this subject, but, at the same time, it would be manifestly unwise to ignore the fact that Japan's experience of local foreign journals has not been at all calculated to inspire a desire for their continued existence. Undoubtedly a very marked improvement has taken place of late in the tone of the local foreign press, but the general record for the past thirty years has been emphatically repellent from a Japanese point of view; nor can any person pretend to imagine that, were the legislators of a European country invited to extend the special privilege of publication to a press which had shown itself so uniformly unfriendly to their national aspirations and reputation as has the press of Yokohama, Kobe, and Nagasaki, they would entertain the proposal for a moment. The statement will probably elicit angry protests from several of our contemporaries—angry from those whose intemperance and injustice have been most conspicuous—but it is a statement wholly beyond the range of honest contradiction. If the British Representative in Tokyo, or the British Foreign Secretary, approaches the Japanese Government with the object of securing legal recognition for the journalistic enterprise of his nationals in Japan, he may be met by the simple but highly embarrassing query, "Can it be sincerely maintained that the existence of the local foreign press in Japan has hitherto contributed to promote good relations between Occidentals and Japanese, or that its attitude towards the country has been such as to establish any claim upon Japan's liberality?" These are hard facts, but it is well to face them boldly and to recognize their significance. Japan's hands are not tied by universal usage in such a matter. All Western countries do not grant to foreigners the privilege of publishing journals within their borders. Japan may withhold the privilege and find precedents to warrant her. On the other hand, we are persuaded that the wisest course, in her own interests, will be to grant the privilege. She will not suffer by granting it.

To this extract the Kobe Chronicle appends the remark:—"And so on and so on. What does it all mean but the famous advice, 'put him under the pump'." The extract says "we shall be surprised and disappointed if any illiberal spirit is displayed" and "we are persuaded that the wisest course in Japan's own interests will be to grant the privilege," yet the Kobe Chronicle pretends to infer from these words that we were prepared to acquiesce in a course which we described as illiberal and unwise! But that is not all. The Kobe Chronicle dismisses the remainder of our article with the words "and so on and so on?" Nearly two years have passed since the article was published. The Kobe Chronicle trusted, and rightly no doubt, that none of its readers would take the trouble, even if they had the means, of referring to the files of the Japan Mail for 1897, and it therefore dismissed the rest of the article with the words "and so on and so on;" mendacious words in themselves, since they plainly suggest, and were plainly intended to suggest, that the omitted portion contained a continuation of the indictment of the foreign local press, and doubly mendacious in view of the fact that the rest of the article consisted of a defence of that press, and that to publish it would have at once exposed the flagrancy of the Kobe Chronicle's falsehood. Here is the part so carefully put out of sight by the Kobe Chronicle:—

She (Japan) must have recognised the justice of a plea very often advanced in these columns, that the apparently hostile writings of the local foreign press have been inspired, for the most part, not by real unfriendliness, but by a perfectly natural and respectable desire to retain the privilege of her own jurisdiction. We call that a perfectly natural and respectable desire. It is not merely the counterpart, in one respect, of Japan's desire to extend her jurisdiction over every person in her dominions. It is much more than that. It is an irrepressible expression of the attachment that every civilized people feels for its own laws and its own administrations of justice. In direct proportion to the difficulties that a nation has surmounted in elaborating good laws and organizing a good judiciary, is the value it sets upon those laws and that judiciary; and in direct proportion to the value it sets upon them, is its reluctance to exchange them for other laws or another judiciary. That is the consummation against which so many of the foreign residents have struggled resolutely and almost fiercely, and if their struggles have been reflected sometimes intemperately, sometimes unjustly, and sometimes clumsily, in the columns of the local foreign press, not Japan but their own cause has chiefly suffered by its advocates' want of skill and self-restraint. Japan has not much to complain of. The case against her aspirations might have been made far stronger had its exponents confined themselves to provable facts and warrantable inferences. Their excesses have so injured their pleadings and discredited their contentions as to promote, rather than retard, her aims. And the important point is that, with the removal of this question of jurisdiction from the field of practical politics, the main source of difference is also removed, and the bitterness of the conflict will gradually disappear. It must be anticipated that when the new Treaties go into operation, many real or imaginary causes of complaint will be found by foreigners. The passing of Occidentals under the jurisdiction of an Oriental country, is an event without precedent. There are innumerable difficulties to be overcome, above all the salient difficulty that the great majority of those passing under the new jurisdiction will do so reluctantly and with a disposition to discover grounds of grievance. But there will be no deep-seated instinct of resistance and discontent such as the prospect awakened while there was still hope of averting it. People will bow to the inevitable, and local journalists will no longer be prompted to set themselves the objectless and invidious task of constantly discrediting the nation and impugning its title to respect or confidence. On the other hand, the sense of having journals of their own to express their opinions and, if necessary, ventilate their grievances, will serve as a kind of safety-valve to foreign residents. It seems to us that, by a liberal course in this matter, Japan stands to gain much more than she can lose.

Now it is wholly impossible to suppose that, with the above statements before it, the Kobe Chronicle believed for one instant that the Japan Mail was "quite prepared to acquiesce in the restriction of newspaper ownership and editorship to Japanese subjects." That its original accusation was due to reckless ignorance, might have been conceived, and we were willing to take that view. But when it attempts to support its charge by quoting one part of an article, and omitting the remaining part which, if published, would have at once exposed the complete mendacity of its accusation, we have no choice but to conclude that it has been guilty of witting falsehood, and that it deserves to be treated with the contempt which is the portion of all tricksters.

THE MINISTER OF WAR AND FOREIGN LANGUAGES.

His Excellency Viscount Katsura, Minister of State for War, addressing a recent meeting of Generals of Division, dwelt upon the importance of encouraging the study of foreign languages by officers and non-commissioned officers. He alluded to the troubled condition of affairs in China and also to the near approach of Mixed Residence, and he further explained that, Japan having joined the International Copyright Union, it will no longer be possible to obtain cheap translations of foreign military works: they must be read in the original. This advice will doubtless give a marked impetus to the study of Western languages. The Japanese have hitherto been accustomed to have the best products of Western science and Western literature brought within their easy reach in the form of translations, but that convenient arrangement will cease to be possible after next July. It will be a very great misfortune.

THE CHINESE AND JAPANESE IRON FOUNDRIES.

Mr. Wada, who is under orders to proceed to the Iron Foundry at Hanyang for purposes of inspection, has explained to one of our Tokyo contemporaries the object and reasons of the journey. So far as the foundry itself is concerned, there is no special occasion to make any inspection, he says, for he is already pretty well acquainted with its condition, having been consulted by the Chinese at the time of its erection. It is on a much smaller scale than the Japanese foundry in Chikuzen, now approaching completion, for at Hanyang the quantity of metal manufactured annually can not exceed twenty thousand tons, which is only one half of the Chikuzen Works' capacity. The principal engineer at the Chinese foundry is a Japanese. The great difficulty is coke. The coal obtained from the Kaiping mine is not suited for the making of coke, and unless fuel can be furnished from Japan, the Kaiping works will be greatly embarrassed. Iron ore, on the other hand, is procurable in large quantities from a place about 75 miles up the Yangtze. What Mr. Wada wants to find out is whether the Chinese ore can be used advantageously in conjunction with the Japanese. If so, the abundance of the Chinese supply may render it advisable to have recourse to it, for the distance it would have to be transported is about the same as the distance from Chikuzen to Iwate, where the Japanese iron mines are situated, namely, eleven hundred miles in the former case and a thousand in the latter. Mr. Wada expects to devote a month to his trip to China, after which he will proceed to Europe to inspect the foundries there and to engage experts.

THE TOYO KISEN KAISHA AND ITS SUBSIDY.

One is not astonished to find the Nichi Nichi Shinbun roundly condemning the idea of granting a large subsidy to the Toyo Kisen Kaisha's San Francisco service. The Company is not an independent Japanese association. It is working in coöperation with two foreign companies, and since all questions relating to rates of freight and passage, dates of sailing, and so on, are regulated by a majority of the Directors of the three companies, it follows that the Japanese concern is practically controlled by its foreign associates; and, further, the business of the union outside Japan is transacted at the offices of the foreign companies. In our Tokyo contemporary's eyes these considerations seem to disqualify the Toyo Kisen Kaisha for special State aid; not that the Nichi Nichi objects to coöperation between foreigners and Japanese, but because it thinks that public funds devoted to the encouragement of navigation should be used for developing and encouraging purely national competence, not for maintaining a business which is largely under foreign control. Such reflections as these are very natural and will carry weight in many quarters, but our own private opinion is that the very surest and speediest way of developing Japanese competence is to be found in coöperations which bring the people of this country into direct contact with the teachings of foreign experience and the study of foreign methods.

THE FOREIGN YOKE.

Of course we twit the Japanese with want of courage when we hear them speak apprehensively of the inauguration of Mixed Residence, and of course, when they talk of being dominated by foreigners, we tell them that their pretensions to be admitted to equal intercourse with the West are absurd if they consider themselves destined to go under in competition with Europeans or Americans. Yet sometimes they state their case in a manner that staggers us. An article in the Nippon suggests that thought. It affirms that there can be no uncertainty as to the ruling motive of foreigners in their Oriental doings. Commerce and the gains it brings are what they want. For territorial aggrandisement they care comparatively little. Money-making is their paramount purpose. How, then, will things work when these alien gold-getters find the whole of the Japanese empire thrown open to them? If they regarded the Japanese as their equals, the question would not suggest any unpleasant reflections. But though the war of 1894-5 considerably influenced their estimate of the Japanese as a fighting nation, there can be no question that they regard Japanese merchants and Japanese manufacturers as pure Orientals, that they class them with Chinese and Koreans, and that they will not trust them in the smallest degree, or lend them a sen without tangible security. Men entertaining such a view of the Japanese, and coming to Japan with abundant capital and long practical experience will soon set their feet upon the neck of Japanese traders and industrialists. In most things they will be entitled by Treaty to the privileges enjoyed by Japanese subjects, but the ownership of land is still withheld from them, and the Nippon evidently thinks that it should be withheld. But it is precisely there that the Nippon's demonstration fails. It makes no attempt to show how the ownership of land would help foreigners to establish a mastery over the Japanese. No one, indeed, has ever essayed to reduce that apprehension to an intelligible shape. Alien ownership of land is forbidden in some countries and restricted in others, but the motive of the veto and of the limit is the same, namely, to prevent foreign capitalists from making large speculative purchases. There could not be much of that kind of thing in Japan, for nearly all the arable and building lands are already occupied, and no opportunity offers to detach them from the area of industrial, commercial, or agricultural enterprise. But at the foundation of the Nippon's dread is the indisputable fact that the Japanese tradesman and the Japanese manufacturer are despised by Occidentals, and, so long as that is palpable, we imagine that the Japanese will be apprehensive as to the consequences of free intercourse.

CHINESE STUDENTS IN JAPAN.

The third batch of Chinese students arrived in Tokyo on the 18th instant. They numbered twenty. Some of them had been educated in the Peking University, and some in the Naval College at Tientsin. Eight were at once admitted to the Seijo-gakko (a military school in the Ichigaya district of Tokyo), but it has not yet been decided where the others are to be placed.

JOURNALISTS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

It is a very suggestive fact that an American General has been the first to completely segregate his campaigning from journalistic obtrusion. America is the home of newspaper tyranny. Nothing is sacred from the reporter. His first aim is to bring himself into prominence. That he does so at the expense of others costs him not a moment's remorse. Any one courageous enough to defy the reporter has to suffer bitterly for his temerity. Yet it is by an American General and an American Admiral that the reporter is totally tabooed for the first time in modern warfare. The operations in the Philippines are effectually screened from public observation, and the outside world does not even know certainly whether fierce fighting is going on there or whether profound peace prevails. It is an interesting incident, and folks must be curious to see what kind of vengeance the reporter will wreak. For our own part, we do not pity him in the smallest degree. The sensational newsmonger, the yellow journalist, is the curse of the time, and it is only fitting that the first radical revolt against his abuses should be made in the country which suffers most from his tyranny.

A NEW IRON MINE.

We read in vernacular newspapers that iron has been discovered in the Nakagawa district of Shimotsuke province. The ore is said to be of excellent quality, equal, if not superior, to that of Sweden, and it is believed to exist in great quantity. Re-calling the facts that within the past seven or eight years at least as many discoveries of new iron mines have been announced in different parts of Japan, and that in no single instance has rumour proved correct, we can not but regard this last announcement as apocryphal.

THE SPECIE BANK.

A bank should be able to do a fine business when it has supplies of capital at 2 per cent. That is the fortunate position in which the Yokohama Specie Bank finds itself. Some years ago the Bank of Japan, acting under instructions from the Treasury, lent to the Specie Bank ten million yen at 2 per cent. interest, and the sum is now to be increased by twenty millions on the same terms, making a total of 30 million yen. It is stated that the chief purpose of this increased accommodation is to enable the Specie Bank to finance trade transactions with China. The recently discussed project of establishing a Bank of China and Japan will, therefore, be abandoned. Some of our Tokyo contemporaries note that commerce with China has been considerably hampered since Japan adopted gold monometallism, and express the opinion that difficulties of exchange will be largely removed by the increased monetary facilities which the Specie Bank can henceforth grant. The connexion of ideas is not clear, however. If a Bank working on a silver basis entered the arena, the case would be different, but the Specie Bank's accounts are kept in gold and its risk are in gold. It has no opportunity or mission to stand between its customers and exchange fluctuations.

"SUPERFICIES"

Some demon of mischief stood at the elbow of the translators of the Civil Code when they rendered the word chijō ken by "superficies." From a legal point of view it was doubtless a good rendering, and as a matter of scholarship no equivalent more succinct or accurate could have been found. But the translated Code was to be read by men some of whom had no desire to comprehend its provisions—being much more concerned to show that they were stupid and unworkable provisions—and it was a dangerous experiment to lay before these men a new-fangled and essentially technical term like "superficies." They have made the most of the opportunity thus afforded, the result being that the very name "superficies" has come to stink in the nostrils of quiet, work-a-day folks, and the thing itself is probably regarded by many business men as a kind of mysterious, intangible, quibble-begetting affair which every sensible person is bound to shun. However, the mischief is done and can not be recalled. Chijō-kan, though it is nothing more complicated than a lease for building or planting purposes, will occupy in the pages of Foreign-settlement history a position analogous with that held by the Schleswig-Holstein question or the Treaty of Kutchuk-Kainardji in European annals. Nevertheless we have got so far that most people now understand "superficies" to be a land lease conferring on its holder a title to occupy the land and to own everything above the soil for a period the duration of which may be fixed at any number of years according to the mutual convenience of the contracting parties. That much at any rate is settled. But here comes another difficulty. It emanates of course from Kobe, and is propounded by the newspaper which lately provoked so much mirth, first, by alleging that the special privilege of extra-settlement house-renting, granted to foreigners at Hyogo in 1868, was in consequence of the Settlement's having been fully occupied, whereas, in truth, not a single square foot of land had yet been occupied in the Settlement; and secondly by affirming that it is the duty of judges in Japan to grant bail of their own initiative whether application has been made for it or not. We shall quote this new difficulty about superficies in full:—

"It may be pointed out that one very great objection to the superficies arrangement is that it would not rank among the assets of a bankrupt's estate. Article 276 in the chapter on Emphyteusis also applies to the chapter on Superficies, and runs as follows:—'If an emphyteuticary (superficiary) neglect to pay his rent for two years in succession, or should he be adjudged a bankrupt, the owner of the land may apply for the annulment of the right of emphyteusis (superficies).'" It need scarcely be pointed out that it would utterly destroy the value of a superficies for manufacturing purposes, for while such a law existed there would be no security for the capital invested. Let us put a case. A foreigner makes a superficies arrangement for, say, a term of fifty or a hundred years. He erects workshops and puts up an expensive plant, and in the course of a few years has an extensive business in operation. Bad times come, and it is necessary to get an advance from a bank. What does he find? That the superficies is not an asset, because if bankruptcy should ensue, the landowner would have the first claim upon it; that the buildings will not rank as an asset, because in case of bankruptcy the landowner having the first claim upon the land can order the buildings to be removed. Thus a foreigner having built up a business, may find himself in a position where, by reason of temporary embarrassment, his whole undertaking and the work of a lifetime may be in jeopardy.

He cannot get an advance simply because of the insecurity of tenure in case of bankruptcy; while if he is forced into bankruptcy, his business would fetch little or nothing because the superficies does not go with it. We say now, as we have said before, that no foreigner will be likely to invest capital while such conditions prevail, as the risk is too great. And it is for such reasons that foreigners have always looked doubtfully at the proposition that a right of superficies is or can be, any substitute for landholding rights, or even for a lease of long duration."

People whose memories are sufficiently good will see at once that the position now assumed by the critics of "superficies" is very different from the position assumed by them in 1897. In 1897 they denied in toto that "superficies" could be regarded as the equivalent of a long lease for building purposes, and insisted that it was altogether erroneous to interpret the Civil Code as providing for a longer tenure of land than 20 years, without actual ownership. They now abandon that contention, and calmly admit that a foreigner may obtain a superficies for 50 or 100 years, just as though they had never strenuously and persistently asserted the contrary! Let us pass, however, to the new contention, namely, that Art. 276 of the Civil Code applies to superficies, and that, consequently, if a superficies becomes bankrupt, he would be liable to lose all the capital invested by him in the land. It goes without saying that when a newspaper undertakes to interpret the law, it is bound to set forth the whole law, and not to suppress the portions unfavourable to its own argument. The journal quoted above originally maintained that the Japanese Civil Code did not provide any system of land-leasing for periods long enough to justify the erection of houses and factories. Driven completely from that position, it now, more suo, takes refuge in the subterfuge that although long leases are procurable, they would terminate on the bankruptcy of the lessee, and consequently the capital invested would be lost to its investor. But that is only one half of the story. The other half, the half fatal to the Kobe newspaper's assertion, is carefully repressed. It is true that Art. 276 applies to a superficies, but it applies only "if a superficies is bound to pay a fixed ground rent to the owner of the land." When no fixed ground rent has to be paid, the superficies's rights are absolutely unassailable. He may become bankrupt twenty times over without his landlord's acquiring any title to extinguish the superficies. Why is that essential part of the law suppressed? Why is a deliberate attempt made to discredit the system of superficies, and to demonstrate its uselessness from the point of view of the capitalist? There can be only one answer, we think; namely, that the Kobe newspaper cares nothing about misleading the public provided it makes out a case for itself. Naturally any foreigner negotiating a superficies for building purposes would take care that a fixed ground rent should not form part of the agreement. He would pay a lump sum for the use of the land during whatever period seemed desirable. A superficies is, in effect, ownership for a fixed term of years. It may take the form of ordinary renting, the tenant agreeing to pay so much a year. But it may also—and certainly would in every case where the investment of capital was contemplated—take the form of buying and selling, the superficies making one final payment then and there, or even spreading his payment over several installments, provided it did not take the shape of a fixed ground rent. These facts are far too obvious to have escaped the attention of the Kobe journal.

Since writing the above, we see that the Kobe journal's attention has been drawn to the fact we have noted. It was a fact obvious to the shallowest intelligence, and the Kobe newspaper's failure to state it in the first instance was incredible blundering.

TOKYO.

We have always regarded Tokyo as the most unprogressive city in Japan, and our opinion is confirmed by some figures which the Kokumin publishes. The number of houses in the capital is 303,791, and the expenditure for local purposes is 3,622 yen per house, out of which 87.65 sen is on account of education. Kyoto has 68,339 houses, and its municipal outlays average 8.60 yen per house annually, education figuring for 2.806 yen, or more than three times what Tokyo spends upon the teaching of its young folks. Osaka, as might be expected, shows a still more striking contrast. Its houses number 153,772, and its expenditure is 11.527 per house, the cost of education being 4.31 yen, or nearly five times the figure for Tokyo. Indeed, the capital, with all its wealth, is behind the general average not merely of the whole urban districts but also of the whole country. Thus, the houses in the urban districts aggregate 10,002,436, and their local expenditure averages 7.806 yen per house, the outlay for education being 1.706 yen. The corresponding figures for the whole country are 7,056,038 houses, 4.238 yen and 1.598 yen. Finally, whereas 76.45 per cent. of the school-age children in Osaka and Kyoto are attending school; 71.08 per cent. of the total number of school-age children in the urban districts, and 65.65 per cent. of the children in the whole country, the figure for Tokyo is only 64.65. The capital of the empire stands, in fact, at the very bottom of the educational schedule. It is a disgraceful record.

CHRISTIANITY AND DIPLOMACY.

The reputation of Christianity is suffering not a little from the total lack of morality shown by Christian States in their dealings with the Orient. It is alleged by critics like the Nippon that the faith of the Nazarene has become a mere name without any reality; that the high-sounding talk of Western peoples about the federation of the world, the succour of the poor, the liberation of slaves, and so on is hypocritical cant, and that the 19th century closes upon the disgrace of Christianity. The United States is especially instanced as an example of a country which has fallen from its high moral estate, and Japanese Christians are denounced as mere servants of white people, because they remain silent in the face of such international outrages. We should be interested to hear the Nippon indicate any era in the world's history when such a thing as State morality existed; or—despite the singular incidents of the past two years in the Far East—any era when greater respect was paid by nations to moral principles than is paid in these fin-de-siècle days.

PROSPECT UNDER THE TREATIES.

Under the above heading a local contemporary has drawn attention to one or two points of some interest. The first is the operation of the laws of Japan in the case of "joint stock companies which have been established under Hongkong Ordinances to do business in Japan." Our contemporary regards it as a hardship that "the Japanese intend to assume over these companies jurisdiction of a kind never claimed by the British Court in Japan and conflicting with the jurisdiction of the Courts in Hongkong." We have no doubt that the Japanese authorities are anxious to adopt every possible means of facilitating the working of the new Treaties, but surely it would be a little extravagant to expect them to adapt their Codes to Hongkong Ordinances. Joint stock companies doing business in Japan after July next will be able to register themselves in this country, and if it is found that any Hongkong Ordinance conflicts with Japanese jurisdiction, well, the natural and reasonable course will be to alter the Ordinance of the foreign colony and leave the laws of the home empire undisturbed. Our contemporary refers also to superficialities, but that question need scarcely be re-opened, and adds:—"It might be convenient if all questions on wills were to be determined by the law of the testator's nationality, but we have never heard of such a thing being done, and we are anxious to know whether Dr. Lönholm's statement is correct. If the will is to be governed in the usual way, that is by the law of the testator's domicile, there will arise many difficult questions, and the Japanese Courts may even claim that all old residents are domiciled in Japan."

An examination of the laws which have been translated and published would have removed our contemporary's perplexity on this matter. Art. 26 of the Law concerning the Application of Law in General, says:—

The existence and the effect of a will are governed by the law of the nationality to which the maker of the will belongs at the time of its making.

The revocation of a will is governed by the law of the nationality of the maker at the time of revocation.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding two paragraphs, the law of the place where the act is done may be followed as to the forms of a will.

A STRUGGLE FOR INDEPENDENCE.

Historical parallels are badly strained when we find the story of Toussaint l'Ouverture cited in the same context with the struggle now made by the Filipinos. The sympathy excited in Toussaint's behalf was chiefly because of his treacherous seizure by Leclerc, and his death in a French prison. A war carried on now-a-days as Toussaint's black troops carried on the war of 1791 would receive the execrations, not the applause, of the civilized world. Yet the Asahi thinks that the morality of the Occident has degenerated because public opinion supported Toussaint a century ago and does not support the Filipinos to-day. If public opinion does not support the Filipinos, the Filipinos have themselves to blame. Had they remained quiet, they would certainly have obtained a large measure of local autonomy from the United States. It is even doubtful whether full independence would not have been granted to them, for the very narrow majority by which the Paris Convention was endorsed in the Washington Senate seems to have been due to the news of the outbreak at Manila. America will do a great deal if she is conciliated, and a great deal more in deference to the principles of liberty, but she will not do the very smallest thing in deference to coercion. That is where the Filipinos made an egregious blunder.

Besides, the world is much more practical now than it was a hundred years ago. People have been taught by experience that independence is a curse rather than a blessing to a nation which has not the capacity for self-government. No one believes that the Filipinos have that capacity. Every Occidental who has hitherto studied them closely declares them incapable of managing their own affairs. It is extravagant to assert that the experience of the past eight months proves anything conclusively. America has no right to grant full autonomy to the Filipinos until she has satisfactory assurance of their fitness for the charge. Upon her devolves the ultimate responsibility for the administration of the islands. That is what impartial onlookers see. They also know well that the Filipinos will be sympathetically treated by the United States, and that they will obtain whatever measure of independence is consistent with their own welfare. Their fighting is premature, petulant and needless. It is impossible to sympathise with them.

THE RAILWAYS.

Experts predict that the result of raising the rates on the State Railways will be to diminish rather than to increase the net earnings. The private railway companies evidently do not take that view, however, for they have blithely followed the Government's example, and are putting up their prices all round. It is scarcely necessary to say that, from the point of view of outsiders, there is nothing whatever to justify the Government's action in this matter, except the fact that no other exit seemed available from the impasse created by the unpatriotic and unstatesmanlike conduct of the Liberals in cutting down the proposed Land Tax from 4 per cent. to 3.3. The Fiji Shimpō rightly observes that the lines under official control ought to be an example to the owners of private roads, but they certainly are not qualified to be anything of the kind, either in the matter of traffic management or technical excellence. Thus, in 1897, the record for the Tokaido Railway was 14 collisions, 147 carriages and engines derailed, 785 difficulties in connexion with rolling stock, 17 stoppages owing to injuries to the road, and 64 blunders of pointsmen. As for the service, the best that can be said of it is that it is no more than it was ten years ago. It has not deteriorated, but neither has it improved, and it is now far below the standard of modern railways in the West, thus affording an illustration of our recent remark that the tendency of Japan at present is comparatively retrogressive. The Japanese have always been ready to take their cue from officialdom. It might be rash to affirm that, had the Government applied itself with a liberal hand to works of progress on its railway, the private companies would have promptly followed suit, but they certainly have shown remarkable alacrity in adopting the official programme of increased rates. Henceforth, not even the excuse of cheapness can be made for the very faulty services on Japanese lines. The only hope lies in the possibility that journals like the Fiji Shimpō may succeed in educating a mood of intolerance among the public.

MARQUIS ITO.

There is obviously a very strong movement to draw Marquis Ito once more into the field of politics. The Liberals, speaking through their organ, the Fimmin, insist that it is his duty to complete the edifice of parliamentary government, the foundations of which he laid in 1891, and the middle courses in 1895, 1897, and 1898. It was he that concluded the first alliance between a Cabinet of "Clan Statesmen" and a political party in 1895. It was he that cemented the alliance in 1897 by quitting office rather than sever his connexion with the party which had supported him. It was he that frankly stepped aside and made room for the first party ministry in 1898. What is wanted now is the proper organization of some political party; its instruction; its development; and the only man really fitted for the task is Marquis Ito. It is not a question of constructing a new party but only of improving an old one. The two great parties of the day, with their history of twenty years and their well-established traditions and connexions, can not be dissolved. They are permanencies, and unless one or the other of them can be fitted for the rôle of administration as well as opposition, there is no future for party Government in Japan. The Liberal organ asks Marquis Ito to take his choice; constitute himself leader of the Progressists or the Liberals, whichever he pleases, provided only that he enters the field. But of course it is quite evident that the Liberals would be intensely chagrined if the Marquis cast in his lot with their opponents, and of course they know quite well that nothing of the kind is within the range of ordinary possibilities. Mr. Hoshi Toru is now the real leader of the Liberals, and his great ambition is to form a Ministry with the Marquis at its head, and himself, Baron Suyematsu and Baron Ito among its members. To onlookers the difficulty seems to be that the Liberals are not in a position to claim such leadership, and to the Liberals themselves it probably seems that the one thing they need to make them strong is Marquis Ito for leader.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN LOAN.

It is confidently asserted by Tokyo journals that the Japanese Representative in London has not hitherto been successful in his attempts to negotiate a loan on account of Public Undertakings and Railways. British capitalists are asking for interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and want to have the bonds run thirty years before redemption commences. It is now thought that no further steps will be taken before the return of Mr. Kato to Tokyo, which event is expected at the end of next month. There is also a rumour that Messrs. Pannure and Gordon are sending to Japan a representative who will confer direct with the Finance Department.

THE COMING EVENT.

There has been so much said and written about Mixed Residence that we can not wonder at the excitement its approach provokes, though in reality the event is not likely to produce the very smallest effect upon the even tenor of our daily lives. The 18th of July, 1899, will be precisely as the 18th of July 1898, was. None of us will have any practical consciousness of our passage under Japanese jurisdiction. The only difference in our existence will be the payment of increased taxes. The average Japanese, however, does not take that view of the matter. In Tokyo, for example, the expectations formed in 1886, when Treaty Revision seemed to be on the verge of accomplishment, are renewed to-day, as confidently as ever, though on a smaller scale. Owners of houses to let or lands to sell persuade themselves that if they wait four months they will be able to command their own terms, and some of the leading journals write as though the opening of the country must speedily establish between foreigners and Japanese relations much more intimate and extensive than any previously existing. The Jiji Shimpō, indeed, has a long article in which, having explained that happily a "swashbuckler demeanour" on the part of anti-foreign Japanese is no longer to be apprehended, and that, on the other hand, foreigners have fortunately corrected their masterful mien, it goes on to express regret that greater social intimacy between Japanese and foreigners has not preceded the change now pending. How often we have heard that complaint! It has been so frequently published in newspaper columns that people have probably come to regard it as one of the stock subjects which editors take from their pigeon-holes in times of scarcity of "copy." Hackneyed as the lament is, however, we do not remember that any writer has shown how the defect may be remedied. The truth is that it can never be remedied until one side or the other changes its manner of life radically and its modes of thought considerably. There was a greater semblance of intimacy of intercourse between Japanese and foreigners 15 years ago in Tokyo than there is at present. It was only a semblance, however, and, such as it was, it had been officially fostered. We do not see, therefore, how the foreign and Japanese residents of Yokohama and Kobe can be justly blamed for failing where Tokyo has completely failed. Mixed residence will not mend matters. Propinquity of ideas and tastes is what is wanted, not mere propinquity of dwellings.

THE MOVEMENTS OF POLITICAL PARTIES.

Arrangements are in progress for a Liberal campaign in the provincial districts, and it is justly pointed out that several topics might be advantageously elucidated from the platform by these party politicians. Above all is it advisable that the nation should be taught the true inwardness of the Land Tax and convinced of the necessity of increasing it and employing it as a substitute for the many vexatious imposts now laid on the backs of the people. There is not much hope, however, that representatives of the Liberal Party will elucidate these points, for they have given no proof of understanding them. The ideas of all classes about the Land Tax in Japan seem to be greatly confused. It has come to be regarded as a question between the urban and the rural populations, and until that delusion is dispelled, there will be no satisfactory settlement.

The provincial campaign of the Liberals is likely to develop an exciting phase in Fukushima Prefecture. Fukushima used to be the very den of Liberalism. No enemy ventured to set foot there. But the captain in charge was Mr. Kono Hironaka, and he, as everybody knows, turned his back on the Liberals two years ago and joined the Progressists. At first the Fukushima electors seemed disposed to endorse his action quietly, but ultimately they began to show signs of dissatisfaction, and the movement has now become so strong that some people expect to see Mr. Kono forced either to return to his old allegiance or to resign his seat. At all events, the Liberal leaders think that the time has come to re-establish a branch office in Fukushima, and Count Itagaki, Baron Suyematsu, and Mr. Kusaka—for Mr. Kusaka has now joined the Liberals—are about to travel northward for the purpose of consolidating the Party's influence in the Prefecture. The Progressists, on their side, do not intend to be tamely driven from their recently acquired possession. They are organizing a stout resistance, and some interesting episode are anticipated.

Public attention is also directed at this juncture to the doings of the Conservatives. One can scarcely say that there is in Japan a Conservative party worthy of the name. But there are Conservatives, and their leaders are three General officers, Viscounts Tani, Torio, and Miura. The Sōul tragedy put an extinguisher upon Viscount Miura for a considerable time. He has emerged, however. A short time ago, when the Progressists engaged in their anti-Land-Tax agitation, the newspaper-reading public was surprised by intelligence that the Viscount had spoken in a very bitter strain at one of the Party's meetings. It was not easy to determine whether he had espoused the cause of the Progressists or constituted himself their censor, but there could be no doubt that he had once more appeared upon the political stage. We next heard of him as mediating to prevent a rupture of the Progressist Party, and we are now assured by the Mainichi Shimbun that he is resolved to incite the agricultural classes to revolt against the Land Tax. The Conservatives have certainly gained accessions of political strength during the past few months; first, in connexion with the affair of the Sugamo-prison chaplain, and secondly on account of the Land Tax. Viscount Torio is a profound believer in Buddhism, and the adroit uses to which he and his friends put the Sugamo affair did more credit to their political sagacity than to their liberality, though, it must be added, whatever course Viscount Torio adopted, he would always be credited with sincerity. In the anti-Land-Tax agitation he did not figure very prominently, but it was not questioned that his support was extended frankly to the other two Viscounts, Tani and Miura, who did make themselves very busy as champions of what are erroneously called "agricultural interests." The Progressists welcomed the co-operation of the Conservatives on that occasion, but, if the Mainichi is rightly informed, the Progressists would fain sever the connexion now. For Viscount Miura denies that appeals to reason or logic can be of any further avail in this case, and insists that no expedient offers except "the bamboo spear and the mat flag." He thinks that a leaf should be taken out of the book of Mr. Tanaka Shozo, and that if the capital were invaded by a few gigantic demonstrations, after the type of the Ashiwo Mine supplicants, the advocates of the Land Tax would have to "sit up." It is a pity that Sōul did not hold him permanently in shadow.

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.

Reuter's agent in London has surpassed himself. It is worth while to place, side by side, the telegram forwarded by him with reference to the speech of M. Lockroy in the Chamber of Deputies, and the telegram received at the French Legation in Tokyo with reference to the same speech:—

Reuter's Summary.

London, March 20.
In the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Lockroy, Minister of Marine, declared that at the time of the Fashoda crisis the French navy and dockyards were utterly unprepared, most projectiles having been without fuses.

The French Legation Telegram.

Saigon, March 20.
During the discussion on the French naval budget in the Chamber of Deputies, the Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy, declared that the state of the fleet was excellent, and said that most of the squadron in distant waters had been improved, and that the fortified naval bases had been commenced. He eulogized the submarine vessels, and announced that the Gustave Zédé is now provided with vision apparatus which enables her to approach an adversary at will.

If the writers of the two telegrams had been actuated by a desire to convey to the public diametrically different ideas of what M. Lockroy said, they could not have succeeded better. Doubtless he used the words attributed to him by Reuter, but to have those words put forward alone as a résumé of his remarks is about as misleading as anything could well be.

LIBERALS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

There have been anticipations that, so soon as the Diet rose, the Liberal leaders would prefer demands for seats in the Cabinet, and if refused, would sever their connexion with the Government. It does not now appear that things will take that course. On the 18th instant the Committee of the Party held a meeting and adopted various resolutions: first, that the Party identify itself with the interests of the Government; secondly, that no attempt be made to obtain official positions for any of the members; thirdly, that the Cabinet be urged to submit to the Diet, next session, Bills for amending the Law of Election and transferring the Prison Expenditures to the charges of the Treasury; fourthly, that steps be taken to increase the strength of the Party; and fifthly, that the Party direct its efforts to improving and completing the machinery of trade, industry, and agriculture. A general meeting of the Party is to be held on the 7th proximo, when the above resolution will doubtless be endorsed.

MORAL STANDARDS OF EAST AND WEST.

WE passed unnoticed at the moment Dr. GORDON'S comments on an article which appeared in these columns some time ago with reference to Extra-marital Relations in Japan and moral standards in West and East. But the subject has now again been brought upon the tapis in a manner which forbids us to remain silent. In the first place, we must protest against Dr. GORDON'S partial summary of our views. Synthesizing our article, he says:—"There is, it is implied, really no difference between Japan and the West; the apparent difference is due merely to the fact that the Japanese 'in his pursuit of vice is not secretive.'" Dr. GORDON must have read our article superficially or he would not have represented us as saying that there is "really no difference between Japan and the West." There is a very great difference, and we set it forth in the plainest language. It is to be found in the sphere of married life, where, in our opinion, the duty of morality is far more imperative than it is in single life, because the happiness of wife and children is concerned, not merely the happiness and wholesomeness of the individual. But we need not dwell upon this point, for Dr. GORDON'S intention, doubtless, is to confine himself to the non-marital side of the problem, and we are well assured that his purpose is always to be fair and just. Passing at once, then, to the gist of his contention, we find him protesting most "emphatically against the view" that "the condition of social morality is the same in the West as in the East." "The condition of social morality" is a very large question, and some agreement as to its scope would be necessary before attempting to discuss it intelligently. Dr. GORDON, taking America and Japan for the purposes of his comparison, alleges that there is "a very great difference" in favour of the former, and cites in support of his contention "the newspapers; the hotels; the songs of the people; conversation, and the lives of religious leaders." We do not wish to single out any special country for comparisons of that nature, but we may say that we have seen at least one pictorial American journal which would be suspended immediately by the Japanese police were any attempt made to publish it in Tokyo. Nor would it have occurred to us to cite the newspaper press of the United States as a witness in favour of the country's morality. With one exception, there is no sin against moral decency which is not constantly perpetrated by some of the American journals. With regard to the hotels, we do not quite follow Dr. GORDON'S meaning, but we would ask him whether his judgment in Japan's case may not be based upon evidences attributable to the prominence of vice in this country rather than to its quantity. In other words, does he not mistake what the Yiji Shimpō calls "want of secretive-ness" for want of virtuous impulses? A few years ago, the newspapers chronicled the destruction of a huge hotel by fire in one of the great cities of the United States. There was terrible loss of life, and, when the bodies came to be identified, a number of them belonged to the class usually known as "social outcasts." Doubtless that hotel, in ordinary times, displayed a full coat of moral white-wash and an ample adornment of virtuous gilding. We do not suggest that any broad inference should be drawn from its story. Our suggestion is simply that immorality which is allowed to parade itself naked on the house-tops is likely to be much more startling than immorality which hides itself, draped and veiled, in nooks and corners, and that the shock caused by the sight of the former is very apt to disturb our estimate of its proportions as compared with those of the latter. This remark applies with special aptitude to "railway travel" which Dr. GORDON arraigns as another witness in support of his thesis. It would seem that there have come under his notice, when travelling by rail in Japan, flagrant signs of immorality. If that be so, does it not simply bear out the Yiji Shimpō's contention that the difference is one of concealment and openness? Dr. GORDON denies that "the scenes of great depravity witnessed night after night in the cities of the West" prove anything as to the general condition of social morality in the Occident, yet he is apparently willing to accept some isolated railway experiences as proofs of the general condition of morality in Japan. We say "isolated experiences" because, during 32 years' residence in Japan, we have never, for our own part, witnessed on railway journeys a single incident of an immoral character. Travelling between Kyoto and Osaka we have seen parties of geisha in the trains, and we have seen them attend at a railway station to give a "send off" to some patron who had probably treated them munificently. But such scenes can not be among those alluded to by Dr. GORDON, for they are in no sense immoral or indecent. If it be improper that a geisha should travel by train, or appear on a railway platform to say goodbye to a friend, then it is improper that she should dance in a theatre, or serve simply as waitress and musician at private parties. As a gross violation of decency and morality there is nothing to be seen in Japan that can bear comparison for an instant with the ballets which take place, night after night, and are attended by the élite of society, in the theatres of American and European cities. Dr. GORDON speaks also of the songs of the people and of their conversation. We can only express surprise that he should cite such witnesses. It has always been to us a most noteworthy fact that the conversation carried on by Japanese men is not disfigured by even a fraction of the salacious elements characteristic of conversations under similar circumstances in the West. Had we been asked to state the result of our experience in this field, our answer would have been diametrically opposed to Dr. GORDON'S conclusion, and we are equally unable to agree with him in the matter of songs. Has it ever occurred to Dr. GORDON to consider how many of the songs sung in American and European drawing-rooms relate to subjects that are not erotic? Love, its longings, its pains, and its triumphs are the things sung about in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred by Western youths and maidens in Western salons, and, so long as that is the case, we have little title to condemn Japanese songs as immoral. Perhaps it may be retorted that the subject is of less importance than the manner of dealing with it. But even there, so far as our knowledge goes, we believe that for every distinctly improper song sung in Japan, a very much more pungent parallel can be found in Europe or America. Finally, Dr. GORDON queries our statement, "statistics show that the social evil has not larger dimensions here than in Europe." "It may be true," he says, "but I doubt it," and then he goes on to speak of the United States, telling us that his "knowledge of the two countries" shows how the comparison would stand could figures be adduced. We did not refer, of course, to the United States or England when we spoke of statistics, for the licensing system does not exist in either country, and accurate statistics are consequently unobtainable. But estimates have been made, which assign to both London and New York figures proportionately greater than the figure for Tokyo. Estimates, however, are unsatisfactory things at best, and so, for the matter of that, are statistics in a question of this kind, for statistics deal only with what is officially known and tell us nothing about immorality privately practised. But, whatever be the actual figures, it is at least certain that the Japanese system produces, in the great cities, a state of affairs outwardly far superior to that which perpetually disgraces some of the chief capitals of the West.

What we desire particularly to protest against is the notion that our purpose is to hide the vices existing in Japan or to deny that an immense margin of evil remains to be lopped off. If we traverse the very severe comparisons set up by Dr. GORDON and some other observers, it is simply because, in our opinion, the least successful method of preaching reform is to claim for the reformer a standard of excellence he does not possess. In former days the pro-pagandist of Christianity used to commence his work in Japan by denouncing the superstitions of Buddhism, forgetting that from the Buddhist point of view Christianity has superstitions not less incredible. So, too, if, in the face of very clear evidences to the contrary, we assert on behalf of Europe and America superiority of practical morality which any intelligent Japanese must see to be in some respects pharisaical, especially when he observes the lives led by foreigners in Japan, we cease to be representatives of candid reason and become creatures of racial prejudice.

KOREA.

The Cabinet crisis in Söul, accentuated by the transportation of two Ministers for terms of 10 and 15 years respectively, was evidently a reaction against the abnormal tranquillity which had prevailed in that curious city since last autumn, when the Independence Club and the Pedlars had such a lively time. It is said that the Emperor's favourite female attendant, Mademoiselle Om, is the chief source of disturbance now-a-days. She has begun to think it time that she was settled in life, and many people endorse her view, for with Sovereign and Court alike her power is great enough to make her favour worth propitiating. Russia, as a matter of course, gets the credit of being mixed up in this new complication. She is said to have completed enlisted Mademoiselle Om's sympathy. Thus, when the Söul Cabinet opposed the demands of the St. Petersburg Government in connexion with whaling privileges for Russian subjects, Mademoiselle Om's intervention was solicited, and the Ministers speedily found themselves without portfolios. Nobody attaches much importance to the incident, but it certainly shows that the influence of Russia is again in the ascendant.

Meanwhile it is stated that Pyong-yang, Kunsan, and Sanchin are to be opened to foreign trade from the 1st of May.

BARON KATAOKA AND THE DOSHISHA.

There is, as our readers know, a movement on foot for appointing Baron Kataoka to the office of President of the newly constituted Doshisha. He has been approached by a representative of the Jimmin on the subject of his willingness to accept the post, and his answer, shortly stated, is that in the event of an unanimous nomination and of an evident need for his services, he will not decline. He pays a very high compliment to the Doshisha. As an institution for carrying out education on Christian principles, its success, he says, has been very marked. It has turned out numbers of men who have received employment in banks and mercantile establishments, have been placed in positions of trust, and have almost invariably justified the confidence reposed in them. That such a nursery of valuable citizens should pass out of existence would be a public calamity.

Mr. Geo. B. Coughtrie, after serving for 28 years as Secretary of the China Fire Insurance Company, Ltd., Hongkong, has been voted a retiring allowance of £400 a year.

YOUNG JAPAN.

It is extremely pleasant to find that an atmosphere of moral freshness still pervades some realms of international thought. Recent events almost compel the unwilling conclusion that not only have all the old-fashioned principles of inter-state relations been cast to the winds by Occidental Powers, but even the sense of shame had gone with them, and Governments no longer take the trouble to seem respectable. "Young Japan," however, continues to recognise the golden rule, and proclaims the fact in no uncertain tones through the columns of the Nippon. It summons the Japanese nation to lay aside selfish reflections as to interest and advantage, and to espouse China's cause boldly and unequivocally, for China is Japan's neighbour, the Chinese and the Japanese belong to the same race, the two peoples have the same script and the same classics, and for centuries China stood to Japan in the light of guide, philosopher, and paragon. "Whatever remnant of international morality survives actively in the Occident," says the Nippon, "receives acknowledgement solely in the dealings of European States with nations of their own race." In short, our contemporary's idea is that charity begins at home, and that if Japan does not constitute herself the champion of the Middle Kingdom in this, the latter's hour of stress and storm, she will be morally dishonoured for all time.

It is wholesome to see ourselves sometimes as others see us. Can anyone deny the truth of the Nippon's proposition that the dealings of Occidental States with one another are regulated by canons quite different from those observed by them in dealing with Oriental States? The one exception to the rule is Poland's case. Of course there is an excuse, and it is an excuse of special validity when applied to China: Oriental States seldom allow themselves to be treated deferentially. China had worn out the patience of a good many Powers before her vivisection commenced.

NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

The rumours recently circulated about the formation of a new political party, under the name of Kokken-to, seem to have been premature. It is now evident that, instead of the National Unionists dissolving their organization and enrolling themselves as members of the Kokken-to, the projectors of the latter will probably be absorbed into the former. The committee of the National Unionists have held a meeting, and resolved that steps be taken to increase the membership of the Party, and that all persons sharing its views be admitted to its ranks. There is no reason why the National Unionists should not play a very important part so long as the strength of the Liberals and Progressists remains nearly equal, and the balance of power can be held by a third association.

A London telegram dated February 5 reads:—It has been decided that Admiral Dewey was justified in cutting the cable in the enemy's waters during the attack on the Spanish fleet off Cavite, Manila Harbour, at the time of the late war; and further that the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which owns the cable from Manila to Hongkong, is not entitled to claim damages.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Yomiuri Shimbun has been continuing the articles noticed in a former Summary, entitled "Japan as seen by Foreign Eyes." Already the subject has been treated in more than 30 issues of the paper. The following is an epitome of Mr. Fenollosa's view as stated in the Yomiuri:—On my return to Japan a short time ago I found her changed for the worse. Sixteen or seventeen years ago Japan stood before the world as a representative of unalloyed Oriental thought of a very high class. She has now imitated Europe and America to the extent of becoming claptrap (Europe, America, jin no yō ni hijō ni kōkoku 廣告 倭国 今 何 等 國 乎). In former days one could truthfully say that there was more in Japanese life and ideas than appeared on the surface. The impression now produced is that appearances are even better than the reality. All the old refinement has gone. Everything has been vulgarised. Science has advanced, it is true. But instead of becoming a means to a higher end, it has become an end in itself. Idealism has gone and a depressing materialism has taken its place. Japan is adopting very second-class European ways. In things material, like house-building, and in things mental, like systems of philosophy, she does not aspire to obtain what is best.

She has rejected her own religions, but she does not adopt Christianity. What standard has she to fall back on? What idea is there that she highly values? The youth of the present day grow up without any conception of the merits of their ancestors as compared with themselves. The very taste for high class things is being eradicated. Everything is being sacrificed on the altar of Western learning. Although an anti-foreign spirit now that mixed residence is so near would be an evil, yet the exaggerated regard which is felt for everything foreign in many quarters is also an evil. Among the parties which aspire to lead the masses one sees little discernment, and little moderation. There is the Japan Times' party, and the highly educated Christian section, that are all for foreign ways, and the nationalist party that is quite anti-foreign. Many of the methods and institutions that are introduced into this country are considered antiquated in the West. The time for standing aloof from foreign affairs is past. Japan must play her part in the great arena of Western politics. Events are proceeding apace at Japan's very doors. Before the century closes China's fate is likely to be sealed. Will Japan simply look on while this drama is being acted? Her own future will be immensely influenced by the changes that are taking place in the neighbouring continent. The contempt with which China's literature, art, and civilisation is treated by some would seem to imply that Japan owes nothing to the Celestials, and that she can no longer learn anything from the people whose civilisation she studied and assimilated for so many centuries. Such is not my view. I am of opinion that the two countries have much to learn from each other. The Chinese have sent students over here, thus showing their desire to be friendly with the Japanese. The Japanese should reciprocate. Whatever England and America may do in the Far East, the part which Japan plays can be no insignificant one. In fact, unless she moves nothing can be accomplished. (Nihon ga ugokaneba Far East ni oite wa dōsuru koto mo dekinu.)

* * *
The Yomiuri also furnishes an epitome of the views of L'Abbé François Ligneul, who, we are told, has resided in Japan for 20 years and has obtained a remarkable knowledge of Japanese ways. In M. Ligneul's opinion, says the Yomiuri, Japan is attempting too much in education, and the result is that, although the modern student knows a little about a great many subjects, as a rule he knows none thoroughly. As a result of the exclusive attention that has been paid to worldly and materialistic subjects and the decline of the influence of Buddhism and Confucianism, the youth of Japan is at present without a moral standard, in fact without anything that can be called a conscience. And, moreover, little reliance is placed on the explorers in the fields of Western philosophy who have undertaken to set up new beacons in the place of the old ones. People do not trust Dr. Katō's materialism nor Dr. Inouye Enryō's Buddhist Metaphysics.

The views of the Rev. Arthur Lloyd are next quoted by the Yomiuri, in the following terms:—Japan is a difficult country to understand. The longer I reside in it, Mr. Lloyd is represented as saying, the less I seem to understand its ways and movements. Sometimes Christianity seems to be in a fair way of holding its own in the country, at other times its prospects seem dark. Since the war armaments have been increased at a rapid pace. What it will all end in it is hard to discern. If peace can be maintained for 20 years, the country will develop in every way, but should Japan engage in a great war the consequences would be very serious. . . . I am inclined to think that, with such large tracts of uncultivated land as exist in Hokkaidō and Oshū, Japan may rely on agriculture as her chief source of wealth to the end of time. . . . Since the war education in Japan has been pushed on at a rapid rate, but it is mostly of a materialistic or practical type. There is in the system of teaching followed too much cramming, too much note-taking, and too little attention paid to the general training of students' minds. The student is not taught how to study by himself. The hours of study are too much filled up with explanations of special subjects, and there is little time for teaching methods of acquiring knowledge. . . . Compared with foreign students Japanese youths are difficult to manage. They will not obey orders in the way that orders are obeyed in an English school. There is a spirit of independence among them, call it Yamato-damashii or what you will, which leads to school strikes when attempts are made to enforce the will of the teachers against that of the students. . . . On art I do not venture to express an opinion, not having paid any attention to the subject, but in the study of foreign music the Japanese have made remarkable progress. . . . In literature, too, the nation has been going ahead, as the magazines, newspapers, and books that appear every month abundantly testify. The tendency towards amalgamating the written and spoken languages is a hopeful sign. If this were followed by the general adoption of Romaji, the number of foreigners who would study Japanese could not but increase. And this is highly desirable if Japan wishes to make herself better known to the world; for there can be no comparison between a study of the original sources of Japanese thought in the vernacular and the reading of English periodicals written by Japanese like the Japan Times or the Hansei Zasshi.

* * *
In the pages of the Teikoku Bungaku Dr. Inouye Tetsujirō surveys the field of literature and states in his usual clear manner the conclusions he has reached. The following is the gist of his article:—The "New-Style" verses have gone out of fashion, and what are called hokku are all the rage. There are several reasons for this change, but the chief is the inefficiency and want of perseverance of the writers of New-Style verses and the general lack of appreciation for anything like high class literature among the reading public. There is a strong anti-literary feeling in certain quarters, some even going so far as to say that literature and national destruction go together. Leaving fiction and coming to books with a serious purpose in the philosophical line, last year witnessed the publication of several works of considerable merit. Such were Dr. Nakajima's Tetsugaku-shi (History of Philosophy); Dr. Inouye Enryō's Ha-butsu-ron (Refutation of Materialism); Mr. Takayama Rinjiro's Ronrigaku (Logic), and Mr. Takenouchi Nanzō's Rinrigaku.

Among the magazines whose discontinuance is a subject for regret, are the Waseda Bungaku and the Kokumin-no-Tomo. The former was noted for its impartial accounts of current literature and for the publication of articles of merit. The latter will be remembered for its polished style, which in a measure atoned for shallowness of thought and for the Christian flavour that was never missed in its dishes. All its criticism was from the Christian standpoint, and hence it often gave offence to its readers. It is said that the views of its chief promoters have changed, and that is one reason for its discontinuance. Be that as it may, the discontinuance of magazines is not to be regarded as a sign of the decline of literature. Periodicals are given up not infrequently on account of the advance of thought, and others take their place and give expression to the new ideas that have been born. If there were deaths last year, there were births also, for did not the Bungaku Kenkyūkai Zasshi and the Bungei Kurabu enter the world?

Among journals devoted to the discussion of education the Kyōiku Jiron and the Kyōiku Hōchi both continue to be popular, and the Kyōiku Jikken-Kai-Zasshi is gaining ground every month. Early this year two new magazines were started, the Nihon Kyōiku and the Kyōiku Kōron. The subject of national education has engaged the attention of a great many newspaper writers during the year. Conspicuous among daily journals that devote space to this subject, is the Yoroso Chōho; but we cannot regard the line it has taken with any satisfaction. Its professions are loud, but its methods are objectionable. It seeks to create a sensation by abuse and slander. The Nihon often opens its columns to writers on education, but recently that paper has been run in the interests of a certain political party, and hence the educational policy advocated has not been free from bias. The peculiarity of the Jiji Shimpō's views on education never alters. It seem to have no conception of what is necessary in the way of national education, but persistently urges the conformity of our education to that of foreign nations. What foreign country exists that does not evolve a system of education suited to its requirements as a nation? The war against national customs and ways has been carried too far by the Keiōgijuku school of thinkers. Everybody recognises that Mr. Fukuzawa did good service at the beginning of the Meiji era by his crusade against traditional methods and stupid prejudices. But the work of destruction has been carried far enough, and it is high time that as a nation we began to erect a new structure to take the place of what has fallen into ruin. Many of Mr. Fukuzawa's disciples do not realise this and content themselves with repeating their master's watchwords and aspiring to figure as destructionists. This is to misread the spirit of the times, which calls for sculptors rather than iconoclasts.

Coming to religion, nothing very remarkable has to be noted. For a time Christians strongly objected to the views expressed in my "Conflict of Education and Christianity," but recently there has been a change, and there is a movement towards nationalism within the pale of the church. This is a subject for gratitude. "I am quite aware of the superiority of much of the teaching of Christ, and I have learnt much myself from Christ, but the Christian view of human nature and the world I can no longer regard with satisfaction." The idea entertained by Christians that their God is the only true God is the ne plus ultra of narrowness, and is only equalled by the idea of the Buddhists about Nyorai (如来) * or that of the Brahmans about Brahma (梵天). The Buddhists have been making a great stir and keep talking of reform, but it is not doctrine that they intend to alter, but their ecclesiastical organisation only. What they are doing lacks continuity and persistence. One so frequently sees a head without any tail. . . . About Shintō there is nothing that need be said. . . . Our Nippon Shugi (Nationalism) movement prospers more and more. The Mainichi Shimbun, of which Mr. Shimada Saburō is the editor, complained of our teaching a short time ago as being narrow. We attach, according to this organ, a very limited meaning to the terms loyalty and filial piety. But this is not so. Let Mr. Shimada look to himself. He joins one party and then leaves it for another. His instability can only be compared to the duckweed that follows the stream. To him and his condemnation of the Nippon Shugi party may be applied Christ's words about the mote in one eye and the beam in another.

In the Kenseitō-Tōhō (憲報) Dr. Matsumoto Kumpei, who, it will be remembered, was the founder of the Tōkyō Seiji Gakkō, urges the necessity of providing more training institutions for would-be politicians. He says, with great truth, that nothing is more manifest than the fact that the present members of the Diet are often quite disqualified for their duties as legislators on account of defective education. They are mostly men who have paid special attention to one branch of knowledge only, and who possess an inadequate acquaintance with general subjects. In order to be an efficient politician, a man should certainly have studied political economy, law, the history of constitutional government in other countries, administration, and kindred subjects. There is a call for schools which shall lay themselves out for the training of young men who aspire to enter the arena of politics. Partly owing to the policy pursued by the Tokugawa Shōguns, the ignorance of even elementary principles of constitutional government among the masses of the people is very great, resulting every now and again in the expression of the wildest ideas as to the future course to be pursued by the nation, such, for instance, as a return to bureaucracy on the ground of its being a system that works easier than representative government. The only real cure for this is education. As yet the political conscience can hardly be said to exist in Japan. People do not realise that they have any specific duties as citizens. . . . what is sadly needed, says Dr. Matsumoto, is the imparting of more common sense to our would-be politicians. This commodity is very scarce among the members of political parties at the present time. . . . Then it is most desirable that the tendency to theorise in the absence of knowledge of real facts, which is so marked in our young politicians, should be cured. This can only be done by teaching the enormous importance of statistics on all subjects and by encouraging the study of trade, industry, labour, finance, taxation, &c., from a practical standpoint. This we endeavour to do at our school, observes Dr. Matsumoto. We aim at preparing our students to enter political life with some real attainable objects in view. . . . The distance that divides students from teachers in most schools we endeavour to bridge over by inviting students to social gatherings where they can converse with us on any subjects they please. In the English Middle Temple it is the custom for students and teachers to dine together. This may seem a small matter, but it produces many good effects.

Another subject of great importance in connection with politics is the training of journalists. In Europe and America the press wields enormous power. It commands forces that are as highly organized and as well managed as the Governments under which it carries on its work. We need in Japan a training institution for journalists. The many imperfections of our newspaper writers are too well known to need notice.

The Tenchijin has an article ridiculing the Quadruple Alliance recommended by Lord Charles Beresford as quite impracticable and expressing surprise that Japan should have in any way encouraged the scheme. The writer argues that Japan has no fixed policy in the matter of alliances; that she at one time favoured an alliance of the yellow races against the white, but, as this did not take, she turned around and lent a willing ear to a proposal of a very opposite kind. Is it nothing, asks the writer, that Japan regarded the attitude and action of each of the three countries with whom she is asked to ally herself with aversion not so very long ago? In going blindly into an alliance of this kind she would be acting in a most risky manner. Who of us is there that knows what may be the future policy of any of the three Powers in reference to China? Already there are people in England who are talking of slicing up China as Egypt has been sliced up, and of bringing the whole country under British control. . . . Lord Charles Beresford said that the alliance was intended to promote peace and so on. But, if war is not contemplated, how are other Powers concerned to be induced to retire from the advanced posts they have occupied. The whole thing is a farce, and we shall hear no more about it, argues the Tenchijin.

The Tenchijin publishes an article by Viscount Torio on prevailing ideas in China on popular government. It seems that Count Okuma, when he was Minister-President, in the course of an address to the Oriental Association, declared that China was a country where the people rule. According to Viscount Torio, who, it must be remembered, is well versed in Chinese history and literature, there are few countries in the world where the people have so little to say about government as in China and where they are more listless as to how public affairs are managed. Chinese politicians have always worshipped sages like Confucius and Mencius, but at no time in Chinese history, says Viscount Torio, has the voice of the people ever been a factor in shaping the destinies of the nation. There are no ideas in reference to popular rights among the masses in China. The subject has no interest for them. They are quite accustomed to be governed despotically and do not feel the yoke to be burdensome. Occasional popular riots on account of local oppression or grievances are not to be mistaken for a settled conviction that the people have the right to be represented in the councils of the State. Even in Japan the desire for power among the masses is quite modern. There are some who say that it was for popular rights Sakura Sōgorō contended, but it was nothing of the kind. The disturbance caused by him was connected with one definite grievance, real or supposed, and is in no way to be interpreted as an attempt to establish a universal principle bearing on the relations of the governed to their rulers. It was a case of a man sacrificing himself out of sympathy with distressed villagers and nothing more. . . . In reference to the assertion of popular rights in this country during the past few years, there is little that is gratifying. The political parties that have been formed are engaged in squabbling over minor matters. Party government put on its trial under the Okuma-Itagaki Cabinet signally failed. Existing parties may be described as lacking in intelligence, lacking in knowledge, and lacking in virtue (muchi, mushiki, musessō), and as yet no party has appeared which has proved itself worthy to be entrusted with the reins of State. . . . Some time ago I proposed in the House of Peers that the 400,000 shiooku should be regarded as a separate body and that an organisation should be created in which this class should be specially represented. But my proposition was not approved of. It seems to me that with the shiooku there are certain moral traits on which to work. They have a sense of shame and certain feelings of honour which are not found to the same degree in other classes, and if they could be formed into a nucleus for the creation of a new class of politicians, it might prove the beginning of a new era in politics. It is in order to carry out this idea that I purpose founding an Association to be called the 王選會, Odōkai, which will aim at supporting the throne by the practice of those cardinal virtues insisted on by Confucius, integrity and benevolence.

We read in the Gwaio Jihō that Professor Florenz and Dr. Ariga are preparing an abbreviated reproduction of Bismarck's Autobiography. It is expected that the book will be published in June. Dr. Ariga calls attention, in the pages of the Gwaio Jihō, to the importance of Bismarck's career to Japanese politicians who aim at understanding the political history of modern Europe. As an example of dogged resolution in the accomplishment of a fixed purpose extended over a lifetime the story which is being told in Japanese will certainly find many eager readers.

Professor Ladd's recent work called the "Philosophy of Knowledge," has been rendered into Japanese by Dr. Nakajima under the title of 知識の哲学 Ninshiki-ron. Dr. Nakajima has discussed the connection between knowledge that is dependent on psychological processes and knowledge derived from other sources. No book in the Japanese language gives such a minute and intelligible account of an abstruse subject, say the reviewers, as this translation. In it are discussed all those knotty questions of philosophy and science connected with things themselves and the knowledge we possess of them. The "Philosophy of Knowledge" shows that the decisions of science and philosophy are valuable only when they are based on reliable psychological data and logical principles. The work is for sale at the Fuzambō, Kanda, Tōkyō, at 70 sen per copy.

In the columns of the Kokumin Shim-bun Mr. Okazaki Senzei gives an account of the great difficulties encountered in designing and casting the Bronze Statue of Saigō Takamori erected in Ueno. The task of preparing a suitable monument of this remarkable man was entrusted to the Bijutsu Gakkō in 1892. For several years prior to that, earnest friends of the deceased hero had been collecting funds. But not until April, 1897, did the actual work of preparing the statue begin. The difficulty of getting anything like a good likeness of Saigō was very great. It is said that he was never photographed. In this we were greatly assisted by the late M. Chiossone, says Mr. Okazaki, who owned a lithographed picture of the warrior. In deciding on the design we tried a variety of experiments before we hit on the one that was eventually carried out. When it came to the preparation of the mould for casting we almost despaired at first of overcoming the difficulties encountered. No statue of such a height

* The writer refers in the American Hawaiian affair, the Kiao chun incident, and to the attitude of England during the China Japan war. had ever previously been cast in Japan. Our first and last attempt was made on December 23rd, 1897. On that occasion a number of friends had assembled to watch the experiment. Owing to the rapidity with which the metal was poured in, several of the iron hoops around the mould burst, and hence the formation of the lower part of the statue was imperfect. This we subsequently remedied by adding to the 1,200 kwamme of metal that we had already used about 300 more. The snapping of the hoops, I thought at the time, says Mr. Okazaki, meant the failure of the experiment, as it seemed certain that the shape of the figure would be spoiled, but, to the surprise of everybody, the accident resulted in an improvement on our designs, and all good judges said that the somewhat enlarged Saigō was more like the real warrior in the flesh than the reduced figure we had expected to produce. Thus did chance accomplish what art would have failed to produce.

The Kokumin Shimbun some little time ago published an article entitled "Progress in the Study of the Inhabitants of Japan during the Stone Age," in which the various theories connected with this subject are discussed in the following terms:—That the inhabitants of Japan in the stone age were not the ancestors of the present race is quite certain. There are two current learned theories as to the race to which the users of stone implements and weapons belonged. One makes them out to be Ainos, the other represents them to be that race of pit-dwellers called Koropokguru. Among Japanese archaeologists Dr. Koganei champions the former theory and Dr. Tsuboi the latter. Dr. Tsuboi has shown quite conclusively that the Ainos were not the first inhabitants of these islands. The term Koropokguru was only one of the many names applied to the beardless, peace-loving race that originally peopled the whole of Japan, and who seem to have been exterminated by the Ainos. The theory that these pit-dwellers are Esquimaux has a good many advocates, but as yet there is no proof that the Esquimaux made use of earthenware vessels, whereas numbers of such vessels have been found in the pits formerly occupied by the Koropokguru. It seems that recent explorations in the island of Shimushiri have resulted in the discovery of a number of new pits peopled by the Koropokguru, and in some of these pits a larger collection of utensils, weapons, &c., has been found than any hitherto brought to light. Dr. Tsuboi purposes visiting the island next summer, and will doubtless publish the results of his investigation.

On Lord Charles Beresford's proposed Quadruple Alliance the Gwaikōjōhō says that it was owing to the widespread ignorance of foreign affairs in Japan that the proposition was ever seriously entertained. The more the thing is thought out the more impossible it seems. Even an alliance between America and England as regards Far Eastern affairs is plainly not to be attained, America not feeling the same interest as England in keeping the door open for commerce throughout China. Even the understanding between the two countries that was reported to exist a few months ago, according to later news, is regarded as somewhat shadowy. The probability of Germany's uniting with America in the Far East was always very distant. The proposal was based on ignorance of the real state of feeling in Europe and America. Japan naturally suffers from being so far removed from the great centre of the world's movements, and things are apt to appear to her in other than their true shape. The Quadruple Alliance was never considered possible by leading statesmen in Europe, says the Gwaikōjōhō.

The interest that the Japanese are taking in other countries is on the increase, if we may judge by the number of books dealing with foreign affairs that are issued every month. Professor Mito Hiroto, we read in the Gwaikōjōhō, has just published a little work entitled "The Future of Africa," which gives an account of the colonies founded, of the industries established, and of the manner in which the various European nations represented come into competition with each other in the great continent. That these African settlements will sooner or later seriously affect the Far East goes without saying, observes Dr. Ariga. That hitherto no Japanese book giving a history of the rapid advance of Europeans in this part of the world has existed cannot but be regretted.

Mr. Takahashi Sakuyō is the author of an essay in English on International Law as illustrated by the China-Japan War, which appears in the Law Quarterly Review. Dr. Ariga considers it a great honour for a Japanese to have been able to pen an essay that should find access to such a highly technical organ as the Law Quarterly. Mr. Takahashi is still a young man and is at present studying his profession in England.

THE LU HAN RAILWAY.

It is generally understood that, as most people expected, the Belgian attempt to construct the railway from Paoingto to Hankow has broken down. The money provided by H. E. Sheng has been spent, and the money which the Belgian contractors were to furnish is not forthcoming, and the large staff of Belgian engineers dumped down in the interior without the slightest previous knowledge of the country is now being paid by H. E. Sheng. The American Syndicate has the reversion of this contract in the event of the Belgian Syndicate being unable to carry it out; but it is doubtful if the Americans will care to assume it, and they certainly will not assume it on its present conditions. The apparent decision of Great Britain that the partition of China cannot be avoided must much increase the anxiety of every one who has made loans to or contracts with China, for the embarrassments that the new order of things must produce will be endless.—N. C. Daily News.

Our contemporary published the annexed letter the following day:—

Monsieur le Rédacteur en Chef.—Je lis dans le numéro d'hier du journal North China Daily News, sous le titre "Lu Han Railway," un article relatif à l'exécution du contrat intervenu entre la Compagnie des Chemins de fer Chinois et la Société d'Etudes de Chemins de fer en Chine, à Bruxelles.

En ma qualité de représentant de cette société en Chine, j'appose le vœu le plus formel à toutes et à chacune des assertions que contient cet article.

Le contrat est punctuellement exécuté et les travaux se poursuivent activement.

J'espère, Monsieur le Rédacteur en Chef, que vous voudrez bien rectifier cet article qui est de nature à jeter le discrédit sur la Société Belge, et je vous prie d'agréer mes salutations distinguées.

L'Ingénieur Contrôleur, HUBERT.

THE INDEMNITY ACCOUNTS.

According to the Yiji, the General Budget for the 32nd fiscal year, as well as the Supplementary Estimates for the 31st and 32nd years, have been passed by the Diet with slight modifications as below. The actual prospects of the Indemnity account and the appropriations to be made from it are now pretty clear. The gross total of the Indemnity at the end of December last year stood at 364,386,087 yen, and numerous appropriations have since been made for productive and unproductive enterprises, preservation of the equilibrium of exchange, and the purchase of gold bullion. As, however, accurate accounts in connection with these items are not yet to hand, the calculations have been made, says our contemporary, on the basis of figures actually recorded at the end of last year. The details are as follow:—

	Yen.
Gross total of Indemnity...	364,386,087
Appropriations determined on Outlays for Military expansion for the first period ...	17,250,152
for the second period ...	38,358,596
Outlays for Naval expansion for the first period ...	22,192,709
for the second period ...	118,324,718
Expenses for the Organisation of the Iron Foundry ...	579,762
Special armament expenses transferred to Special accounts ...	78,957,164
Special armament expenses for the 30th year and outlays for the Correspondence Section of the Military Transport Department, brought over to General Accounts ...	8,173,579
Formosa Supplementary Outlays for the 30th year, transferred to General Accounts ...	5,959,048
Sum transferred to the Imperial Estate ...	20,000,000
Sums set apart as capital funds for Naval purposes, Calamities, and Education ...	50,000,000

Total of appropriations determined ...

...	359,795,731
Balance ...	4,590,356

The balance of 4,590,356 yen as given above must be understood as the actual amount of which the destination still remains undecided.

According to explanations given by officials to the Budget Committee in the late session of the Diet, the expenditures already settled and the estimates for the same are as below:—

	Yen.
Gross total of Indemnity...	364,386,087
Disbursements made for estimates already determined ...	179,525,114
Sum transferred to the Imperial Estate ...	20,000,000
Sums appropriated to public loan bonds and to industrial debentures ...	38,960,601
(This figure represents the balance obtained by subtracting the amount transferred to the Throne from the gross total of 59,726,461 yen in original public loans and industrial debentures.)
Amount subscribed to public loans for the 31st year ...	70,654,039
Sums disbursed in the form of loans to the General Accounts and to the Sōul Incheon Railway for the 31st fiscal year ...	7,075,351

Total of the above three items.	316,545,105
Balance ...	48,170,982

The balance as above indicated is to be carried over to the accounts for the 32nd fiscal year. The figures representing the disbursements for the 32nd year stand as follow:—

Sums to be disbursed during the 31st fiscal year by appropriations from Indemnity, but brought over to the 32nd fiscal year's account for payment ...	Yen. 26,097,915
---	--------------------

Amount to be disbursed according to the settled estimates for the 32nd fiscal year ...	31,818,363
Loans to be issued to supply the deficiency in the General Account for the 32nd fiscal year, and to provide funds for the Formosa Bank ...	9,712,838
Sums to be placed in Capital Funds, for the Navy, Natural Calamities, and Education ...	50,000,000

Total of the above four items 117,629,118

This amount, added to another to be carried forward to the 32nd fiscal year, gives the following figures:—

Amount to be brought over to the 32nd year ...	Yen. 48,170,982
Amount to be defrayed during the 32nd year ...	117,629,118

Balance (deficit) ... 69,458,135

If the outlays from Indemnity and those made in the form of public loans are added together, the results are as follows:—

Estimates of appropriations from Indemnity for the 32nd and 33rd fiscal year.

Settled amount of appropriations for the 32nd year ...	Yen. 117,629,118
Settled amount of disbursements in public loans for the 32nd fiscal year ...	29,704,861

Total ... 147,333,979

Deducting from the above total a sum of 48,170,982 yen to be carried forward to the 32nd fiscal year, there arises a deficiency of 99,162,996 yen. The corresponding accounts for the 33rd fiscal year stand as below:—

Settled amount of appropriations from Indemnity for the 33rd year ...	Yen. 23,752,738
Settled amount of disbursements in public loans for the same year ...	17,485,653

Total ... 41,238,391

The addition of this total to the deficit of 99,162,996 yen gives the following result:—

Deficit for the 32nd fiscal year ...	Yen. 99,162,996
Estimates of disbursements for the 33rd fiscal year ...	41,238,391

Total ... 140,401,387

Thus the deficit for the 32nd and 33rd fiscal years amounts to 140,401,387 yen, and has to be supplied by loans in the foreign market. As stated above, a sum of over 38 million yen is at present held in the form of public loans and industrial debentures, but it is hardly possible to sell these at home and appropriate them to supply a portion of the deficiency referred to. The figures after the 34th fiscal year representing the disbursements from Indemnity and the public loans are as follows:—

Fiscal Year.	Settled amount of appropriations from indemnity.	Settled amount of disbursements in public loans.	Total.
Yen.	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
34th...	18,232,951...	17,118,289...	35,351,240
35th...	6,773,702...	15,631,373...	22,405,075
36th...	2,952,842...	7,937,000...	10,889,842
37th...	538,385...	3,856,468...	4,394,853
38th...	72,347...	7,751,050...	7,823,397

It is said that after the 34th fiscal year the Government purposes to float loans in the foreign market, and to appropriate the same for the restoration of sums drawn from the Indemnity in excess of the original programme.

The first public analyst, according to Dr. Bernard Dwyer, was the father of William Shakespeare. The old Shakespeare was an "ale conner," and he tested liquor in his own good fashion. He would buy a quart of beer, pour it out on a bench, and then sit down on it. After a certain time had elapsed, Mr. Shakespeare would rise, and if his leather breeches stuck to the bench the innkeeper was fined for adulteration.

JUNKER CONCERT.

The third "Grand" Concert of Herr Junker's Choral and Orchestral Society was given on Wednesday, before a large and fashionable audience, at the Public Hall.

On this occasion we were glad to observe some improvements in the arrangement of the forces. The platform was extended further into the auditorium, with good acoustical results. There was also more Bass (of a sort) in the Orchestra—although the discordant drum was decidedly out of place in symphonic work. Better had nothing in the way of percussion instruments, if the orthodox lypanti are not available.

The most successful numbers of the evening were those in which our favourite soloists, vocal and instrumental, appeared. In the first part Mrs. Payne delighted us with a charming rendering of an air by Bordèse from his "Jeanne d'Arc"; and the lady was recalled with enthusiasm.

In the second part Mr. Rodolphe Schmid once more displayed his mastery of the Violoncello in a concerted movement by the eminent Belgian virtuoso, Jules de Swert. It was played in a manner which would have delighted the composer himself had he been present.

The remainder of the programme was chiefly serious music—the classical Schubert, Cherubini, and Mozart—with the semi-classic Brahms, and the romantic Schumann—all being in evidence by excerpts from their works. The performance of these need not detain us now—we shall refer to them again in our final review of the musical season about two months hence.

Subjoined is the full programme as printed:—

PART I.

- 1.—Symphony, B minor ("Unfinished") First Movement Schubert. Orchestra.
- 2.—Requiem, C minor Cherubini. Introitus, Pie Jesu, and Dies iræ Chorus.
- 3.—Aïo Solo... Asia "Jeanne d'Arc" ... Bordèse.
- 4.—Selections
a. Danish Air Victor Bendix.
b. Loin du Bal Ernest Gillet. String Orchestra.

PART II.

- 1.—Double Quartette
Song from Orlan's Fingal ... Brahms. Mrs. Irvine, Mrs. Clark, Miss Powell, Mrs. Herb, Mrs. Payne, Miss Leach, Mrs. Walter, Mrs. Wilson.
- 2.—Concerto for Violoncello Jules de Swert.
- 3.—..... Gipsy Life Schumann. Chorus and Orchestra.
- 4.—Symphony Concertante for Violin and Viola, Second Movement Mozart.
- 5.—Waltz Artist Life Strauss. Orchestra.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SUGAMO PRISON CHAPLAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In your paragraph the other day referring to the Christian chaplain now on duty at the Sugamo Prison, the impression was conveyed that the prisoners are obliged to attend religious services presided over by a Christian pastor, and to listen to prayers and sermons. This is, however, a mistake, for no religious services are held. The prisoners assemble, it is true, in three divisions every Sunday afternoon to listen to addresses by the Chaplain, but these addresses are not sermons, nor are they accompanied by prayers. As I understand the case, the rules of the prison forbid such exercises in these stated meetings, and, as it seems to me, this prohibition is both natural and proper, under the circumstances. The Chaplain appreciates the situation and seeks to live up to the spirit as well as the letter of the regulation, and aims to use such methods in his inculcation of morality as would create no reasonable dissent in the mind of the most zealous Buddhist listener. There is no such antagonism between the practical morality which a Buddhist Chaplain would represent and that which Christianity teaches as to render the course the present chaplain endeavours to follow theoretically difficult. Some Buddhist priests, certainly, seem to appreciate his work. A letter from one such priest has been shown me, which expressed a deep interest in his success and a desire to study his methods.

Mr. Tomeoka, after four years' service as chaplain in the Hokkaido prisons, visited the United States, where he spent two years in the study of the various phases of prison reform under the guidance of some of the most eminent experts in America. Through the courtesy of the Prison Commissioners of Massachusetts, he was allowed to study prison methods in the Concord Reformatory for four, ten months—a considerable part of this time actually living in the reformatory and in daily contact with the prisoners. He subsequently visited the Elmira Reformatory in New York, the most successful institution of the kind in the United States. Here he remained a month. He inspected in all some seventy prisons and allied institutions. Under the advice of his numerous friends he has, moreover, read very widely in the literature of his specialty, and is probably the best informed man on the general subject of prison reform, as exhibited in English-speaking countries, to be found in all Japan. He is employed, not because he is a Christian, but because of the fulness of his expert knowledge, and he has won the confidence of his superiors. They may feel obliged to yield to the pressure to which they are subject and dismiss him, but it will not be because they do not appreciate his equipment or the service he has rendered.

As regards distinctly religious instruction, I think I am right in saying that it will be allowed to such prisoners as may desire it, and that gatherings for formal worship, so far as they did not interfere with the discipline of the prison, would probably be allowed.

Mr. Tomeoka hopes to provide such services at an early day. The desire for them has been expressed by many, but unfortunately the three stated meetings on Sunday already referred to, which he is obliged to attend, fill up all the time which the prison schedule leaves open for the purpose.

There is every reason to believe that the Prison Bureau intends to interpret the regulations in a liberal spirit, and that it will seek to meet the wishes of the convicts in the matter of religious counsel so far as is compatible with order and discipline.

I remain, yours, etc., D. C. GREENE.

TELEGRAPH RATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The explanation of the examples you give in a late issue to illustrate the manner of counting in Japanese telegrams is somewhat misleading, inasmuch as you overlook the nigori-ed syllables, the nigori being always counted and charged for as a syllable. Thus, your first sentence, Asu gozen jinji kuru Tanaka, contains 17 telegraphic syllables, not 13, and would cost 25 sen instead of 30 sen. Similarly, your second example Dô kakeatte mo tempô de fushôchi, contains 20 syllables, not 16. Although the insertion of the nigori is not obligatory, their omission, I need scarcely say, would often render the telegrams unintelligible.

Yours truly,

W. B. M.

JAPANESE AND FOREIGN MORALITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In a letter published in last Saturday's issue of your paper Dr. Gordon undertakes to instruct the foreign public as to the superiority of the Americans as a nation to the Japanese in point of morality, and then proceeds in a most unwarranted manner to throw handfuls of mud at Dr. Katō, which mud the reverend gentleman has had supplied to him by that despicable sheet the Yoroku Chōhō, which was only the other day declared by Dr. Inouye Tetsugorō to be too immoral itself to have any claim to be heard on the subject of the morals of others. I do not mean to trouble you with a long reply to Dr. Gordon's boastful language in reference to American morality. If Dr. Gordon is satisfied with the morality shown by American newspapers, his standard is about as low as it would be possible to imagine. Dr. Gordon professes to be profoundly ignorant of the existence of the worst vice even among Sunday school-teachers and church-goers in America, but these things repeatedly come to light by means of the newspapers. I am not concerned to enlighten Dr. Gordon on these subjects. There are none so blind as those who don't wish to see. But in the name of all lovers of fairplay in the foreign community, I protest against Dr. Gordon quoting an unproven charge of a low-class newspaper in disparagement of Dr. Katō's private character. There are some charges that are too scurrilous to merit notice. What claim has the Yoroku Chōhō to elicit answers from the hundreds of men it has slandered? I regard the quotation of Dr. Gordon from the Yoroku Chōhō as a piece of mean spite and as quite unworthy of a Christian Missionary. That any public man in this or any other country should think it necessary to reply to every charge brought against him by newspapers that live on scandal is too absurd to need refutation. That Dr. Gordon should stand sponsor for such a rag as the Chōhō is astonishing. If Dr. Gordon is interested in collecting newspaper charges against the morality of individuals who profess to teach morality, we would refer him to American journals. He would do well to study such cases as that of the pious young Sunday School teacher who violated and murdered two Christian young girls and hid the corpses in a Church, and the hundreds of cases of the most contemptible hypocrisy connected with the body to which he belongs. Dr. Gordon occupies, he tells us, the position of one who is quite ignorant of the extent of American vice, but yet he ventures to assure us that it cannot be as bad as what he finds in Japan. He has the honour of being the first foreigner who has endorsed the testimony of the Yoroku Chōhō. I say endorsed, because if Dr. Gordon believed the report to be false it is hardly to be supposed that he would quote it. I could cite for Dr. Gordon's benefit charges against the morality of missionaries far more serious in character than that with which Dr. Katō has been charged. It is needless to say that I do not attach the slightest importance to such slanders. Does Dr. Gordon think that these missionaries should rush into the papers, state the charges, and refute them? They can afford to pass them over in silence and contempt. Why has Dr. Gordon one code for Dr. Katō and another for his fellow-Christians?

I am yours, &c.

"A LOVER OF FAIR PLAY."

THE OUTCOME OF THE DOSHISHA CASE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Your numerous readers will be glad to know the way in which the Doshisha Case has been settled.

The Hon. N. W. McIvor reached Yokohama on Sept. 21st of last year, having been sent by the American Board of Missions to settle, if possible, the Doshisha matter. Messrs. Davis and Learned of Kyoto, were associated with Mr. McIvor in representing the American Board in the case, and Messrs. Curtis and Gordon, of Kyoto, were also associated in consultation.

The first negotiations with the trustees of the Doshisha failed, as they refused to restore the vital principle which they had taken out of the Constitution last year, in any form.

After more than two months of effort for a peaceful settlement, it seemed as if recourse must be had to legal measures to compel the restoration of the trust, and Mr. R. Masujima was retained in the case. Just as legal proceedings were about to be commenced, at the close of last December, the Board of Trustees decided to resign; three members remaining in to legally appoint the new members, and the foreign and Japanese donors were asked to nominate ten men for the new Board of Trustees.

In the course of the following month, the foreign and Japanese donors united in nominating ten men. About the middle of February, one having declined appointment, the following nine were elected Trustees of the Doshisha; Mr. K. Tomeoka, Chaplain of the Sugamo prison, Tokyo; Mr. K. Matsuyama, one of the first Trustees of the school, now professor in the Heian Jogakko, Kyoto; Mr. J. Kono, a graduate of the school, now at the head of one of the Lubricating Oil Works in Tokyo; Mr. A. Miyaki, Pastor of a church in Osaka; Mr. T. Hori, Pastor of a church in Yokohama; Mr. J. Mayegami, one of the leading druggists of Osaka; Mr. S. Saibara, representing a district in Kochi Ken, in Parliament; Mr. H. Yamanaka, pastor of a church in Osaka; and Mr. M. Hitomi, pastor of a church in Kobe. Messrs. H. Kosaki, K. Ukita, N. Kishimoto, and K. Shimomura were also elected by the Alumni of the Doshisha.

The new Board assembled in Tokyo, Feb. 18th, and their first work, after they had been sworn in, was to rescind the action of the year before, and restore the principles of the old Constitution.

The following resolution in regard to the trust was unanimously adopted:—"Be it resolved by the Board of Trustees of the Doshisha, in order to set all possible doubts at rest, that the Board recognise and admits that, while it is invested with the title to the properties of the institution and charged with its management, it holds all the properties of the Company in trust to carry out the wishes and purposes of its original founders in accordance with the unchangeable provisions of the Constitution of the Company, promulgated under Dr. Neesima's Presidency, in September, 1888; the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in Boston, Mass., U.S.A., legally representing all the interests of the American donors, and the Japanese donors representing themselves. Be it further resolved by the said Board of Trustees, that it recognises and admits the existence of a trust as to the Harris fund, under the terms and conditions set forth in the first letter of donation of the late Hon. J. N. Harris, under date of 9th of Jan., 1890. The Board also desires to place on record the fact that, while it does not conceive that it has the right to accept any change made by Mr. Harris in his second letter, as to the legal control of the funds conveyed by his first letter, it intends to use the said second letter as an advisory document, expressive of the wishes of an honoured benefactor, and as a guide to it on all points, except the one named, in carrying out the trust." The Board also unanimously passed a resolution, giving the missionaries of the American Board the privilege of the use of the nine missionary houses in Kyoto for thirty years, free of rent. Since it had been reported that the Mission were trying to get control of the Doshisha, the representatives of the American Board gave the following declaration to the Trustees:—"We would say, on behalf of the American Board, that we recognise the full control of your body over the government and management of the Doshisha, subject only to the principles of the Neesima Constitution; and we record the fact that all that the American Board expects to ask of your body is that all connected with the institution shall show respect for the principle of that Constitution, that Christianity shall at all times be held as the basis of the moral teaching in all departments of the Doshisha."

"There is no purpose and wish on the part of the American Board to have the Doshisha changed from its original foundation, which is that of an educational institution, based upon the principles of Christianity, and having men in control of its destiny who are not antagonistic to these principles.

"There is no wish that the Doshisha shall become a Mission school, and nothing will be done by us to accomplish such a purpose.

"It is understood by us that the Christianity which is to form the basis of the moral teaching in all departments of the Doshisha, under the unchangeable principles of its Constitution, is that body of living and fundamental Christian principles believed and accepted in common by the great Christian Churches of the world."

At the second meeting of the Trustees, just held in Kyoto, they unanimously expressed their satisfaction with the above declaration, and declared that their understanding of the Christianity represented by the Doshisha, etc., was the same as we had expressed in this declaration. The Board voted to ask the American Board to cooperate with the Doshisha in furnishing money and teachers to the school, and expressed their purpose to continue the Middle School, the Girls' School, and the Theological Department.

The Board of Trustees is made in part an elective Board, and the term of office is limited to five and six years, members being eligible to re-election.

A temporary arrangement was made for the oversight of the school, for the immediate future, to give more time to select a man for the important office of President.

The new Board of Trustees have many grave problems before them to solve, but they have shown that they have a determined spirit and a faith which augurs success. Most of the present faculty of the school resign at the end of this month. Efforts are being made to secure teachers and to retain the confidence of the students.

If the Department of Education will allow the privileges granted last year to the Doshisha to remain, it will be a help to the new management, but, even though they are withdrawn, the new Board will not be discouraged, feeling that right is on their side, and that this principle of religious freedom is bound to be granted soon in Japan.

Although it has no connection with the case, the writer is glad to state that the matter of the Kumamoto houses is also settled. Several years ago, the American Board built two houses in Kumamoto for the use of its missionaries at a cost, with the land, of about $5,000, gold. The legal title was vested in the Board of Trustees of the English school in which the missionaries were teaching. These trustees promised, if at any time the houses were no longer needed for the residence of the missionaries, they should be sold with the land, and the proceeds returned to the American Board. Three or four years ago, the Government needed the land on which the house stood for military barracks. They paid about 4,000 yen for the land and for the removal of the houses. The material of the houses was sold for several hundred yen. Last April the present representatives of the old Board of Trustees returned 1,000 yen to the American Board. After much tedious negotiation, the same men, on March 4th, returned 1,000 yen more, on the giving of the following receipt by the representatives of the American Board: "While we hold that, both from a legal and a moral stand point, the whole of the money received for the two Mission houses in Kumamoto, and for the land on which they stood, should be returned to the American Board; yet, in view of all the circumstances, and in consideration of the return of 1,000 yen last April, and the return of 1,000 yen this day, the receipt of which 2,000 yen by the American Board is hereby acknowledged, we promise that the American Board will make no further legal claim in this matter, but will consider it settled." The fact that the balance of the money had probably been spent, and the desire to avoid litigation, led to the settlement of the matter in this way.

The writer wishes to bear testimony to the very great patience, tact, and ability with which Mr. McIvor has managed these long and telious negotiations, and to thank his Excellency the United States Minister for his unofficial interest in the Doshisha matter, which has been of very great service. He wishes also to express his great satisfaction that so little, almost no, personal bitterness has entered into the discussions. The retiring President, Mr. Yokoi, and the old Board of Trustees have shown a most excellent spirit in the way they have retired, three remaining in to appoint the new Board, and courteously holding over in charge of the school, until the new Board can assume said control.

However great may have been the difference in judgment which made it possible for the old Board to take the course they did in the change of the Constitution a year ago, it certainly speaks much for the power of Christian principles in the hearts of these Japanese, that the whole matter has been settled in this peaceable way, and the transfer made from the old Board to the new with no bitterness, but in a spirit of helpfulness and forbearance.

Yours, etc., J. D. DAVIS.

FIRST AID CLASSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

Sir,—I am desirous of assisting in the introduction amongst foreigners and Japanese here, of the work of the St. John First Aid, &c., Department, which has been so very successfully established under the auspices of The Grand Priory of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England, which has its Headquarters in the St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell, London, the remains of the ancient Priory. I have written to the Chief Secretary, and to-day received in advance up to date particulars helpful to those forming Classes, and propagating the good work of the organization.

I beg leave to enclose a reprint from a local paper. I will be pleased to correspond with those interested; and to reply to any enquiries, accompanied by stamped and addressed envelope.

I am Sir, yours faithfully,

C. PFOUNDERS.
Kita no Machi, Kobe, March 14th, 1899.

[From the Kobe Shipping News, of February 18, 1899.]

As it is proposed to form classes for instruction in "First Aid" in Japan, beginning in Kobe, as will be seen by the advertisement in another column, a few words of explanation—in addition to the letter published in last Saturday's issue—may be of interest to some of the readers of this journal, the more especially to those who seek health and peace in athletic sports such as cycling, boating, &c., far away from the settlement, and out of reach of prompt skilled medical aid.

When an accident happens, everybody present being over-anxious to do something, mistakes are made that—most unfortunately—have dire results; and the first thing necessary to learn is what not to do. Calmness and quiet judgment are most essential. Then it is most important to know how to convey—or read—an intelligent, and intelligible, message to the physician or surgeon summoned, so as to avoid the loss of time, that may mean, not alone prolonged excruciating torture, but actual life or death to the sufferer. If the professional aid comes promptly, and provided with the requisite remedies and appliances, the time wasted in a journey for them is saved. In the case of poisoning, &c., this may be vital.

To know how to improvise a tourniquet out of materials which are available, and to be able to effectually—and promptly—apply it, means checking, if not entirely stopping hemorrhage that might result fatally otherwise.

Placing a patient in a proper position, especially if unconscious, requires some little knowledge, such as given in the classes.

In cases of poisoning, to be able to tell the medical practitioner sent for something about the case, enables antidotes to be provided; but proper measures may and should be adopted in many cases; and an emetic administered at once—for instance—of what is almost always to be found even in the poorest inhabited places.

To construct a litter, or other means of conveyance, is not at all difficult with a little training; and to place the sufferer upon it with the least amount of pain and injury is an art readily acquired. To avoid respiration, further laceration of the flesh, blood vessels, &c., and avoiding tearing of the nerves, as a aggravation of the injury, by splinters of bone, and causing a compound fracture, &c., being most desirable, the case should be carefully examined; and provision made for removal before lifting the injured person from the spot, if possible. In removing clothing the greatest caution is absolutely necessary in most cases, for obvious reasons.

In choking—say, fish bones—particularly in the case of young children swallowing something, perhaps a part of a toy—there is no time for waiting till a doctor "comes along." Asphyxiation, by charcoal fumes, or smoke, in a dwelling on fire, as well as by immersion in water—drowning, &c.—demands prompt efforts to restore breathing of pure air, and revive circulation.

Faints, and "Fits," collapse from shock, and numerous other cases, demand very prompt and intelligent treatment. The position of the patient is all important in such instances. The tongue may fall back and stop breathing in some postures. Loosening the clothing, &c. collar specially, is in self-evident must be at once effected; and in the case of females, other articles of costume call for immediate attention on many occasions.

A broken leg may be temporarily secured by very simple means; so can an arm; and aggravation of the injury prevented. Relief to the pain, and probability of the case being more speedily cured—of least, of less serious results aggravated—are results accruing from the instruction given in the classes.

The statistics of the subject are appalling in the number of cases which have been reported to the Society since its establishment, in which the injury was prolonged and intense, and the results aggravated and made permanently more serious, even lives sacrificed through blundering and ignorance. Contrasted with the reports of the work done—which has been indeed the silver lining to the cloud of human sorrow and suffering—the tale of misery is a long one in the past. Orphans and widows left without the bread winner; toilers rendered incapable, becoming a burthen on already poverty-stricken friends; and bright lives saddened by permanent injuries, all of which might have been obviated by a very little of the knowledge and skill imparted under the auspices of "The Order."

There is nothing which is above or beyond the comprehension of those of even limited education and moderate intelligence, in the instruction of the ordinary classes; while the industrious and more enthusiastic may find ample spheres of usefulness in the cause of their suffering fellow creatures.

It is proposed in the present initial stages, to confine the work to the primary instruction of both sexes, especially when desirable—and of persons of all ages. Lessons in school have been found very useful amongst the young folk.

Larger Classes are not recommended; better results are obtained by "sorting out" the students; and the multiplying of instructors is met by enlisting the aid of advanced pupils in the classes of tyros.

Full particulars will be made available to all those who become interested in the classes and the cause of the future.

On Saturday, the 9th instant, a meeting will be held at the Occidental Hotel, to which ladies are invited. It is hoped that a strong committee of active workers will be formed. No "Dead Heads" are needed in this work, and pecuniary obligation will not be incurred by any. The small funds needed will be forthcoming in voluntary and unsolicited contributions.

All works will be entirely gratuitous on the part of helpers and instructors, at least until the members decide otherwise hereafter, and undertake to pay professional surgical and other lecturers, &c.

The parent Society has been written to; and an answer is now due. Upon the receipt of the publication, &c. and authority, a further public meeting will be in order, to place the local Society on a permanent basis.

In the meanwhile it is hoped that some progress will be made in the preliminary instruction and drill against further delay and loss of valuable time. The season for sports and athletics is approaching; and with the increase of the number of "Coles" in use, accidents are becoming proportionately more frequent.

Come in your thousands, and nominate your Committee and Officers. All we wisher will be cordially welcome, especially the fairer sex, and better half of humanity—"The Ladies bless them."

SOUL NOTES.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Soul, March 8th.

Spring is at hand, and the lull in the political storm bids fair to be broken. There are signs of activity in the political as well as in the natural world. The Independent's English edition died with the old year, and The Korean Repository announced that it would suspend publication for a year, but the management changed its mind and we have The Weekly Repository trying to fill the vacuum. Several of the native papers, well known for progressive tendencies, have promptly changed with the change of party, and are now supporting the Conservatives.

During the lull, the Peddlers who were left out in the cold in November, have managed, in that mysterious way in which things are accomplished here, to gather strength again. It is generally believed that among the two-score or more magistacies dealt out at New Year the majority fell into the lap of the zealous leaders, but the rank and file have volunteered the unwelcome information that they were not after offices but wished to pursue the work of the organization as carried on in the palmy days of the Peddlers' Guild. They intimated, in fact, that the time had arrived for the reorganization of the Guild. As the one-time President is now safely anchored in the Agricultural Department, the re-establishment of the Guild seems assured. What the people will say remains to be seen.

The arrival of the astute young Russian Chargé d'Affaires, and the recollection of his masterful diplomacy in China, has put the community on the qui vive for incidents. He seems to have got hold of the reins, and, as the result of a private audience of two hours and a half on the 4th inst., gave us something to talk about. The well-known and well-tried pro-Russian Korean statesmen, of whom Cho Pyeungik and Min Chongmuk stand forth prominently, are again being heard from, and their names appeared to-day in the papers as being among the officials "reserved." It is the general opinion here that it is only a matter of time before the expected happens, unless, as is often the case here, the unexpected should happen.

The whaling question is up again. It is the old question of open ports along the eastern coast into which Russian whalers can enter after a successful cruise. The Whaling Company is represented by Count Keyserling, and he has asked for three ports, two in Kwangwon province and one in Hamkyung. The Koreans have shown considerable reluctance in granting this concession, but it is thought the trend of events is sufficiently pro Russian for the Company to succeed this time.

The Minister of Education and Acting Minister of Law, Sin Kison, known especially among foreigners for writing an abusive article or booklet during his term of office several years ago against Western notions, peoples, customs, and religions, has undergone no change of mind, notwithstanding his connection for a while with the Independence Club. He still believes in the virtue of female ignorance and in the merit of idleness. It is due to his opposition, so the Weekly Repository informs us, that the item for girls' schools and industrial schools was struck out of the Budget.

A strange story is related by the Korean Repository. It appears that outside the West Gate of Soul live a number of female exorcists. Last year five of these women, with their "consorts," children, and goods, went north into the provinces on a tramp. After two months' working through Whanghai they passed into Hamkyung, living on what the women made in the villages and hamlets. The trade proved flourishing, and the men taking charge of the money accumulated over $200 each. This money the men took into the Magistracy of Ko-won and tried to purchase orders on Soul. The thing became known to the local police, and they seized the men and the servants with them, ten in all, charging them with being robbers. Probably this was the first time private people had ever ventured into Ko-won and exhibited such a sum of money. The men, however, refused the charge of being robbers, but the entire ten were subjected to such torture by the constables that one of them died the next day, and another one the following day. The local prefect being absent and a neighbouring official having jurisdiction, the women appealed to him for help, and he ordered the eight men living to be removed to his town. He saw they were in a hopeless case, and, fearing to become involved in the unpleasantness, he refused to do anything and sent the unfortunate back to Ko-won. Here they were set upon again by their captors and so beaten that they became badly crippled. Their money was by this time all gone and when the new magistrate came to Ko-won the matter was so represented to him that of the remaining men seven were executed on the 21st of the Seventh Moon, and a blind man left as the only survivor of the ten. About this time the women came back with their earnings, hoping to release the men. Of this they were also robbed and badly abused. They escaped, however, and came to Soul. Recently one of the runners from Ko-won was identified in the streets of Seoul by one of the women and placed under arrest. He acknowledges the killing, but throws the blame on the constables.

The superintendence of gold mines, which was taken from the Imperial Household Department and placed under the Department of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works last year, has once more been placed with the Imperial Household. Mr. Yi Yong-ik has been gazetted as the Imperial Superintendent again, the position he held when he was impeached by the People's Party last autumn. One of his first acts was to nullify a concession made to a Korean of mines in the Whang Hai province. The angry concessionaire immediately sought him and started on a philippic which Mr. Yi interrupted with the request that he should go and deliver his speech to the Independence Club.

Stone fights still occupy the attention of the Koreans. The warriors of the river suburbs of Seoul had a collision recently and one man was killed. The government is making a serious effort to suppress this dangerous recreation.

The destruction of the Temple of the God of War continues to occupy the attention of the papers. One story in connection with it tells of a woman who was found in the streets with lighted incense sticks in her hands, saying that she was in search of the sword of the god. When asked what caused the fire she said that Kwan-wang the god had determined to join the reform side so he had set fire to his temple and come forth among the people. Over $20,000 has been subscribed by Koreans and Chinese for the rebuilding of the Temple.

A great fire has devastated five hamlets in Mu-chu, North Chulla. Several lives were lost and sixty-two houses were destroyed.

Among the primary schools opened in Seoul recently was one for girls under the auspices of the Korean Ladies' Club. It starts with an enrollment of over 20 students and hopes for government recognition.

In response to a demand of the Chinese Minister the Korean houses in the new Chinese concession at Chemulpo are to be removed. No fewer than 121 houses are involved.

CHINA NOTES.

The North-China Daily News is authorised to state that the Russian Consul-General at Shanghai, Mr. Laptew, has never protested against the proposed extension of the Cosmopolitan Settlement, the desire of the Russian Government being to act in perfect accord with the British Government in the matter. Continuing, our contemporary says:—It does not seem to strike those who are so anxious to magnify and dwell upon any differences of opinion that may arise at any time in the Consular Body in reference to this subject, that they are thereby playing into the hands of the Chinese, who are only too anxious to make use of such differences as an argument for delaying the execution of their engagements.

The steamer Thornhill, from New York to Shanghai with a general cargo, has been in collision at Algiers, where she called to coal, and will be delayed for repairs.

The Peiho is gradually getting worse. Orders have been given that the lighters are not to load deeper than seven feet. Several that loaded outside the bar to 8 ft. 6 in. had to be lightened by native boats on entering the river. In the Tangku reach there is only ten feet at low water, and, consequently, captains are somewhat fearful, whilst navigating the reach, lest the anchors of vessels moored there be out of the centre of the line of moorings. The bar is also in an unsatisfactory condition.

The death of Mrs. H. P. Wilkinson, wife of the Crown Advocate at Shanghai, was due to pneumonia. It aroused widespread regret.

News has been received from Peking that an edict had been sent to Li Hung-chang to remain at Shantung to superintend the work of the conservation of the Yellow River, and that owing to this edict H.E. Li will have to stay in Shantung for some time to come.

News was received by the last mail of the death on the 24th of January last of Captain Robert Cass, of Hongkong. He was at one time one of the best-known and most popular captains on the coast, having commanded the Ningpo for many years until she was put under the German flag, and then the Carisbrook, Argay, and Cheindra of the Indo-China line, between Calcutta and Hongkong. He was buried at Nunhead Cemetery on the 28th of January.

The death occurred on the 11th March of the Tartar General of Lower Manchuria (Feng-chen), E kô-t'ang-à, in his yamen in Moukden. The deceased was sixty-eight years old at the time of his death, and during the late war with Japan showed himself to be the only Chinese General who had any knowledge of handling large bodies of troops and moving them about the country in proper order and discipline. The North China Daily News is of opinion that, had it not been for the deceased General's able defence of Liaoyang, the city of Moukden would have been captured by the Japanese armies soon after they crossed the Yalu into Manchuria.

During the launching of a German tender from S. C. Farnham's dock at Hongkew on March 14, Prince Henry of Prussia was struck on the head by a piece of wood that fell from the vessel's bow, and rather badly cut. The Prince applied a handkerchief to the wound, and covered the same with his hat. He, however, entered into the subsequent proceedings as though nothing had occurred.

Orders have been received by Yu Hsien, acting Tartar General of Nanking (Kiang-ning), from Peking commanding him to arm and drill at once all the Tartar troops in the Liaukiang provinces, according to modern methods; the arms and ammunition for the purpose to be furnished by the Viceroy Liu. The same instructions have also been sent to the Tartar Generals at Hangchow and Foochow. According to the latest census (1896) of able-bodied Tartars in the three Viceroys' provinces noted above, there are 14,800 in Nanking and Chinkiang; 16,553 in Hangchow and Chapoo; and 9,674 in Foochow.

The native correspondent of a vernacular paper writes that recently a disastrous accident occurred on the Lu Han railroad, outside the Tungchi gate of Hankow, which has been constructed up to the Yu Hu, a lake with a strong current running. A bridge to span this lake was in course of construction, but suddenly the temporary bridge on which the men worked gave way and over 200 workmen, including a foreign engineer, were drowned.—Mercury.

The delimitation of the territory leased by the Russians in Manchuria and the Liaotung Peninsula is not yet completed, says a Shanghai contemporary, as the demands of the Russians have a constant tendency to grow. It is understood that Russia did make a claim to the Miaotao Islands at the mouth of the Gulf of Pechili; but the Tartar General at Moukden declined to entertain the claim on the ground that the islands were not in his jurisdiction, but in that of the Governor of Shantung.

Jung Lu, the Generalissimo of all the forces in Chihli province, has received express commands from the Empress Dowager to mass all troops under his command in June next in the Southern Hunting Park, where they are to unite with the Peking Field Force and the New and Old Imperial Guards in a grand review before the Empress Dowager. It is computed that nearly 200,000 well-armed men will be under arms on the occasion. It is more than likely, says the Daily News, that the opportunity will be taken to proclaim a new Emperor.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The new hospital ship Hakuai Maru, built in England to the order of the Japan Red Cross Society, is expected shortly in Yokohama.

The property No. 171 and 173 Bluff with the buildings thereon, was sold at public auction yesterday by Mr. Jno. W. Hall to Mr. F. Reiz for the sum of yen 11,200.

A despatch from the Japanese Consul at Townsville states that a typhoon has swept over the north coast of Queensland and over 150 Japanese engaged in collecting pearl-shell were killed.

The death is announced of Mr. F. A. Cope. Deceased was a well-known resident at Yokohama, and formerly occupied a good position, being especially prominent in the field of sport. His later years, however, were spent in poverty and obscurity.

A pair of curtains in a bedroom of the Grand Hotel were set on fire by the overheating of a stove on Monday afternoon. The flames were observed almost immediately, and a few buckets of water sufficed to extinguish them.

Mr. R. McCance, Marshal of the United States Consulate, fell from his bicycle while riding with his wife and daughter from Tokyo on Sunday, and broke two upper ribs. He pluckily rode back to Yokohama in his injured condition, and was at once medically attended. His injuries will enforce inactivity for some time.

At 4.55 on Monday morning a fire broke out at the house of Mr. M. Hirai, Manager of the Japan Industrial Bank, 3, Koyamacho, Mita, Shiba. Fanned by the strong west wind the flames spread rapidly, and, these being many official residences, including Count Matsukata's house, in the locality, great confusion prevailed. Owing, however, to the strenuous efforts of the firemen the flames were extinguished by 5.10 a.m., after ten houses had been burnt down. A coolie named Kobayashi Chokichi (57) died from excitement.

A boy named Kimura Kinnauke (20), in the employ of the Normal Dispensary, 77, Settlement, Yokohama, recently absconded with 39 yen and 84 sen and a cheque for 95 yen 16 sen. He failed, however, in his attempt to cash the cheque at the Meitai Bank. On Tuesday another boy belonging to the same establishment ran off with the cash-box containing about 45 yen.

At last experiments with wireless telegraphy have been made over a distance of twelve miles across a quick-running sea, and this in the wildest weather. A few weeks ago the wind pressure on the English coast was very great and on one occasion was said to have attained, if not passed, all previous records in London. Yet from the East Goodwins lightship to the South Foreland lighthouse messages were transmitted, not merely by the hands of experts working under the personal direction of Signor Marconi, the inventor of the system, but by the lightship hands who have been instructed in it.

On Saturday morning, at the Yokohama Chiho Saibansho, two coolies named Yoshikawa Kotaro and Matsuo Seinosuke were charged before Judge Katsura with theft. While they were engaged at work on the French mail steamer Oceanien on the 14th inst., Seinosuke cut a kori open with his accomplice's knife and they stole 35 bundles of silk valued at 46 yen 66 sen. Kotaro, who has been before the same court many times on similar charges, was sentenced to 4 months' imprisonment with hard labour, and the other man to 4 months' major imprisonment, with police surveillance for six months.

The following are the rules for the examination of officers of the British Indian services in Chinese: The examination will be held in Burmah by the Adviser on Chinese Affairs, between April 16 and May 15, and during September, each year. The names of officers who pass the preliminary examination will be sent to the Deputy Adjutant-General then in command, and they will be allowed to proceed to Peking for one year, where they will be examined by the First Chinese Secretary after nine months' residence. Those who pass will get free passage to and from China and Barmah, but failures will pay their own expenses.

This is the kind of news we get when we go abroad for it. The San Francisco Call publishes it as a despatch:—

Madrid, Feb. 28.

The Reforma asserts that it has received letters from reliable sources at Manila saying thirty cannon, 30,000 rifles, and several million cartridges from Japan have been landed at Sual, on the Gulf of Lingayen, on the west coast of the island of Luzon, and about 100 miles from Manila, and have been taken thence to Malolos, the seat of the rebel government. The Reforma adds:—"Japan evidently intends to act towards the Americans in the Philippines as the Americans acted toward the Spanish in Cuba."

A private letter from Manila states that rather heavy fighting was going on at San Pedro on the morning of the 4th instant, the result of which was not known. The loss on the American side, from the 4th of February to the 3rd March, was stated to be 90 killed (which includes 8 officers) and about 300 wounded. On the side of the Filipinos 4,200 dead had been buried, but the numbers of the wounded were not known, as these were carried off the field. Our information does not state the source from which these figures were obtained.

In spite of Prince George's efforts to deal impartially in Crete, it seems that a Mohammedan exodus is impending. What has happened in Thessaly may well happen in Crete. When Thessaly was first handed over to Greece, there was a general migration of the Moslem population into the Turkish territory. When it was seen that the Greeks were acting fairly, there was a reaction and many returned; but they are now emigrating again, for the Turk cannot breathe freely on Christian land. The difficulty of finding suitable marriages for their daughters is the greatest obstacle to their accepting any régime but that of Islam.

About 3 a.m. on Friday, a housebreaker entered the Shigitatan restaurant, Oiso, and with his face covered with an old handkerchief approached the master, named Usan (77), with a dagger. The latter, who had been awakened by his wife, quick as thought took up a nyoi (a kind of bento carried by Buddhist priests,) and engaged in a hand-to-hand fight with the burglar. His nyoi being broken, the old man was severely wounded on the forehead and his eyes were blinded by the flow of blood. The wife, after reproaching the thief with wounding such an old man, gave him a purse containing yen 150. He took it, as well as yen 10 and two suits of clothes. The matter was reported to the Oiso Police, and the offender was arrested the same day. He proved to be Horiguchi Takizo, already known to the police.

Lieutenant Innes, formerly of the British Navy, has invented a new submarine torpedo-boat, a trial of which has just taken place in Sydney Harbour, Australia, before the Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Pearson. The boat is cigar-shaped, and pointed at both ends; and it was made in seven different engine shops to ensure secrecy. It is only 15 ft. long, but as its performance was in every way satisfactory a larger model, to hold six men, will be at once constructed. The driving power is electricity, and compressed air is supplied for the occupants. The man in the conning-tower can handle the vessel, or it can be managed from below. It is built of brass, thicker on the underside than on the top to give it trim. The engines are amidships and drive a shaft which turns the stern wheel. A second propeller works at the end of a vertical shaft directly under the centre of the vessel, and causes the disappearance and re-appearance of the torpedo-boat.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A strange story is printed in San Francisco papers just to hand. It comes originally from Sydney and tells how a dead man won a bicycle race there. A big electric light bicycle carnival had been organised, and for one race some 50 entries were received. Some 10,000 people watched this particular event, which was for a magnificent cup, offered by the trustees of the Sydney Cricket Club. James Somerville at the start quickly forged ahead, closely followed by another crack rider named Percy Cliff. They left forty eight riders away in the rear and shot around the brilliantly lighted track almost wheel to wheel. The applause was deafening as the men entered the last lap. When within twenty five yards of the tape Somerville, who still led by half a wheel, was seen to relax his hold on the handlebars. His pedals whirled round, however, and he pluckily held his position on the wheel. Five yards from the tape Cliff put on a tremendous spurt and struck Somerville's hind wheel, shooting the machine with its then almost inanimate burden like a rocket under the tape. The crowd yelled wildly, but a silence like death ensued when Somerville, after crossing the tape, plunged headforemost from the machine on the hard track. When he was picked up he was dead. The doctors who examined him immediately afterwards said that a dead man had by the strangest freak of fate and fortune actually won the hottest cycle race ever witnessed in Australia. They declared that the unfortunate rider must have been stricken with heart failure when he was first seen to relax his hold on the handlebars on the last lap. How he succeeded in finishing the race is a puzzle to them. In the race in which young Somerville won the cup and lost his life fifteen riders were injured. They claimed the electric lights were uncertain. In sporting circles an effort is being made to do away with night tracks, as it is claimed they are dangerous. The government will be petitioned to this effect.

The findings and sentence of the court-martial that tried Lieutenant-Colonel Fide, First Washington Regiment, U.S.A., have been announced. He was convicted of "neglect of duty and conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline" in violation of the sixty-second article of war. The sentence is one month's suspension from rank, in addition to the confinement inflicted during his five weeks of arrest, and loss of one month's pay, $250. The accusation against him was debauchery on the Government transport Valencia in Manila harbour on Thanksgiving evening.

A Tacoma dispatch under date February 26th says:—"President Hill, of the Great Northern Railway, is reported to have hired A. B. Wolvin of Duluth at $40,000 a year to organize a new line of steamships to ply between Puget Sound and the Orient in connection with the Great Northern. Hill is not satisfied with his road's present connection with the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and is ambitious to establish a line of modern American steamships. Wolvin is expected to build or lease boats as rapidly as possible.

Bishop Christie of Vancouver has been appointed to the archdiocese of Oregon, made vacant by the death of the late Archbishop Gross. Bishop Christie was the favourite candidate for the high position of Archbishop of Oregon with both clergy and laity. Bishop Christie comes from an old American family, his ancestors having resided in Vermont, his native State, for several generations. He obtained his education in Montreal and was consecrated in St. Paul by his uncle, Archbishop Ireland, June 29, 1898, at the age of 41. He had successfully presided over parish churches in South Minnesota and in Minneapolis.

Sensational weddings are confined to no particular class in the United States, even the clergy being sometimes given to celebrating such an event on lines outside the ordinary.

Recently, when a certain train drew into Healdsburg, the Rev. J. Waldrop of Healdsburg and Mrs. Helen L. Jones of Dry Creek Valley boarded the train; soon after the Rev. M. S. Eby entered the car in which were the Rev. Mr. Waldrop and his fiancée. There, in the presence of the interested passengers, during the short halt of the train, Rev. Mr. Eby performed the marriage ceremony uniting Rev. Mr. Waldrop and Mrs. Jones. Then the newly married pair continued their journey to San Francisco.

Telegraphing to the New York Sun on Feb. 27, a Washington correspondent said—It was announced to-day that another proof of Germany's good will had been given in connection with the severe restrictions imposed on American life insurance companies in that country. Three of the great American life insurance companies—the Mutual, New York Life, and Equitable—closed their main offices in Berlin some time ago, as they were unwilling to submit to certain severe rules of inspection imposed upon the home companies and which would have forced the American companies to keep special sets of books for the use of Berlin officials at an expense wholly disproportionate to the profit on policies issued in Germany. The Prussian authorities having in the meanwhile, it is said, convinced themselves of the rigour of the system of inspection established by the decree, have now taken the first step toward removing the restrictions. Two counsellors of the state, Baron von Bieberstein and Herr Hopps, representing the Prussian Ministry of the Interior, have been directed to proceed to this country to confer with the heads of the three life insurance companies and agree, if possible, on a method of inspection which will not entail on the American associations an additional and useless expense. The three companies offered to pay the expenses of such a commission, but to indicate its good will the Prussian Government has decided to meet that cost itself.

The progress of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's illness, to judge by the long telegrams appearing in San Francisco papers, was followed with breathless interest. At first it was feared that a fatal termination was imminent and accordingly the following "scare heads" appeared:—

RUDYARD KIPLING NEAR TO DEATH.

NO IMPROVEMENT IN HIS CONDITION.

RALLIES OCCASIONALLY, BUT NOT FOR LONG.

KIPLING'S LOSING FIGHT FOR LIFE.

HOPELESS REPORTS FROM HIS BEDSIDE.

OXYGEN IS ADMINISTERED.

HEROIC TREATMENT AS A LAST RESORT.

SMALL HOPE FOR KIPLING.

THE GREAT AUTHOR LOSING IN HIS FIGHT FOR LIFE.

By March 1st, however, it was evident that the worst was over and that recovery was merely a matter of time and nursing.

Assistant Secretary Howell, of the U.S. Navy, has approved the findings of the Court Martial on Engineer William C. Meyer of the cutter Hugh McLaughlin. Meyer succeeded to the command of the engineer-room on the sudden death of the engineer during the battle of Manila and was on continuous duty for fifty five hours. When the vessel reached Yokohama, on her way to San Francisco, Meyer, it was charged, indulged in too much liquor and was absent from the ship. He was court-martialed, and in view of the extenuating circumstances, he was sentenced to reprimand and reduction in number.

What is thought to be wreckage from the steamship Pelican, which sailed from Seattle October 12th, 1897, for Taku, North China, laden with railroad lumber and ties, and of which nothing has since been heard, has been reported to the local Hydrographic Office by Captain A. V. Brown of the British bark Colingrove, which arrived at Shanghai on January 8th. Captain Brown, says in latitude 29 deg. 46 min. north, longitude 127 deg. 40 min. east, he passed through a large number of railroad sleepers of Oregon pine which had the appearance of not having been in the water a great length of time. The Custom-house records show that all vessels laden with railroad lumber and ties for the Orient for the past eighteen months have arrived at their destination.

ST. GEORGE'S SOCIETY.

A meeting of members and persons interested in this Society was held on Monday evening at Keil's Building, Mr. W. W. Tilt presiding.

The CHAIRMAN remarked that the papers had stated that Welshmen could be eligible for membership, but that was not so, though the matter of their eligibility was raised at the last meeting. At the termination of the last meeting 30 members had joined the society; to-day there were 40—(hear, hear). That was a considerable increase, but even so did not come up to the expectations of some of them, considering the size of the English community. There were many, it appeared, who would be willing to join the Society if the charity clause was omitted, their idea being that the Society should be merely for the celebration of St. George's Day. As far as he (the Chairman) was concerned he should be glad to see the idea of a charity section retained, but they did not want a split, and he thought it would be advisable to meet the wishes of the other party in this respect. He proposed that, if this part of the Society's objects was dropped, the subscription should be reduced to one yen, which was sufficient to pay expenses of printing, &c. There were some who thought there was no necessity for the Society, and considered that Englishmen could without its assistance club together to celebrate St. George's Day; but he thought it was desirable that the Society should be continued. If a hall was given they should want at least 50 subscribers; The cost would be about 1,500 yen.

The basis of constitution was then considered, and on the proposition of Mr. HARTLAND, seconded by Mr. R. G. E. FORSTER, it was decided to omit the charity proposal.

Mr. FLINT KILBY suggested that the proposer should give his reasons, and Commander SQUIRE said there was a feeling among some of the persons interested in the society that this part of its constitution should be retained.

The CHAIRMAN said a section of the community felt that there were already sufficient charities in the Settlement. The charity calls on some men were very heavy already, and others had calls at home. As, too, they had decided to limit the subscription to two yen the charity scheme could not in any case be on a very grand scale.

The amendment was carried, and the subscription fixed at one yen.

It was also decided that St. George's Day should be celebrated by a ball, on April 21st or 25th, that intending subscribers should send in their names by March 27th, that the subscription should not exceed to yen, that the acceptance of invitation should be limited to 500, members having the privilege of inviting guests at two yen each, and that Englishmen not members of the society should be ineligible as guests unless they were sons of subscribers.

These propositions were carried on the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. HEALING. Some amusement was caused by Mr. F. E. WHITE suggesting that the word "respectable" in the rule admitting "all respectable Englishmen" to membership—should be omitted. No one, he said, cared to be called respectable.

The CHAIRMAN, however, was for the retention of the word, and on a division it was decided, amid some laughter, to stick to the phrase.

Mr. T. L. was elected President and Mr. Flint Kilby Vice-President, and on a ballot the following were chosen as the Committee:—Messrs. L. J. Healing, H. J. Sharp, F. J. Hall, D. F. Hoskyn, M. Beart, R. G. E. Forster, and Easton.

Other details were left to the Committee.

THE LEOPOLD BANKRUPTCY.

RESUMED EXAMINATION.

REMARKABLE EVIDENCE.

The public examination of Charles Emil Leopold, a bankrupt, now undergoing imprisonment in H.M.'s Jail at Yokohama, was resumed on Friday morning before His Honour Judge Wilkinson. Mr. J. F. Lowder appeared for the petitioning creditors, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, and also for Ahrens and Co., Nachfolger. Mr. A. B. Walford represented the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, Limited, and Professor Terry, of Tokyo, appeared for the debtor. Mr. C. D. Moss (the Official Receiver) was also present.

The debtor was called and further examined by Mr. Lowder.

Mr. Lowder—I asked you on the last occasion whether you could prepare a list of unsold stocks valued at 30,000 yen which you assigned to Ahrens, and Co. Have you been able to do that?

Debtor—I have not been able to prepare that list. I cannot do it myself, it must be done from London. I believe Ahrens and Co. got a list from London from my brother. It is impossible to make it up from my books. At that time the amount must have been much greater than 30,000 yen.

Here is a letter addressed by you to, I presume, your brother, dated 11th May, 1898. Is that not so?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder read the letter which stated that the writer had got into difficulties through doing too much on too small a capital and had been compelled to resign from Ahrens & Co. He was realising on all he possibly could and should devote attention to coal again. He instructed his brother in London not to remit on account of Ahrens and Co., the original telegram of £1,500 being cancelled, but to arrange sale of goods to meet drafts drawn on him. He—the writer—did not mean to "chuck things into the street," but he must leave it to his brother's discretion. He hoped the London Leopold had not been speculating, as the funds in his hands were badly needed in Yokohama. He (Charles Emil Leopold) had informed Ahrens and Co. that the stocks of paper, straw-bad, &c., in London were worth 30,000 yen.

Debtor—There is a footnote to that letter, Mr. Lowder.

Mr. Lowder—Yes, to the effect that F. Uyeda believed this to be an under-estimate.

Mr. Lowder—Where did you get the information as to the value of the stock?—I got it through talking over with Uyeda, and from my books at the time. I could only do it approximately.

But couldn't you do it approximately now?—

No, it's such a long time, it's nearly a year ago.

On the 21st you wrote to your brother two letters—one private and one official. Are they these? (produced).—Yes.

The first begins:—

"My Dear Eddy,—With reference to the assignment—"

That is, I presume, the assignment to Ahrens & Co.?

Debtor—Yes.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—

"With reference to the assignment you will understand that any goods which you have hypothecated yourself must remain to their account."

What does that mean?

Debtor—To the people we borrowed money from. Some goods were hypothecated to brokers.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—

"And furthermore you will have to provide out of the fund now in your hands sufficient to cover the drafts falling due."

Had he any knowledge of the drafts falling due at that date?

Debtor—Yes.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—

"This must be the first consideration of all, and the surplus, less of course your charges, will belong to Ahrens. You will therefore make up all account sales to date and let me know how I stand with you. It is not necessary for you to deliver any accounts to Ahrens, but send me the documents as quickly as possible and I will hand all that is necessary to the firm here."

Did you get those account sales?

Debtor—Yes, some of them; not all.

Did you hand any to Ahrens?—No, there were no surplus proceeds.

This is the other letter—the official one:—

"I have to inform you that I have by deed assigned to Ahrens and Co. all and any sums of money now due or henceforth to become due from you to me on account of any goods or merchandise or any proceeds of sale of all or any goods or merchandise which I have sent or consigned to you, either on your orders or for the purposes of sale. The above does not apply to goods you have hypothecated to private bankers or goods which you hold on your own account."

What is meant by "goods which you hold on your own account?"—I meant anything which did not belong to me. I did not know whether he might have anything on his own account. I don't know his private affairs.

What did you mean by private bankers?—By private bankers I meant if he had taken up advances on any goods which I had sent.

Not "goods which were held on your own account?"—I don't know that he had any goods on his own account or not.

I should read this to mean goods which had been consigned to C. E. Leopold & Co., by you and which they themselves had taken over and paid for; is that so?—No, it doesn't mean that at all.

Do you recognise this letter (produced) dated 11th June, 1898, as having been addressed to you by C. E. Leopold and Co.?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—I call your attention to this paragraph in the letter:—

"Of course I will do all to transfer to H. A. and Co. with margin."

Was that a reply to the letter that I have just read dated 21st May?—It could not be a reply to that, could it? It was a reply to a telegram, I suppose. At Mr. Walford's request I telegraphed those instructions in that letter.

What is this margin referred to?—I expect he meant by margin all surpluses over and above the amount I asked him to transfer.

How much did you ask him to transfer?—I didn't mention the amount in the telegram. The telegram was simply to transfer all surpluses to H. Ahrens & Co.

Is that telegram here?—I don't think so. It was sent by Ahrens and Co.

Did that surplus imply any definite amount?—Yes, I assumed 30,000 yen. I estimated it from my books, and by conversations with Uyeda, but I could not tell the exact amounts. The goods were chiefly wall-paper.

And according to your brother's account almost worthless at that. Did he not write that it was ruinous to send such stuff home?—I don't remember his writing that.

Wasn't he continually making complaints as to the wall paper you were sending home?—Yes, but that was with an object.

Yes—and what?—To force the Japanese to improve the quality. They were translated for the Japanese department.

And they were not strictly true?—Yes; in some instances. But there is a tendency among Japanese when the prices are lowered to bring down the quality.

Is it not true that this paper was of very inferior quality—worthless or almost worthless, as your brother reports?—No, I should not say it was worthless, or almost worthless.

On the 11th June you say you estimate the value of wall paper alone in the hands of your brother at 30,000 yen?—Not wall paper alone, but also shells, feathers, and strawbraid.

On 15th July was this letter written to C. E. Leopold and Co. by a Mr. Lloyd for you?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—This is the letter:—

"DEAR SIR,—Enclosed please find list of goods for which we have not yet received account sales. Please look over your papers and see if you have any lying about, as it seems impossible that goods should have been lying so long in London, some since the middle of August of 1895, without being sold. Should account sales for any goods have been received by you and forwarded on to us kindly let us have duplicates, as they must have been lost. Wall-paper is not included in this list, and of this you have a large stock on hand."

At that time were you under the impression that your brother had in his possession for which he had not accounted goods other than wall paper of £8,672 plus 48 820 yen?—Yes. I should think they should have arrived by that time. They had all been drawn against.

Then the 30,000 yen which you supposed were in the hands of your brother was distinct from this?—It would be the surpluses on that and the value of wall-paper.

I have been unable to find any accounts current from C. E. Leopold and Co. Have you received any?—No.

Never?—No. I have only had books of account sales.

Mr. Lowder—I have been unable to find those either.

Debtor produced a number of books.

Mr. Lowder—How is that there are no accounts current?—I have asked my brother several times, but he has never sent them.

I call your attention to a letter addressed to C. E. Leopold and Co. by yourself dated 21st July, 1898. There is this paragraph:

"With reference to my telegram instructing you to pay all surplus money to Messrs. Ahrens and Co. of course you will understand you must take up all drafts on you, and pay all your outstanding bills before paying them a penny. All drafts which I have drawn upon you must all be met, and I hope you have not misunderstood my instructions on this point."

Mr. Lowder—What was the amount of those drafts which you instructed him to meet before paying Ahrens and Co. a penny?—All my drafts drawn on him. My copybook will show you.

I am not asking you to refer me to your copybook, I am asking you to refer to them if necessary, and give me a reply to my question.—I can do so, but it will take some time.

Mr. Lowder—We have had an adjournment for a week for you to prepare your explanation of this point; refer to any books you like and answer the question.

Debtor then examined a number of books and at the conclusion Mr. Lowder read out the following list of drafts and bills of exchange:—

The Chartered Bank—December 16th, 1897, bill of exchange £99-1-3, at 2-0-0; December 16th, £758-6-8 ditto; January 14th, 1898, £1350, at 2-0-0; January 20th, £60-17-4 at 2-0-0; January 24th, £461-11-2, at 2-0-0; January 31st, £100-5-2, at 2-0-0; February 12th, £80-19-11, at 2-0-0; February 14th, £778-4-4, ditto; February 17th, £164-11-8, ditto; February 19th, £833-6-8 ditto; February 21st, £758-6-8 ditto; total, £6110-1-1.

The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank—Jan. 4th, 1898, yen 1,384-61; March 8th, 1898, yen 2,745-51; March 14th, yen 1,739-69; March 16th, yen 2,676-01; March 22nd, yen 3,402-94; March 26th, yen 3,579-57; March 31st, yen 2,227-84; April 1st, yen 2,134-52; April 6th, yen 1,091-91; April 12th, yen 3,240-51; total yen 24,322-11.

Mr. Lowder—Are those all?

Debtor—Yes, those are all, so far as my recollection goes.

Roughly speaking between 80,000 and 85,000 yen, is it not?—Yes, I suppose so.

And had you advised your brother of all these drafts?—Yes.

So that when you wrote him on 21st July that the drafts on you must be paid before a penny was paid to Ahrens and Co. you referred to this?—Not all; some of them had been paid already. I referred to a part of these drafts.

And you then believed that after meeting drafts to the extent of 85,000 yen there would be a surplus of 30,000 yen for Ahrens and Co.?—I could not say what the surplus would be then, all the goods being so fearfully depreciated.

The date of your deed of assignment to Ahrens and Co. is dated 21st July. When did the depreciation of your goods commence?—It commenced the moment my affairs became public property.

And you say the value of these goods has dwindled to nothing?—Yes, the surplus has dwindled to nothing. Straw braid has sold at a shilling that should have been sold at 1s. 10d.; and paper has sold for 1/- that was contracted for 12/-.

Did you inform Ahrens and Co. of this dwindling in the value of your assets?—No, because I thought from their action that Ahrens and Co. did not wish to take cognizance of any of my assets.

Did you make an offer through the late Mr. Keil or Mr. Langfeldt to pay 50,000 yen cash down and a further sum of 25,000 yen per annum until the whole of your indebtedness was discharged if they would withdraw the prosecution against you?—My offer was through Mr. Langfeldt, and was for 50,000 yen within 12 months, to be followed by 25,000 yen every six months after that date. That was provided further prosecution, either civil or criminal, was withdrawn, and on the further intimation that I should be unable to control my Japanese interests provided this case came into Court, as I had then already had considerable trouble in keeping my bantō in, and in providing for interest on mortgages, &c.

They did not respond to that advance or any part of it?—They had a meeting, I believe, and they replied that they were sorry I had not made this proposal previously, but they could not accept it then. They would leave it to my honour to pay later on.

Will you look at this letter dated 22nd Nov., 1898, addressed to C. E. Leopold and Co. by yourself?—That I think was a private letter at the time.

Mr. Lowder—It reads:—

"DEAR SIR,—Confirming my telegram as per copy enclosed, Ahrens have in the meantime approached me and are apparently willing to withdraw the action against me provided that 50,000 yen in cash is paid them."

I supposed when you refer to Ahrens & Co. approaching you that was a figure of speech?—Yes.

And you meant that you were approaching them?—Yes.

And this reference to cash?—I never made any offer of cash. I could not get the money.

I call your attention to this passage in the letter:—

"I don't want things to come to this pass. I wired you and am doing the best I can in Yokohama to raise money among my friends, so that in the course of the next few days, with the aid of a remittance from yourself, I hope to pay them the 50,000 yen necessary."

Does not that remind you that it was a cash offer?—I made no offer of cash at all. That was written to my brother and telegraphed to try to accelerate sales.

Debtor continued that he could not form any estimate of the remittance to be sent by his brother. He was in hopes of getting rid of the land and of Japanese securities. He expected he should raise almost the whole amount in Yokohama, if he had been able to dispose of the securities in his hands.

And the securities were in your hands on the 2nd November?—No, not in my hands, but under my control.

How soon after that was it that they passed out of your control?—As soon as I got into prison.

On December 2nd, 1897, you drew a cheque on the Chartered Bank for 22,460 yen? For whom?—I must look it up (after reference). In favour of Fuchijima. He is an owner of land. It was in part-payment of the Yoshida Shinden land. It was the last instalment of the payment.

And in order to refund that to the bank you sold sterling drafts to the extent of 22,680 yen the same day?—Yes.

Those being partly drawn on C. E. Leopold and Co. and partly on C. M. Lampton and Co.?—Yes. Could you give me the dates when these various properties passed into your hands, and what you paid for them?—Yes, I can make up a statement.

Debtor here produced two statements of money for which the bantō Uyeda Yoshizu must account to him, and added that out of these Uyeda had accounted for 14,000 yen only.

Mr. Lowder—You say: "He has to account for two sums—the first yen 31,230-48 and the other for yen 28,249-25?—Out of which yen 14,000 or yen 15,000 of -kins have been delivered."

Mr. Lowder—What is the meaning of "Hakodate, Kanazawa, Amori," &c., opposite these sums?

Debtor—That is the account for which he had to account. Those amounts marked "Hakodate" should be transferred to the Mitsui Bank at Hakodate, and so with the rest. Those to Nakajimaya were paid direct to him.

Who is he?—A Japanese.

Where does he live?—I don't know where he lives now; his address was Sumiyoshi-cho, Ichome. He was a coal merchant. The other cheques would probably be made out to the Mitsui Bank, but Uyeda did not actually receive them. They were paid into the Bank probably by Yamaguchi or Yoshiwara, who would take my cheque down and instruct them to whom the money was to be remitted.

To whose credit would these sums be paid to the Mitsui Bank?—To the credit of the different people. Not to my credit. Those at Kanazawa to Tokunara (he is my agent there); in Hakodate to Tada Kanekichi, in Amori either to Kondo or Wakabayashi. Kamitaki is my feather man; he is at Yokohama. He has accounted to Uyeda for 2,500 yen.

Does the amount appear in the returns you had to make out to this Court?—No, I did not consider them owing to me. They are to Japanese. They have been invested in other properties. I was advised not to put anything Japanese down.

Uyeda is your debtor in that extent, is he not?—He is my bantō. I do not know whether he is my debtor.

Then why was he not returned as a debtor to the estate?—Because I was advised not to put down anything Japanese. Those moneys I believe have been all invested, and it is the investments you want to get.

His Honour—You mean to say that you were advised that money given to Japanese and owing to you is not to appear in your schedule?

Debtor—My bantō got the money to buy goods and bought them.

His Honour—But does he owe it to you?—I think when the accounts are made out he will show that it has been invested in other properties—wood, coal, and skins. I dare say when he is asked he will give a full explanation of what he has done with them.

His Honour—But until he gives you an explanation does he not owe you the money?

Debtor—Well, I—

His Honour—Have you got the skins?

Debtor—I have 15,000 yen of skins; the wood is lying up in Akechi and the coals somewhere else.

Have you returned those?—No.

You have not returned either the money you gave to buy them or the things themselves?—They are not in my possession. I have nothing in my possession.

His Honour—That is your answer? You have been very badly advised.

Debtor—I know he has used that money for certain purposes, and I have not got the securities at all.

Mr. Lowder—Are there any other debtors besides Uyeda?—No, I have no others.

Tada Gishiro?—The land certainly.

You told us the other day that some of the land was in his name, but I am talking about moneys advanced by you, or paid to his credit from you to be placed to his credit somewhere?—He has accounted for everything.

Have you his account?—No. He only had to do with the land and the godowns.

No moneys?—He took up this cheque to pay for the land. I never had an account with the Mitsui Bank.

Will you authorise the Official Receiver to apply to the Mitsui Bank for a statement of moneys received from you to be placed at the credit of these various persons?—Yes. They won't know me in the case at all. I never had an account or any communication with the Mitsui Bank.

Then in whose names are these various sums kept?—In the names of the parties I gave you.

Your servants?—No, the names of the different *bantō*s.

Have you got any account of these transactions?—I simply sent the Japanese, and asked them to remit the amounts to the parties I named. There was no entry in my books.

Then how do you know what you did with this money, and what amount?—I gave my instructions to the Japanese and trusted them to do it. I have my own cheque book.

Did you never have any account of moneys you advanced to these Japanese except the stub of your cheque book?—I didn't make any entry except when the Japanese brought me the invoices. I checked off the cheques against the invoices.

By His Honour—I had an ledger account.

At this point the court adjourned.

On resuming Mr. Lowder continued his examination.

I call your attention to a translation of a telegram you received from C. E. Leopold and Co. It reads:—

"Call for an adjournment. Shall we come? Do not transfer. Judgment against us you can transfer ladies. Have given power of attorney."

What does that mean—"Do not transfer?"—I never understood that telegram. I took no cognizance of it. I can only presume he meant "Do not transfer to H. Ahrens and Co."

"You can transfer ladies." Do you know what he means by that?—I don't understand the telegram. I took no cognizance of it.

"Have given power of attorney?"—I did not understand that either.

Did you not understand the first sentence "Call for an adjournment?"—Was not that an adjournment of the trial?—Yes.

Your brother had previously given you to understand that they had evidence that Ahrens and Co. knew what was going on, and you connected that with the telegram?—Yes.

"Shall we come?"—That is a code translation. There is no word for "Shall I," I suppose.

You absolutely attach no significance to the rest of the telegram?—Only what I just now have told you. He probably means stop transferring to H. Ahrens and Co. owing to their action, and that if I had any property I wanted to keep out of my creditors' hands or wished to save I ought to transfer it.

Mr. Lowder—Had you not previously referred to your sisters? You have two sisters, have you not?—I have three.

I put it to you he was referring to your sisters?—It may have been. I don't know.

Who made this blue mark over that page now? (handing in book)?—Not me. It was made since it has been out of my possession.

Mr. Lowder—I will call the attention of the Official Receiver to it.

I call your attention to a letter addressed by yourself to Messrs. C. E. Leopold, London, dated 7th, October, 1898.—

"We are in receipt of telegraph remittance for £50, for which please accept our thanks."

Have you any explanation of that £50?

Debtor—Only that I got it—that's all.

Is that the only sum you have received from your brother?—No.

How much altogether?—Can't tell you without reference.

Mr. Lowder—Please remember that you are here to answer questions, and your books are at your disposal.

Debtor—I can't say without reference.

Mr. Lowder—Then refer to your books and let us know.

Debtor—(after reference to books)—£350, as far as my recollection goes.

Mr. Lowder—What has become of that?

Debtor—Used in paying off interest, mortgages, fire insurance, rents, and expenses.

Mr. Lowder—You must try and give me something more definite than that. You have received £350. Can you or can you not—will you or will you not—answer my questions as to what has become of that money?

Debtor—I have told you.

But we want details—I have not got details.

Have you any books from which you can give me that information?—I don't think so.

Have you or have you not?—No, I have not. I have the vouchers, that is all.

Mr. Lowder—Well, refer to them.

Debtor looked through a number of documents, and then said he had disbursed most of the amount for interest on mortgages, rent, legal and personal expenses, cost of telegrams, &c. He had not any vouchers for payments to Japanese.

Mr. Lowder pressed for details, and debtor occupied some time in going over papers and books, and making calculations. He then announced that he had accounted for yen 3,451.61.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—This letter of 7th October, 1898, after expressing thanks for the £50, continues:—

"I am only sorry it was not £100 at least, as the amount was immediately forwarded to the coal mine and all my former bills and salaries remain unpaid."

Where was this coal mine?—In Shizunaka, Kushiro Province.

Why did you send that £50 there?—To buy food for the people working there.

By whom was it sent?—I don't know. Probably by Uyeda; he looked after that part of the business. I presume the amounts were transferred to Hakodate first.

Mr. Lowder (continuing to read):—

"In future, if you have any very private communications to make to me address them under cover to A. D. D. Lloyd, 59, Yokohama. I shall also get Mr. Lloyd's name registered in the Specie Bank, as it is possible I may want to have remittances sent to him. However, don't use this for transfers until I instruct you."

Did you get Mr. Lloyd's name registered at the Specie Bank?—Yes.

What were the transfers referred to there?—Transfers of money.

But from London?—Yes.

Have any transfers of money been made to you or to Mr. Lloyd for you?—I think one or two.

Can you tell us the amount?—It would be included in that £350. The Specie Bank will give you all information. It all came through the Specie Bank.

Have you an account with the Specie Bank?—No.

Has Mr. Lloyd for you?—Not that I am aware of.

Then when sums were remitted to you how were they drawn?—They were paid me by cheque, and the cheques were cashed.

Mr. Lowder (reading):—

"With regard to my case with Ahrens at present no indictment has come in. The matter is therefore still in abeyance. In the meantime I have delayed making any further transfers and am anxiously waiting your confirmation of this telegram which I presume is on the way."

What do you mean by that?

Debtor—That would mean transfers to Ahrens. Transfers were to be made to Ahrens and Co. on the condition that there should be no prosecution. That was the sine qua non of the assignment.

This refers to other property you were going to transfer to them if they didn't prosecute?—Yes, stocks in London.

I thought we had exhausted that?—It might mean property in Yokohama. I don't know what it means. I don't recollect.

What was this telegram?—Really I don't know without looking up.

Look at this letter. I can't distinguish the date. Is it the 13th Oct.?—Yes, I presume it is the 13th.

This was written by your instructions by Mr. Lloyd to the Specie Bank?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder read the letter, which was simply an application from Mr. Lloyd to be registered to receive telegraphic remittances from London correspondents.

Mr. Lowder—Did he receive any telegraphic transfers from London, do you know?—I think so, two or three. The Specie Bank can give you all that information. They were small, very small.

Was that outside the £350 or included in the £350?—He has probably received one in addition to the £350.

What amount?—£50 or £40—I don't remember the amount.

You authorise the Official Receiver to get all this information from the Specie Bank?—Yes, certainly.

I call your attention to this letter dated 11th June, 1898, from C. E. Leopold and Co., London:—

"I am still doubtful as to whether you are on good terms with Uyeda and if recent wires are from you."

What does that mean?

Debtor—He was doubtful whether Uyeda had telegraphed direct to him to London, or whether the wire came from me.

Mr. Lowder (continuing):—

"However, I have wired £100 to go forward for shipment to be made (you know, of course)."

What does that mean?

Debtor—I don't know what it means.

Mr. Lowder—Here is a letter addressed by yourself to C. E. Leopold & Co., dated 5th July, 1898.

"DEAR SIR,—I have arranged that the manufactory goes into a private limited company. My share will be the amount which I loaned to the man from time to time."

That is a manufactory of wall paper?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder (continuing to read):—

"I shall therefore arrange that the business is continued with you, so please be on the look out. Through the absurd action of Ahrens, of course, my financial business is stopped for the present, but that will only be for a time. Arrangements will be made for continuing the paying portion of the business. You wired me at the time that you have made large sales. I hope therefore you have cleared off all the old stock, no matter at what price. I think considerable improvement can be made in the process of paper manufacture, both in quality and cheapness."

And so forth. Did you make arrangements for making it into a private limited company in which you had a share?

Debtor—I tried, but it fell through. I don't know what became of the factory. I heard through Uyeda that it was lost. I have no documents or anything connected with it.

How much money did you put into this manufactory?—I think with interest about 5,000 yen. I think the amount was originally 45,000 yen.

You still have a claim against Uyeda on that?—I have a claim against Uyeda, or against Imai, the original manufacturer.

Where does he live?—In Honjo, Tokyo. I don't know the address.

Have you scheduled this debt as owing to your estate?—No.

Why not?—It was not owing in my name. It was owing in Uyeda's name. I told the Official Receiver about it.

Mr. Lowder—You are very fond of trying to throw the responsibility on some one else. You have certain duties as a bankrupt, and one is to schedule all debts due to you.

Debtor—I was legally advised that I could not schedule this. I mentioned it to the Official Receiver.

Mr. Lowder—This morning you told us of various moneys that have been invested in different ways by Uyeda, and now of this money. Can you tell us of any other Japanese debtors to your estate?—You have all of them as far as I am aware.

Mr. Lowder—In this letter, of 11th June, from C. E. Leopold and Co., there is a reference to a certain C—business, which I suppose to be a coal business.

Debtor—Yes.

Mr. Lowder (reading)—It says—

"Regarding C—business and concession why not float it here as a limited liability corporation by public subscription? The name Leopold need not appear. England is coal mad at present, and we should fancy the public would jump at it. There are heaps of firms who would rig up a company and find all. However, we think it would be best for you (1) to transfer it to the Yokohama Specie Bank to be delivered over on payment, say with 70 or 50,000 pounds profit; (2) get a full reliable engineer's report, verified by British Consul if possible; (3) maps and all data; (4) all and every full information; (5) estimated output; (6) working cost; (7) valuation of samples; (8) valuation of concession; (9) good public men who might act on board in Japan. You must provide a good margin of profit, as these company promoters want something. It could be done, only the name of Leopold must not be mentioned unless of course the Chartered Bank and Hongkong Bank will lend their support, but they had better know nothing about it. Try it and if you agree with suggestion mail all particulars."

(Signed) ED. LEOPOLD.

What coal business does this refer to?—The one at Chiptonai.

Here is a letter addressed by you to a person in Yokohama whose name I won't mention at present, in which you stated that you have arranged with the Japanese that the capital of the company is to be 150,000 yen, of which 129,000 yen are required now. That this has been subscribed as follows:—By Japanese, 44,000 yen; my amount of 30,000 yen; plus the loan from Watanabe 55,000 yen. "I shall pay the interest on the latter, and the amount will stand in my name 90,000 yen, leaving the sum for you 30,000 dollars." You say "there is not the slightest doubt that this property will be worth 500,000 yen at least within six or seven years, and I am very desirous of saving it." This was written on June 25th. Does it refer to the same property as the letter of your brother of 11th June, 1895?

Debtor—No.

What does it refer to?—The Yoshida Shinden land. The company was actually formed, but I was arrested, and then everybody backed out, naturally.

Mr. Lowder then read an agreement between Uyeda and another Japanese named Takahara Sazaburo, the latter of whom, the defendant explained, was the engineer in charge of the land, with regard to the working of this land.

Mr. Lowder—This mine was purchased with moneys furnished to Uyeda by yourself?—No, it was a concession.

In Hokkaido?—Yes.

And you paid 20,000 yen for it didn't you?—No, there was no payment on it. The Japanese get a concession from the Government provided that they work it and pay certain dues. That 20,000 yen is the total expenditure I have had on the land. That is, the preliminary expenditure.

And you furnished that 20,000 yen?—Yes.

And to whom?—Uyeda.

Can you tell us when?—I cannot until he gives me the account for those amounts I gave you this morning.

And this concession was made to Uyeda for you?—Yes.

The concession is a tract of land 400,000 tsubo in extent, is it not?—No, over a million. It was 400,000 tsubo in the first place, but it was trebled. It is now 1,200,000.

Mr. Lowder then read a letter debtor had written on August 8th, 1899, to the late Mr. Keil in which he stated that "the coal was a big success; it was equal to the best quality, and the engineers reported that there was so much that they did not know where to begin first. He (the debtor) was awfully glad to hear this and was going to turning the mine into a limited liability company at an early date. It exceeded his expectations and he should be able to pay H. Ahrens and Co. with a year's time at least 75,000 to 100,000 yen cash. Please, however, keep this from the world."

Mr. Lowder—Now is there any reference to this property in your schedule?

Debtor—No. I mentioned it verbally to Hoffmann. I said I had something else.

Mr. Lowder then read at length an agreement, dated 1st July, 1898, as to the working of the mine, in which the names of Nakazawa, Takahara, and Tada Tanakichi appeared.

Debtor said Tada was his servant; Takahara was the prospector. There were three in it in order to secure the whole area of land, as one Japanese could only hold 400,000 tsubo. The others were not dummies, however. Tada belonged to him (debtor); the others were to have a third of the profits. Takahara was the discoverer of the place, but he was willing to be bought out for a very low sum.

Mr. Lowder—I am informed that according to Japanese law real property must be registered? Do you know where this was registered?—Yes, in the Sapporo land office, as far as I am aware.

And in your name?—In the names of the three Japanese.

They are carrying out this agreement?—I have absolutely no information from outside.

Is that agreement in existence?—It was in writing and duly signed.

No reference to that agreement is made in your statement of affairs?—It is in the blue statement. I have put it in the statement of moneys invested and gone. I have not been able to get anything from the Japanese.

And if your expectations should be realised this is an extremely valuable property?—Yes, if you can get hold of it it will pay all my debts. If you can get hold of it.

And it was because it was in Japanese hands that you omitted it from the schedule?—Yes, I had been legally advised.

Don't you think it would have only been fair to the creditors that you should give information of this?—I told Mr. Moss that I could not put it in my assets, but I should be willing to make full statements about it.

On the 4th July you wrote to C. E. Leopold and Co.: "It is going to turn out trumps. In fact the best thing I have touched." You say also that you had "turned the land into a limited company, retaining 55,000 yen in the affair?" That was inaccurate?—No, it was formed, but the things were not drawn up. When I was arrested on a criminal charge nothing could be done.

Who tested the coal?—It was tested in the Japanese laboratory in Tokyo and by engineers. I call your attention to a letter dated 21st July to C. E. Leopold:—

"A telegram has been received from the engineer at the mines stating that prospects are excellent, and that the place has been in no wise over-estimated. The property must be kept for some time, and the working account show a good profit; with the Specie Bank at the back of us there should be no difficulty in placing it in the London market."

Were the Specie Bank at your back? Debtor—No, they would have been approached later.

This paragraph I have just read was with reference to the same mine?—Yes.

Here is a translation of a telegram addressed by yourself to C. E. Leopold and Co., July 29th, 1898:—

"Mine better than expected. Please remit £100. Will leave by steamer about beginning of December."

Was that in reference to this mine?—Yes.

On the 8th August you wrote the letter to Mr. Keil that I have put in?—Yes.

Were you responsible for this letter to C. E. Leopold and Co. (produced)?—Yes.

You say here:—

"I note what you say re not transferring any of the stock in the coal mine to you when this is made into a company."

Had he asked you not to do so?—I suppose that must have been in that telegram I don't recollect. I probably took it to mean that.

And then you add:—

"But will put some in the name of the girls."

Did that also refer to that telegram?—Yes, I suppose so. But that was only in case everything was in order as regards my affairs.

If everything was in order why should you put it in the name of the girls?—For future business, to prevent my losing it again.

Mr. Lowder—Oh.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—Now in the book "For Account Sales, &c." there is an account current from C. M. Lampson and Co., showing a balance to your debit of £21,243, dated 10th July, 1897; and another dated 8th January, 1898, for the half year showing a balance of £12,503 to your debit.

Debtor—Yes, that is so, I suppose, if it is there. Have you received any account current from C. M. Lampson and Co. since that last one?—I think that is the last (After reference to papers). Yes, that is the last, apparently.

Mr. Lowder—You still owe that money?

Debtor returned several confused answers, and spent some time in making calculations. Finally Mr. Lowder put it to him that there was £27,350 in the shape of drafts by him on Lampson's, and that against that he only had shipments of furs to the value of £1547.

You have not included them in your list of creditors?—Yes, as unknown.

Mr. Lowder—I give you now a last opportunity of making any explanation as to what has become of that £27,350.

Debtor—I have already done so, Mr. Lowder.

Mr. Lowder—I am not going to ask any more questions. I give you that opportunity.

Debtor—I have already done so; I have told how it was lost in my statement made on the first day.

Now with the exception of these skins you have mentioned had you any skins at any time when you drew these bills?—Yes, I have some in the country at different places, and some in the godowns.

And what did you do with them?—The Chartered Bank sold some.

What value the whole of them?—I don't recollect.

Debtor was then examined as to the Nakamura and Sotomura leases, and Mr. Lowder, in reply to his Honour, mentioned that the statement of Messrs. Lampson's claim was tendered partly as a proof of their debt, and partly as showing the position of the bankrupt.

Mr. Lowder (continuing)—You had leases of 98 Bluff, 100 Bluff, and 125 Settlement?—Yes.

The leases for 98 and 100 Bluff are held by Ishii Riye as security for moneys owing to her?—Yes.

Is she returned as a secured creditor?—Yes, partly secured, I think.

The lease of Lot 125, Settlement, I think, you sold to Laundry Company for 3,500 yen, did you not?—Yes.

Shortly before the trial took place?—Yes.

What became of the 3,500 yen?—Lawyer's fees, expenses for trips to the north, and some was used for paying interest, I think.

Have you any accounts of that expenditure?—No. Debtor added that the property was worth 13,000 yen, and that was the best he could obtain for it. That illustrated how all his securities were depreciated.

Mr. Lowder—Oh, come, come, come! A lease in the Foreign Settlement does not depreciate like that.

Debtor—I could not get any one to take it over. No one would buy it.

Mr. Lowder—That closes my examination, your Honour.

His Honour (to Mr. Welford)—Do you propose to examine?

Mr. Welford—Not at present advised.

His Honour—There must be an adjournment. The examination is adjourned to this day week, at 10.30.

Lord Salisbury last month entered upon his seventieth year. Although the Prime Minister is by no means old compared with other English statesmen, he is one of the oldest members of Parliament, having first sat in the House of Commons 46 years ago. He is three years younger than Sir W. Harcourt, and some of his colleagues in the Cabinet are his seniors. It is 33 years since Lord Salisbury first took up a post in the Government, for it was in 1866 that he became Secretary for India.

TELEGRAMS.

(TELEGRAM RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

A FRENCH COLONIAL OFFICE.

Saigon, 17th March.

ANOTHER EXPLOSION IN FRANCE.

Saigon, March 20.

An accidental explosion has taken place in the pyrotechnical laboratory of the Arsenal at Bourges. Three persons were killed and five injured.

FRANCE'S SEA POWER.

Saigon, March 20.

During the discussion on the French naval budget in the Chamber of Deputies, the Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy, declared that the state of the fleet was excellent, and said that most of the squadrons in distant waters had been improved, and that the fortified naval bases had been commenced. He eulogized the submarine vessels, and announced that the Gustave Zédé is now provided with vision apparatus which enables her to approach an adversary at will.

ANGLO-FRENCH RELATIONS.

Saigon, March 21.

It is affirmed that the Franco-English negotiations have been concluded in a sense satisfactory to French interests.

GERMAN ARMY BILL.

The Reichstag has passed the Army Bill as amended.

RHODES SUCCEEDS IN HIS MISSION.

London, March 19.

Mr. Cecil Rhodes has succeeded in the negotiations to construct the Cape-Cairo telegraphs through German territory, instead of via the Congo. A similar arrangement for the railways is almost complete.

GERMAN ARMY BILL.

In consequence of the adverse vote in the Reichstag the German Government consents to fixing the effective peace footing at 495,000, instead of 502,000, as demanded in the Army Bill.

MYSTERIOUS EXPLOSIONS IN FRANCE.

London, March 20.
An explosion at the Government shell factory at Bourges resulted in three killed and thirty-four injured. The cause is not explained.

The same thing has happened at the cartridge factory at Marseilles, in which three men were injured.

DISASTROUS FIRE IN NEW YORK

Windsor Hotel, in the heart of New York City, has been destroyed by fire. As ascertained so far, fourteen are dead and thirty-four injured. The victims are mostly women. It is estimated that sixty are still missing.

AMERICAN REINFORCEMENTS.

Mountain Batteries are being sent to Manila.

THE PEACE TREATY SIGNED.

H. M. the Queen-Regent of Spain has signed the Treaty of Peace with America, without submitting the same to the Cortes, owing to the unwillingness on the part of successive Cabinets to accept the responsibility of ratifying it.

PROTEST AGAINST WEI-HAI-WEI REGIMENT.

In the House of Commons, during the debate over the Army Bill, Mr. Caldwell moved for a reduction as a protest against the formation of the regiment at Wei-hai-wei.

THE FASHODA AFFAIR.FRANCE WAS NOT PREPARED.

In the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Lockroy, Minister of Marine, declared that at the time of the Fashoda crisis the French navy and dockyards were utterly unprepared, most projectiles having been without fuses.

INDIA AND "BOUNTIED" SUGAR.

London, March 21.

The Indian Government has passed a bill imposing countervailing duties on the bounty-fed sugar. The measure is meeting with opposition in the House of Commons.

THE ITALIAN DEMAND.PROSPECT OF ANGLO-RUSSIAN ENTENTE.

Mr. W. St. John Brodrick, Parliamentary Secretary to the Foreign Office, in reply to questions in the House of Commons, stated that he understood that the Italian demands on China do not include the islands of Chusan, which are subject to treaty engagements between Great Britain and China. He also stated that no general agreement among the Powers interested in China was at present contemplated, but that the British Government was not without hope that an understanding would be possible with Russia, owing to friendly disposition on both sides.

ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT.

London, March 23.

An Anglo-French agreement has been signed at London, forming a supplement to the Niger Convention. Great Britain retains Bahr-el-Ghazal and Darfour, and France, Wadai, Baghirmi, and territory east and north of Lake Chad. The signatories mutually concede equality in commercial treatment in the region between the Nile and Lake Chad, that is between the fifth and the fifteenth parallels. France thus secures an access to the Nile.

(FROM THE "N.C. DAILY NEWS.")

AMERICA IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Hongkong, March 14.

Wheaton's Brigade has advanced to the bluffs commanding Pasig, Pateros, and Tagig. The natives retreated, after suffering small loss. A gunboat shelled Pasig.

[The three places named are up the Pasig river, about ten miles from the town of Manila in a south-easterly direction.—Ed. N.C.D.N.]

THE EMPRESS DOWAGER ON THE ITALIAN DEMAND.

Peking, March 15.

At a meeting of the Grand Council early this morning before the Empress Dowager the subject of the demand of Italy for the cession of Shantung (Sanmoon Bay) was discussed with great animation. The Empress Dowager showed such determined opposition to the demand that not a single Grand Councilor dared to propose even some sort of a compromise to the question. An edict was subsequently sent to Governor Lin of Chekiang commanding him to report upon the number of disciplined and modern armed troops available with him, and authorising him to call upon both the Viceroy of Nanking and Foochow for extra troops. The high Ministers at Peking know that if China gives in now there will be no end of demands for territory made by other countries.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO")

ITALY WITHDRAWS HER DEMAND.

Peking, March 17.

The Italian Government has withdrawn the demand for the lease of Sanmoon, alleging that the present affair originated entirely from the incorrect reports about China sent home by her Minister at Peking. It is supposed, however, that, backed by England, Italy will probably submit a fresh demand.

ITALIAN MINISTER'S DEPARTURE.

Peking, March 18.

The Italian Minister to China, in accordance with instructions from his Government, left here for home to-day.

Peking, March 20, afternoon.

It is rumoured in diplomatic circles here that Italy will do nothing until the arrival of the new Minister. The demand to be made by the latter will be of no less serious nature than the last.

FOREIGN MARINES AT PEKING WITHDRAWN.

Peking, March 22, 1 35 a.m.

Great Britain withdrew her marines to-day, and Russia and France will withdraw theirs at the end of this month or early in April.

THE OPENING OF SAN-MOON AND SECK-POO.

Peking, March 22.

China, it is stated, is considering the question of opening San-moon and Seck Poo, Chekiang Province, to foreign trade before the second Italian demand is preferred. It is likely that the scheme will be carried through.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny.

- (a) The text play doubles the K P and weakens the King's side, but gives Black the open K Kt file.
- (b) Castles was somewhat risky, and, at least, should have been delayed. Much better was P to Q5. If Black answers P to B5, then P takes P may be played.
- (c) Q takes Q ch followed eventually by K to Kt2 and P to B3 was likely to equalize the game. The text move in connection with Q takes R P was hardly good. White evidently underrated the value of his opponent's attack.
- (d) Loss of valuable time. K to Kt2 followed eventually by P to B3 was still in order.
- (e) With the intention to continue K takes P and P to KB4.
- (f) White has no better continuation than Kt to B4, which, however, loses a piece, as the progress of the game shows.
- (g) He could not well play K takes P ch, on account of White's K to Kt sq reply. If then K takes Kt, White answers P to B3, regaining this piece.
- (h) He could not not play P to B3, on account of Kt takes R P; if then R to K R sq, Black answers R (Kt4) to K4, threatening Kt takes B P with a winning game.
- (i) White should have endeavoured to weaken the adverse Queen's wing.
- (k) Kt takes P could not be played on account of R takes P on R (B4) to Q4 winning the Kt.
- (l) R takes R followed by R to R sq, was not likely to lead to a draw. Black, by continuing P takes P, P takes P ch and K takes P, will ultimately win the adverse Pawns and remain a Kt and a Pawn to the good.
- (m) Had White played R takes P then R to K sq ch would have followed. White can not answer K to Q4 on account of R to Q7 mate, and if he plays K to Q3, then Kt to K4 ch and Kt takes R wins.
- (n) A neat play, which, however, does not save the game, as Black's Kt takes R and R to K R sq reply demonstrates.
- (o) P takes Kt would have been answered by K to K2. The text move threatens P to Kt8 (Q), and Black is obliged to play R (B5) to B sq.
- (s) Black missed a speedy and neat win. He should have moved R to K Kt7. The game then proceeds: 64—P to B6, P to Kt6; 65—P to B7, K to K3; 66—P to Q6 ch, K takes B P; 67—P to Q7, R to Q7 and mates next move. Or, if 66—P to B8 (Q) ch, K takes Q; 67—P to Q6, K to B2; 68—P to Q7, R to Q7 and mate next move. The play selected wins also, but it requires more moves.

END GAME.

Played at Llandudno. White announced mate in eight moves or loss of the Queen.

NOTES.

Pillsbury says he has been misunderstood in the stand he took concerning the admission of the public in his proposed match against Janowski for $1,500. He says he would be glad for anybody interested in chess to see the match, but he wishes to exclude a certain class of chess sharps in New York, who followed the game, made notes and rushed off and sold it to the newspapers. He says if the games were to be sold he wanted the players to get the money, not the sharps who sneaked them.

A proposal is said to be on foot for Pillsbury to engage in a lengthened tour, including a visit to the leading clubs of Great Britain.

Janowski's initial attempt at blindfold chess in America did not prove a distinct success. He played a team of six players of only average strength at the Manhattan Chess Club without sight of boards or men. The exhibition lasted three hours and the Frenchman won but two of the games, drew one and lost the rest.

Locher, the world's champion, has left England for Moscow, where he will fulfil a lengthy engagement. He had recently been playing in Scotland.

The Perth Chess Club (W. A.) has been the recipient of rather a unique present in the shape of several manuscript volumes containing 25,000 chess problems arranged systematically, the problems of each composer being kept together. The diagrams of the boards have been impressed in the books with a rubber stamp, while the chess figures are neatly etched thereon. Mr. Grainger, the donor of this valuable collection, many years ago started problem solving, and the idea occurred to him to record each one as above. The work soon became a labour of love, and continued until recently, when he generously decided to present them to the Perth Chess Club.

The American Chess Magazine says:—"Philidor was unquestionably one of the greatest chess geniuses that ever lived, and also an accomplished musician. It is lamentable to think that, like his countryman, Laboriousness, no funeral tablet marks the place of his rest, and it is not even known where he was buried. Thus France loses her great men. Had Philidor lived in the Middle Ages, he would have been annobled."

No notice will be taken of anonymous correspondence. Whatever is intended for insertion in the "JAPAN WEEKLY MAIL" must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.

It is particularly requested that all letters on business be addressed to the MANAGER, and Cheques be made payable to same; and that literary contributions be addressed to the EDITOR.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, MARCH 18TH, 1899.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

H.M. QUEEN Victoria is now staying in the south of France.

LIEUT.-COLONEL PICQUART has been handed over to civil justice.

ACCORDING to investigations made at the end of last year, Japanese residents in Germany number 131.

MR. AKABANE, Minister to Holland, is to be relieved of his office, Mr. Chinda Sutei succeeding him.

PLAGUE has appeared at Mecca. Riots have broken out at Jeddah, arising out of the enforcement of the plague measures.

SIGNOR MARTINO, the Italian Minister at Peking, has been recalled owing to his exceeding instructions in the San-moon matter.

To fill up the interval between the close of the football season and the opening of cricket, the Y.C. & A.C. have organised a series of weekly paperchases.

A FORMOSA despatch received by the military authorities states that twenty natives were killed by savages on the 7th inst.

MR. OKOSHI, who was Japanese Consul-General in London some years ago, has been promoted to be Minister to Brazil.

M. DE FREYCINET, Minister of War, will soon communicate to the Court of Cassation the secret portfolio in the Dreyfus affair.

A FIRE, originating at the house of one Osawara, 23 Edogawa-machi, Koishikara, Tokyo, destroyed four houses on Sunday last.

TRAINING for the Spring Meeting of the N.R.C. began on Wednesday morning. The wet weather, so far, has proved a hindrance.

News from Manila during the past week has been of a pacific character, the Filipinos not persisting in maintaining a state of open hostilities.

THE German Reichstag have thrown out the bill, by a large majority, which proposed increasing the German Army. A political crisis is feared.

A FATAL accident occurred on the railway near Yokohama on Thursday by which a workman was cut to pieces, while another was thrown into a ditch and drowned.

THE number of police in Formosa, at present 3,600, is to be increased to 4,000, the additional men being chiefly stationed in the southern part of the island.

THE promoters of the Hakone Railway, the line for which has already been surveyed, propose to make it a water-power electric railway, ample power being available.

WAKU KANJIRO, aged 39, employed by the Vacuum Oil Company, of 16, Kobe, who had absconded with a sum of yen 480 belonging to the firm, was arrested at Yokohama on the 8th.

THE Yokohama Plasterers and Bricklayers' Guild, which recently raised the wages of workers, has decided to lower the rate from this month, as business has been far from brisk lately.

THE present Kobe Harbour Office, which was only built for temporary use, is being found not a little inconvenient, and the authorities contemplate rebuilding it at an estimated cost of 30,000 yen.

THE Yamaguchi Coal Mine, the average output of which has been 5,000,000 kins per day, has been flooded, and work has had to be entirely suspended. The mine was considered the best in Iwaki Province.

A LONDON despatch dated the 13th, received by the Navy Department from Rear Admiral Matsunaga, states that the Japanese first-rate battleship Asahi was successfully launched on the 10th instant.

A WORKMAN named Shoji Chirokichi of 33, Shichi-chome, Uchida-cho, Yokohama, attempted to make away with himself by drinking a quantity of sulphuric acid. He did not, however, take a sufficient dose.

DETAILS of the great fire at Tagamutsu, Minami Akita-gori, Akita Prefecture, on the 6th inst. show that it originated at 1 a.m. in a house occupied by Hatakeyama Torakichi, and immediately spread in all directions, destroying the whole village with the exception of nine houses. Eleven persons were burnt to death, and four horses also perished.

COUNT OKUMA gave a garden party on the 11th to the Progressist and neutral members of the House of Representatives and some members of the House of Peers, including Viscounts Tani and Soga. A foreign menu was adopted.

MR. H. A. C. BONAR, British Consul at Yokohama, entertained Mr. Asada, Governor of Kanagawa Prefecture, Admiral Mori, Director of the Yokohama Harbour Office, and other high officials at his residence on Monday.

AN engagement has been entered into between H.I.H. Prince Kuni and Miss Shimadzu Chikako, elder sister of Prince Shimadzu Tadashige. The ceremony will in all probability take place at the end of September, or the commencement of October, at the Kyoto Palace.

ON Thursday, at the Imperial Hotel, the members of the House of Peers gave a farewell banquet in honour of Prince Konoye, who is leaving for the West. Among those present were Marquis Ito, Premier Yamagata, and Count Kuroda, who read a congratulatory address, to which the Prince responded.

THE French Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy, stated in the Chamber of Deputies that the technical inquiry and the judicial inquiry with reference to the explosion at Toulon have not, up to the present, afforded any positive result. It is still unknown whether the explosion was contrived or accidental.

ACCORDING to the Financial Department's Statistics, made up to the end of February, the total number of Banks of every description in Japan in that month was 1836, and their aggregate capital yen 391,270,844. This is an increase of 15 banks and of yen 4,695,510 capital as compared with the figures for January.

IT has been decided to send the following Judicial Officials abroad to investigate questions of the administration of law:—Judge Y. Kawamura, Judge I. Shimidzu, and Public Prosecutor T. Nagamori, to Italy and France; Judge G. Baba, Public Prosecutors Kosaka and K. Ohi to England and America; Public Prosecutor M. Omiya and A. Tanahashi, and Judge I. Saito, to Germany and Austria-Hungary.

RIGHT HON. G. J. GOSCHEN, First Lord of the Admiralty, has introduced into the House of Commons the naval estimates. The total is put down at twenty six and a half millions, and 4,250 more men are to be added. The new programme comprises two armoured cruisers, and three smaller cruisers of very high speed. It is intended to make Wei-hai-wei a secondary naval base, with adequate fortifications, coal stores, and small repairing shops.

OFFICIAL appointments were gazetted on Monday as follows:—Major-General Shionoysa, promoted to the rank of a Lieut. General and appointed Commander of the Fortifications of Tokyo Bay; Major-General Inouye, raised to the rank of Lieut. General and appointed to fill the lately vacated position of Commander of the 13th Army Division; Colonel Tomoyasu, created Major-General, and made Commander of the 4th Infantry Brigade; Major-General Harada, Director of the Military Board of Works (Kenchitaku); Major-General Katsuta, Inspector of Fortifications, Shimonoeki; Major-General Okamura, Commander of the 3rd Infantry Brigade; and Major-General Arai, Commander of Guards (Kreibitz) at Tsushima.

CHINA AND ITALY.

Monday, March 13.

All telegrams reaching Japan concur in representing China as resolved to resist Italy's proposals, by arms if necessary. Italy, on the other hand, is preparing to convert her proposals into demands, and to enforce them at the mouth of the cannon. What are we to infer from such a situation? The first query that suggests itself is, are both sides in earnest? As to Italy, if her proceedings are correctly interpreted by rumour, she has gone too far to draw back. It is true that she has not the most shadowy outlines of a right to coerce China, and that if she carries this case to the arbitrament of the sword, she will establish a precedent absolutely new among civilized nations. But if that consideration has not hitherto restrained her, we doubt whether it will have any deterrent efficacy at the eleventh hour. She would certainly win much greater honour in history by abandoning her piratical enterprise, than by pushing it to a sanguinary issue; but we can scarcely hope that the prospect of an approving verdict in the future will weigh with her so heavily as the pain of a fiasco in the present; and a very painful fiasco it would be to step out of the lists at this stage. Hence it is probably a correct forecast that Italy will fight rather than forego her demands. It takes two to make a fight, however. Will China be the second? Nothing in her recent annals suggests that she will. The lesson they teach is that she has fallen into a state of almost inconceivably invertebrate limpness, and that no suffering an outsider can inflict on her would be felt by her so acutely as the wrench of rousing herself from her lethargy. She submitted tamely at Kiao-chou; she submitted tamely at Port Arthur; she submitted tamely at Wei-hai-wei. Why should she break the record at San-moon? Well, it appears to us that there is a weak link in the analogical chain: The cases are not precisely parallel. Germany had a moral point d'appui at Kiao-chou, and she had also the physical advantage of possession. She was entitled to some sort of compensation; she took the compensation that pleased her, and she asked for it afterwards. That was a kind of deadly practicality well calculated to paralyse China's feeble impulse of resistance. Then came Russia. Kiao-chou had been recently Russian. Some substitute must be found, since Kiao-chou had been alienated. Besides, Russia was Russia; a proposition pregnant with potentialities. Finally, the lease of Wei-hai-wei was nothing more than a codicil to the Liaotung testament. All these incidents hung together like the three thieves on Holborn Hill. But the Italian enterprise is different; and the difference consists not merely in Italy's comparative incapacity to enforce her demands, but also in the effect their tame concession would produce upon the situation. If China submits passively to be plundered by this new depredator, she abandons the last shred of her title to enjoy security of life and property. For there is absolutely nothing to "save her face." It will be a proclamation to the whole world that she holds her territory at the mercy of any raider having sufficient assurance to demand a portion of it. We do not want to say hard things of Italy. On the contrary, we hope to see her in possession of San-moon, for we recognise her as an ally of our country. But our object being to cast up the chances of the immediate future, we necessarily try to realize China's view of the facts, and, when we do so, it seems certain that this Italian incident must present itself to her as the crisis of her national career. However obtuse her perception of inter-State relations, she must see that to yield now is to collapse utterly. Probably that appreciation will nerve her to make some sort of struggle. Then, after all, her vis-à-vis is Italy. What can Italy do in the Far East? A great many people are asking themselves that question we imagine. The answer comes easily. If Peking declares war Italy could not accomplish anything single-handed, for a declaration of war would deprive her of all coaling and docking facilities in the East. She can take San-moon Island and she can hold whatever portion of the adjacent coast lies within range of her squadron's guns, for the Chinese being without a fleet, their littoral is at the mercy of any naval Power. But an effort of that character would soon exhaust Italy's resources unless she could obtain a convenient basis of supplies, which is precisely what seems most unobtainable. China, in short, has immense potentialities of passive resistance. If she can only persuade herself to declare war so soon as Italy strikes a blow, and if she can thereafter summon patience to play a waiting game, it will be hard, very hard, to hurt her seriously. These various reasons appear to differentiate the situation from any recent precedent. But, of course, the whole complexion of affairs will be changed if England constitutes herself Italy's backer. That is a hypothesis which we need not now discuss further than to say that England undoubtedly wants to see Italy at San-moon.

It certainly does look as if a general breach of the peace were imminent in the Far East. A special telegram from Shanghai, which we publish this morning, says that the Russian and French Ministers have entered a protest in Peking—a protest sounding very like a defiance. They say that if the desired extension of the Anglo-American Settlement at Shanghai be granted by China, France also must have the extension demanded by her some months ago, and objected to by Great Britain and the United States. On theoretical grounds there is no reason why England and America should obtain from China any concession which is denied to France. But from a practical point of view the cases are radically different. The Anglo-German-American Settlement at Shanghai is a handsome, prosperous, and wealthy city, standing in urgent need of an extension of its limits. The French Settlement is a small impoverished-looking hamlet, whose inhabitants are in no want of new territory. France's demand, preferred last year in the sequel of a riotous demonstration by Chinese coolies, is mainly political, whereas the demand made by England and America is fully justified by actually existing conditions of population and business. These details lose their importance, however, in the face of the fact that France and Russia have openly ranged themselves against Great Britain and the United States. Russia has not the smallest material interest in the question of extending the French Settlement at Shanghai. Her connexion with the business depends solely upon her general alliance with France. It has been commonly supposed, however, that her view of the obligations imposed by the alliance would prove very narrow in practice, whereas here we have her joining hands with France in a business essentially affecting the latter's interests only. That is significant. It undoubtedly deepens the already ominous hue of the political horizon. On the other hand, this Settlement problem should not prove impossible of solution. The main difficulty lies in the fact that France insists upon regarding her Settlement as a territorial concession. Could she be persuaded to agree to its inclusion in the area occupied by the nationals of all the other Treaty Powers, any extension granted to her or to them would be a common gain, welcomed by all alike. No moderate person can endorse any ignoring of France's claims, or advocate any arrangement which would have a humiliating appearance for her. The whole trouble might be removed if she abandoned her isolated position at Shanghai, and threw in her lot with the other Treaty Powers. It is to be hoped that her sense of logic and good fellowship will induce her to view the matter in that light.

Tuesday, March 14.

By whatever counsellors the Ministers of the Tsung-li Yamén were prompted, they appear to have put themselves flagrantly in the wrong vis-à-vis Italy, for they returned the last despatch received from the Italian Representative in Peking without replying to it. So rumour says, at any rate, and we do not learn that there is any reason to doubt the fact. Immediate severance of relations between the two countries could not fail to follow such an act, and would have followed it, had not the German and British Representatives intervened. They succeeded in inducing the Tsung-li Yamén to go through the form of negotiating, and the news now received that Italy demanded a definite answer by the 14th instant, may be regarded as the result of the negotiation. Germany and England, having thus taken a part in the complication, will probably lend their good offices to bring it to a peaceful termination.

Thursday, March 16.

The Chinese Government has definitely refused to entertain Italy's application for a lease of San-moon. There was no vacillation on the part of the Tsung-li Yamén; no asking for an extension of the ultimatum period. The Italian Minister in Peking fixed the 14th as the limit of time for the delivery of China's final reply, and before the 14th came an emphatic "no." Japanese journals publish telegrams from Peking in the sense that Italy's real backer in this matter is Germany, not England. Germany, they say, wants to substitute Samsha Bay for Kiao-chou, and thinks that if the Italian demand for San-moon were conceded, her own proposal for Samsha could not be rejected. The same telegrams represent the British Minister in Peking as much chagrined that rumour should have so greatly misinterpreted his country's attitude.

Concerning the former point, namely, Germany's alleged use of Italy as a cat-paw, few will be found to believe it. The German Government has demonstrated very plainly that the want of a pretext is the last thing likely to trouble it in dealing with China. Besides, Germany has China's promise to exchange some suitable place for Kiao-chou should the latter prove inconvenient, and she has, consequently, no need of a new precedent. A much more probable explanation is suggested by telegrams which have been received from Europe. They say that Italy is dissatisfied with Great Britain's action. Lord Salisbury promised to support Italy's proposal diplomatically, and on the strength of that promise Italy put forward her demand. Now diplomatic support is all very well and very effective so long as the other side does not discover that it is diplomatic and only diplomatic. That discovery once made, however, the support loses its value, and somehow or other China seems to have made the discovery at an inconveniently early period. Italy thinks that the unfortunate fact is attributable to a want of genuine co-operation on England's part. Hence disappointment and dissatisfaction. We have little doubt that, when the full details are published, Her Majesty's Government will be found to have expressed its willingness to support a peaceable application, but to have refrained from any promise of co-operation in coercing China. That was precisely the perplexing point of the situation; the point difficult to reconcile with England's declared policy. Had she lent her aid to compel a pretextless alienation of Chinese territory at Italy's bidding, she would be thenceforth debarred from opposing similar encroachments by other Powers. It is a easy to conceive, however, that her warm friendship for Italy led her to promise help which Italy's conception of that friendship misinterpreted.

The question of absorbing interest now is Italy's next step. She has gone much too far to draw back without serious loss of prestige, and neither England nor Germany will be willing that she should suffer any humiliation, even were she herself willing, which she certainly is not. She can strike a strong blow. She can take San-moon, place a force of marines in occupation, and then re-open negotiations with Peking. Perhaps that would be the best solution, if there were any assurance that the belligerent operations could be strictly localized. But in the present tottering condition of the Chinese empire no one can estimate the effects of a shock, and it will be in the interests of Europe and America to avert risks which might assume limitless dimensions. The Empress in Peking is naturally anxious to prove that under her strong sway China can not be exposed to disgraces which were tamely endured when the young Emperor directed the Administration. But the Empress is a profoundly sagacious woman, and she knows very well that no efforts within her power can save the outlying parts of the country from attacks likely in the end to weaken her authority much more than timely concessions at the outset. She would doubtless be willing to furnish some solatium for Italy's amour propre in the form, say, of special mining concessions, and, on the whole, we are inclined to think that a compromise of that kind will terminate the crisis.

Mr. Robert Law was the recipient, the other evening, of a handsome silver salver bearing the following inscription in Chinese and English: "Shanghai and Hongkong Wharf Company. Presented to Robert Law, Esq., as a token of esteem, on his leaving for home on a well-deserved holiday, after 18 years' continuous service. Shanghai, 6th of March, 1899."

THE CABINET.

Tuesday, March 14.

It was to be expected that so soon as the Diet brought its session to a close, rumours of Cabinet changes would begin to be circulated, for many people, from time to time, expressed the conviction that there existed between Marquis Yamagata and the Liberals some understanding in the sense of Ministerial reconstruction if the session passed off satisfactorily. No one is surprised, therefore, to hear now that changes are imminent. Count Matsukata is supposed to be the discontented element. He joined the Cabinet, we are told, on the explicit stipulation that his colleagues would support him in placing the finances on a really sound footing, and that, as the only really effectual means to that end, the rate of the Land Tax should be permanently raised to 4 per cent. Nevertheless, in order to placate the Liberals, the Cabinet agreed to make the rate 3.3 per cent., for a limited period only. The immediate consequence of that concession was that recourse had to be had to devices highly objectionable in themselves, namely, an increase of postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and railway charges; and the remote consequence was that Count Matsukata's ten-year programme of finance suffered complete dislocation. Two other matters are said to have profoundly dissatisfied him. One was the Bill for increasing the allowances of members of the Diet; the other, the Bill for transferring Prison Expenditures to the charges of the Treasury. There is no evidence that Count Matsukata objected to the former measure on principle. He doubtless recognised the logic of the argument that, if the members are paid at all, they should be paid sufficiently. But there is one feature of the Bill which must have revolted all his instincts as a financier; a feature which, strange to say, seems to have momentarily escaped public attention. The increase of the members' allowances involved an additional outlay of nearly seven hundred thousand yen annually, and no special provision was made to meet that outlay. The Government had to say that the taxes already approved by the House would suffice. In other words, while professing to be obliged to resort to very questionable devices for obtaining paltry sums of revenue, the Treasury officials admitted that it would give them no trouble to provide for an additional expenditure of three quarters of a million yen. Such an admission introduces an element of unreality into the whole financial programme. It indicates one of two things: either that the Treasury officials acknowledge the looseness of their own estimates, and are quite prepared for considerable errors; or—and this is the natural inference—that they wittingly undervalue their sources of income. Count Matsukata must object strongly to have his financial methods exposed to such discredit. As to the Prison Expenditures, His Excellency has always been in favour of their re-transfer to the Treasury. In fact, that reform was explicitly included in his ten-year programme, though he did not propose to consummate it before the fiscal year 1900-1. The Diet, however, though, by reducing the proposed rate of Land Tax, it deprived the Treasury of the resources upon which the ten-year programme was based, nevertheless voted that the Prison Expenditures must be transferred to the charges of the Treasury, but did not vote any revenue to support the charges. That procedure closely resembled a declaration of want of confidence in the Finance Department. It might be interpreted—indeed we are inclined to say that it must be interpreted—as an announcement that the Diet believed the Treasury's estimate of the State's income to be too low by several millions of yen. We may justly say that the Diet's attitude towards financial questions has been singularly irresponsible, and that the Minister of Finance has strong grounds for dissatisfaction. It is inevitable that these doings have impaired Japan's credit abroad. Foreign capitalists can not feel much confidence in a State where the Legislature is content to make temporary provision for permanent outlays, and to make large additions to the Treasury's expenditure without voting any means of defraying them. Count Matsukata probably finds that, in view of these doings, the London money market looks askance at the bonds which he has for sale. Instead of seeing the finances placed on a sound footing, and instead of being able to obtain funds abroad on easy terms to complete the post-bellum undertakings, he sees the finances as unstable as ever, and he finds the foreign money market closed to him except on conditions which he can not consent to with any satisfaction or credit. If he resigns his portfolio, there will be no difficulty in explaining the step. For the country's sake we should welcome his resignation, for the sooner the political parties learn that no able financier can work with them in their present unreasonable, unpatriotic, and irresponsible mood, the better it will be for Japan.

Wednesday, March 15.

All sorts of rumours are circulated about Count Matsukata. Some people are kind enough to suggest that his resolve to resign his portfolio is prompted solely by a desire to break up the Ministry; others allege that he has no idea whatever of going out of office. The former suggestion is obviously absurd, and the latter seems too radical. The truth must be known in a few days, and in the meanwhile conjectures are idle.

FOREIGNERS AS JOURNALISTS IN JAPAN.

It is stated by the Kobe Quibbler, we observe, that the Japan Mail, "a short while ago, was quite prepared to acquiesce in the restriction of newspaper ownership and editorship to Japanese subjects." That is one of the clumsy falsehoods habitually employed by the Kobe writer. His faith in the imperfection of the public's memory is infinitely stronger than his regard for veracity. The Japan Mail never for one instant expressed acquiescence in the idea that the ownership and editorship of newspapers in Japan should be restricted to Japanese subjects. What the Japan Mail did was to deny that the restrictive clause in the Press Law had been 'inserted' with reference to the era of mixed residence, and to predict that, before the inauguration of that era, the restriction would be withdrawn. Experience has taught us that no perversion of facts, however flagrant, is beyond the audacity of the Kobe Quibbler, so we note his latest departure without any surprise.

THE TWO HOUSES.

The session of the Diet ended with an incident extremely injurious to the relations between the two Houses, and we can not but think that the fault lay chiefly with the Representatives. A conference had to be held with reference to the new Election Law, the Peers having radically changed the Bill as sent up by the Representatives, and the latter having refused to endorse the changes. For the purposes of a Conference each House appoints ten Managers—as they are called in the Law of the Houses—and it is usual for these Managers to nominate a sub-Committee composed of three Managers from each section. The sub-Committee elaborates a compromise, if possible; the Conference considers the terms of the compromise, and, if it approves them, reports them to each House, which is pretty sure to endorse them. On this occasion a basis of compromise could not be found. The Managers of the Representatives, headed by Mr. Hoshi Toru, seemed to be impressed with a conviction that as the Law under consideration related to the election of members of the Lower House only, the Peers should not have insisted on any large share in drafting it. The Managers of the Peers, on their side, held that the question was of fundamental importance from a constitutional point of view, and, while willing to meet the Representatives half way, were not prepared to subserve their own opinions altogether. The sub-committee, therefore, had to announce to the Conference its failure to discover any lines of agreement. The Conference thereupon proceeded to vote on the respective drafts of the two Houses, and as Marquis Kuroda was acting in the capacity of Chairman, the Managers of the Representatives found themselves with 10 votes against 9 on the side of the Peers. They claimed, therefore, that the result of the Conference had been favourable to the Lower House. Such, at least, was the account of the proceedings given to the Peers. But Mr. Hoshi Toru, in reporting the issue to the Representatives, did not advance any claim so frivolous. He did, however, charge the Peers with having refused to make any concession whatever, and with having failed in courtesy towards the Lower House, and he insisted that, in such a matter, the Peers should have been ready to defer largely to the wishes of the Representatives. Nothing remained, he added, except that the Lower House should thenceforth refuse to pass any measure calculated to promote the interests of the Upper. Considering that the Peers had in this matter adopted the most enlightened principles of constitutional institutions, whereas the Representatives had consulted the convenience of party politics only, Mr. Hoshi's declaration of war to the knife—a declaration to which many members of the Upper House were listening from the Peers' gallery—must have hurt the Peers not a little, especially as their managers claimed to have acted in a most conciliatory and courteous manner. That, however, might have been a matter of opinion. But it is difficult to discover any excuse for another step taken by the Lower House. Having voted that a Conference of the Houses must be held with reference to the amendments of the Credit Mobilier Law, the House immediately brought its session to a close without waiting for the Conference to be held. The singular impropriety of such a proceeding must have been aggravated in the eyes of the Peers by the fact that they themselves were even then patiently awaiting the result of the Conference on the Law of Election. They concluded their session by passing a vote of censure on the Lower House, an incident which has no parallel, we think, in the history of parliamentary institutions.

THE MOVABLES BANK.

Readers of our reports of the Diet's proceedings probably noticed the amendment which the House of Representatives made in the Government's project for the establishment of a Movable Bank. The Government's idea is a bank without any State aid except a guarantee of 5 per cent. interest on the paid-up capital. Official supervision is, of course, contemplated, and the Bank is to be competent to issue debentures to the extent of five times its paid-up capital, but the debentures are not secured by the Treasury, and the guarantee of interest on the paid-up capital is for five years only. The Representatives, when invited to consider this project, had already in their hands a private Bill for the establishment of an Industries Bank. The object of the latter was virtually the same as the object of the former, namely, to make advances against national and local securities, or debentures and shares of companies, so as to promote industrial enterprise of all kinds. The private programme, however, included one important provision which differentiated it radically from the Government's scheme; namely, a provision that if the Bank desired to place its debentures abroad, the Government should guarantee them, both as to principal and interest. In short, the projectors of the Industries Bank intended to make it a medium for introducing foreign capital, whereas the State's financiers planned the Movable Bank as a means for collecting and distributing domestic capital. Both Bills were handed to a special committee, which recommended that the provision relating to the sale of the Industries Bank's debentures in foreign markets should be grafted on the project of the Movable Bank, and the House endorsed the suggestion. The Peers will probably reject it, and they will be well advised if they do so, we venture to think, for this method of obtaining foreign capital is not more likely to succeed than any of the devices hitherto proposed or tried. Foreign capitalists would probably be ready enough to engage in banking enterprise in Japan, but they would surely insist on having a controlling voice in the management of the business. When the bonds of the Government itself find ready buyers in London and Paris, it will be time enough to talk of selling bank debentures. In formulating these proposals, the Japanese appear to lose sight of the fact that great quantities of foreign capital have already come to this country. Many millions are invested in Yokohama, Kobe and Nagasaki, and in the trade carried on there, and many times as many millions more would be at once forthcoming if there were avenues for employing them profitably under foreign management. But this last condition—foreign management—is quite essential.

THE PILOTS LAW.

Our Kobe critics show their usual carefulness and acumen in commenting on our remarks about the Pilots Law as amended by the House of Peers. The Committee of the House of Peers amended the Government's draft of the Law in the sense of restricting to Japanese subjects the privilege of serving as licensed pilots in Japanese waters. The amendment was endorsed by the House, and no provision was inserted with regard to the foreigners who have already obtained licenses and are already practising as pilots. Referring to that omission, we wrote:—

What is to be done about the foreigners who have already received licenses, and are practising as pilots? There can not be any idea of interfering with them, we presume. Indeed, we see no cause for uneasiness on that score, for the provisions of the new Law are applicable only to the granting of licenses after it goes into operation; it can not have retro-spective force. Nevertheless as it declares distinctly that only Japanese subjects can engage in the profession of piloting, the House of Peers might have been better advised had they supplemented their amendment by a provision in the sense that persons already duly licensed would remain beyond the purview of the restriction.

These observations are traversed in Kobe. They are described as showing "curious ignorance of what happened in the House of Peers." Well, what happened in the House of Peers? Did the House insert any saving clause with regard to the foreigners already licensed to practise. Not a bit of it. The House, at the suggestion of the Government, inserted the following clause in Art. 33:—

During a period of five years only from the date of the operation of this Law, it shall be competent for the Minister of State concerned to grant pilot's licenses, irrespective of the provision contained in the first clause of Art. 3 (i.e. that the applicant must be a Japanese subject). Licenses thus granted shall not lose their validity after the above period (of five years) has terminated.

This, as any reader of the most ordinary intelligence will perceive, has no reference whatever to licenses granted before the Law goes into force. It provides for the continued validity of licenses granted during the five years subsequent to the Law's operation, but it entirely ignores all licenses previously granted. Yet to say that it does not provide for the latter class of licenses is described as "curious ignorance of what occurred in the House of Peers!" We do not imagine that the restriction contained in the Law can have any bearing upon licenses already issued to foreigners, but more careful drafters would surely have removed all ambiguity on that score.

Very much quainter, however, are the remarks of our critics on the object of the above restriction, as interpreted by us. We wrote:—"The Inland Sea is practically safe against the inroads of foreign war-vessels so long as they can not procure pilots." The answer made by our profoundly thoughtful commentators is:—"Such a statement is absurd, and shows a sublime ignorance of the facts. Not only do British war-vessels never take a pilot in passing through the Inland Sea, but there are in existence the most elaborate charts which, in default of pilots, would be amply sufficient for the purposes of any war vessel;" and then they go on to note that want of pilots did not prevent the attack on Shimonoseki in 1863! There is no spectacle more diverting than unintentional comicality: it is always so artless. The whole question at issue is the action of foreign pilots' in case of war, or threatened war, and these naïve Kobe folks prattle pleasantly over the things that happen in times of peace and tranquillity. Apparently they have never heard of such affairs as submarine obstructions. Apparently it does not occur to them that if Japan were engaged in war, or if, for any reason, she found it expedient to place her coasts in a state of defence, the channels of navigation in the Inland Sea would be strewn with various obstacles which even "the most elaborate charts" in the possession of foreign warships would not show. Apparently it does not occur to them that unless the passage of trading yessels up and down the Inland Sea were suspended throughout the period of hostilities or defence, the exact locality of these obstacles must be known by the pilots. Apparently it does not occur to them that a pilot, furnished with such knowledge, could steer an enemy's ships safely through the Inland Sea although, without his aid, that body of water would be entirely "safe against the inroads of foreign war vessels." Apparently it does not occur to them that when Shimonoseki was attacked in 1863, torpedoes had not been invented. They are really quite charming, are these victims of bland innocence. If the duty of legislating for the security of an empire devolved upon them, how tranquilly its people might lie down to sleep!

A NEW STORM.

Another "discovery" has been made by political agitators, and they are working hard to raise it into public prominence. A document has been lost in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce. During the Okuma Cabinet's tenure of office, an application was received for the sale of two valuable forests owned by the State, namely, Ruri-san and Miyoken-san. The former is said to be worth over a million yen, and the latter is remarkable for its magnificent cryptomerias. But these statements are probably great exaggerations. The application went through the usual routine, and was finally approved. All such documents have a memorandum attached to them, and on the memorandum each of the officials concerned records his opinion. Before the transaction could be consummated, the Okuma Cabinet went out of office, and the memorandum was lost or misplaced by the new head of the Investigation Bureau under the Yamagata Cabinet. If it could be shown that the loss brought any substantial gain to any one, there might be reason for suspecting foul play. But the only suggestion of that kind made by the agitators is that the present officials of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce wanted to have the credit of making the desired concession, and that they therefore destroyed the memorandum with the intention of compiling another in the same sense. That sounds exceedingly far-fetched. Probably the explanation of the matter is that Mr. Hoshi Toru is rumoured to be connected with the application for the sale, and that the profits on the transaction are supposed to be destined for the money box of the Liberal Party. At all events, in the absence of an important topic of political dissension, this affair has been taken up by some members of the Tokyo press, and promises to become a nine-days' wonder.

WORK OF THE DIET.

In the three-months session formally closed on the 10th instant, the Diet achieved a legislative record. The Lower House dealt with no less than 284 measures, an average of more than 4 per working day. We are not speaking of Petitions, but of Projects of Law, Budgets, Settled Accounts, Representations, Resolutions, and Addresses to the Throne. Out of the total of 284 measures, 230 were passed, 18 rejected, 18 withdrawn, 14 not decided, and 4 not considered necessary to debate. Classifying these various Bills, it appears that 174 were presented by the Government; out of which total, 159 were passed, 4 were thrown out, 9 were withdrawn, and 2 were not decided. The Peers sent down 2 private Bills, one of which was passed and one was rejected. Members of the House of Representatives introduced 54 Projects of Law, and succeeded in having 32 of them passed, against 8 rejected, 6 withdrawn, 3 not considered necessary to discuss, and 5 left undecided. Two Addresses to the Throne were introduced in the Lower House, and one was adopted, the other, rejected. There were also 47 Representations to the Government, of which 33 were endorsed, 4 negatived, 2 withdrawn, and 8 either set aside or left undiscussed. The number of petitions presented was 667, of which, for various causes, 499, were set aside, the remainder being transmitted to the Government.

This is quite a colossal record. Indeed, such a mass of legislation would seem to be more than the nation can hope to digest successfully. It shows, at all events, that whatever may be said by some foreign critics, the Committees of the Lower House must have worked with the greatest assiduity and diligence. At present there does not seem to be any prospect of the Japanese Diet's degenerating into a talking machine. The most important measure does not bring more than three or four speakers into the rostrum, and as soon as any symptoms of duplicated arguments make themselves apparent, the closure is ruthlessly applied. There is, in truth, a marked tendency to abuse the closure. When a majority of the members have decided which way to vote, they are apt to be intolerant of their opponents' attempts to orate. It is also to be remarked that not one really eloquent speech was delivered within the walls of the House from the beginning to the end of the session. Mr. Ozaki Yukio's speech in opposition to the Bill for nationalizing Private Railways, and Mr. Seki Naohiko's speech in support of the admission of counsel to preliminary investigations in criminal cases, were, perhaps, the best specimens of parliamentary oratory. The Diet evinces a marked tendency to discount eloquence. During its first two or three sessions several of the members showed that they possessed great command of language and were gifted with many of the qualities that go to make an orator. The same men still occupy seats in the House, but their voices are virtually silent. The rule now commanding more and more faithful observance is to refrain from rhetoric or ornamental phrases, and to state facts as briefly and succinctly as possible. The Committee system is probably responsible in part. But we are inclined to think that the nature of the Japanese has also a great deal to do with it.

Another feature of the session was the absolute impotence of the Opposition. One marvelled, from day to day, what had become of the great Party which once figured so conspicuously in the political arena. It seemed to be paralysed.

Yet another feature was the large crop of exceedingly evil reports that grew up as the session proceeded. Scarcely a Bill of any importance passed its various readings without an accompaniment of accusations against the morality of the members. One man was actually named by the press as having accepted a bribe, and himself actually proclaimed the truth of the accusation. Yet the House took not the smallest notice of the incident. Of course foreign observers can draw only one conclusion. There has probably been a great deal of exaggeration. There always is exaggeration in such matters. But there must also be a substratum of truth, and we are compelled to say that the House of Representatives rises from its thirteenth session with the adjective "corrupt" prefixed to its name.

TONNAGE DUES BILL.

The Conference of the two Houses with regard to the Tonnage Dues Law ended in a compromise, as might have been anticipated. The Government's proposal was that a vessel should pay ten sen per ton (net register) on entering a port, and that a lump payment of 30 sen per ton should confer the right of entering that port throughout a twelve-month. The Lower House amended these figures, first, by cutting down the payment of 10 sen to 5 sen; secondly, by providing that a payment of 10 sen per ton at the first port of entry should clear a vessel for all other ports on the same voyage; and thirdly, by adding that a single payment of 30 sen per ton should give the right of entry to any Japanese port for a year. But the agreement came to at the Conference of the two Houses was that the rates proposed by the Government should be reduced by one half. Thus a ship will have to pay 5 sen per ton at each port, and a single payment of 15 sen will clear her for twelve months with respect to the port where it is paid. This method will be easier to enforce than that proposed by the House of Representatives. Japanese journals are inclined to fear that foreign steamers will reduce their ports of call in this country so as to avoid the tax, but we doubt whether the amount is sufficient to produce that result.

THE RICE CROP.

Official statistics have now been collected with reference to the rice crop of last year. The Shogyo Shimpō publishes the figures. The total yield was 47,387,666 koku, or about $1\frac{1}{2}$ million koku larger than the most hopeful estimate. Such a crop has no parallel. The average yield is 38,564,408 koku, and the yield in 1897 was 33,039,293 koku, so that last year's figure is 23 per cent. above the average, and 43.4 per cent. above the crop of 1897. First class unhulled rice now sells for 10.53 yen per koku; second class for 9.90 yen, and 3rd class for 9.52 yen, the average being 9.98 yen. It will be seen, therefore, that the country derives from its rice crop of 1898 a return greater by 143 million yen than the return obtained in 1897.

THE SPECIE BANK.

The Specie Bank's regular semi-annual meeting was held on the 10th instant, when the following account was presented for the second half of 1898:—

Dr.	Yen.
Gross Earnings for the half-year.....	5,272,031
Brought over from Previous Account...	339,817
	5,611,848
Total Expenses, Losses &c....	3,942,258
Net Profit	1,669,590
Cr.	Yen.
To General Reserve	300,000
To Reserve for Equalization of Dividends	40,000
Rewards to Officers	79,786
Dividend (15 per cent. annually on old shares and No 1 New Shares; 12.25 on No 2 New Shares)	787,500
Building Fund	100,000
Carried to next Account	362,304
	1,669,590

The President, Mr. Soma, in presenting the Report, made a speech of some length. The appreciation of commodities, he said, and the excess of imports had reached their maxima in the half-year covered by the Report, and signs had subsequently become apparent that things were tending to resume their normal condition. Simultaneously with a gradual checking of the once rapid outflow of specie, prices had begun to fall, and although the customs returns showed an excess of imports over exports amounting to 111 million yen for the year, a fine rice harvest had put an end to the large arrivals of grain from abroad, and exports had simultaneously begun to grow. Manufacturers, also, had shown a disposition to heed the warnings of experience, so that the demand for capital diminished, and the Government, having received in May the whole remainder of the Indemnity from China, had, by bringing part of the money into the country, diminished the large excess of specie exports which must otherwise have been recorded. The sum of the excess stood at 44 million yen, much of which had consisted of silver coin and silver bullion. Money had gradually become easier, and the Banks, following the example of the Bank of Japan, had reduced their rate of interest. The Treasury's purchases of Bonds had helped to improve the situation, and on the whole there was reason to think that, unless something unforeseen should occur, the money market and the general course of business would now assume a satisfactory aspect. Mr. Soma then referred to financial conditions abroad: the outflow of gold to America which had led the Bank of England to raise its rate of interest from 2½ to 3 per cent., and subsequently to the very unusual figure of 4, in consequence of the demand for gold in Germany; the abnormally fine crop of wheat in the United States, and the consequent large exports of grain to Europe, with the result that much of the money obtained by the exporters had been invested in Europe, so that America, instead of attracting foreign capital, as had hitherto been the case, began to send capital abroad seeking employment. After the termination of the war with Spain business had been somewhat slow to recover its healthy tone, but ultimately the effects of restored peace had been felt, and, further, the cotton-spinning industry of Japan had benefited by cheap cotton in the United States in consequence of an abundant crop and a small demand from Europe. On the other hand, the domestic market for yarns had been somewhat unhealthy, and, although the trade with Shanghai had been better than that during the previous half year, the Hongkong record had been unfavourable, owing to losses incurred by Chinese merchants there in connexion with rice speculations. During the first part of the half-year the price of bills upon America and Europe had been steady, but from September, owing to the bringing home of the Indemnity and to the large movement in imports, the Bank had found it expedient to sell bills rather than to buy them. Happily the great sums invested in imports, which had caused the Bank much concern, had begun to be gradually realized, and further, no severe fluctuations having taken place in the gold price of silver, satisfactory results had, on the whole, been obtained. Mr. Soma then spoke of the reputation and consequent increase of business accruing to the Bank's London Branch on account of handling the Indemnity; of the establishment of branches in Tokyo and Nagasaki; of the despatch of Mr. Yamakawa on a tour of inspection to China; of the appointment of Mr. Takahashi, one of their Directors, to be Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, and of the honorarium of 10,000 yen given to him by the Bank in consideration of his long and able service.

THE FRENCH ARMY.

A correspondent suggests that some of our readers may be misled by our translation of the telegram published on the 11th instant, with reference to M. de Freycinet's statement in the Chamber of Deputies. We made the French Minister of War say that "the country should not seek to reach the effective strength of the German Army," and our correspondent thinks that the words "effective strength" may convey to some people the significance of fighting power. In military language "effective strength" means simply the number of men borne on the roll for service in the field. The expression has a purely numerical sense. We do not ourselves imagine that any English reader can have found the term ambiguous, but in deference to our correspondent's suggestion we offer this explanation. M. de Freycinet's point, as we understand it, is nothing more than a repetition of a familiar military axiom:—Soldiers are useful only so far as they can be utilized. The Army of France has certain tolerably well defined functions to perform. The Minister of War estimates that its present establishment is amply sufficient to discharge those functions, actual or prospective, and that to increase its numbers to a degree disproportionate with the ends to be achieved, merely for the sake of rivalling or surpassing the numerical strength of a neighbouring Power, would be wasteful. The statement possesses great interest, for it amounts to a recognition of a principle automatically operating to produce the result which the Czar aims at achieving by diplomacy. If France is satisfied that her Army has now reached its limit of useful strength, she need not attend the pending Disarmament Conference, nor need the Conference seek to fix artificial restrictions of the nature contemplated, since they are fixed by factors much more trustworthy than any arbitrary provisions of international covenants.

SUPERFICIES.

Her Britannic Majesty's Minister, in a letter to the Honourable T. H. Whitehead, of which we published in this issue a copy, adds his testimony to that of the many competent authorities who have already informed the public that, according to the new Civil Code of Japan, subjects and citizens of the Treaty Powers will be entitled after next July, to obtain land for building purposes on leases the period of which may be fixed at any number of years convenient to the contracting parties. Our readers can not have forgotten the remarkably persistent denials of this fact which were published by local newspapers in Yokohama and Kobe in 1897, and the violence with which they traversed our interpretation of the Code. They even went so far as to accuse us of wilfully throwing dust in the eyes of the foreign public, the Kobe Chronicle being particularly conspicuous in its asseverations that the Code did not confer, and was not intended to confer, any such right. The point did not really admit of any doubt, and Her Majesty's Minister merely repeats the interpretation necessarily given to the Code by all competent readers. We learn with some surprise, however, from Sir Ernest Satow's letter, that no British subject has ever asked him for an opinion. We imagined that members of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce had done so, but the explanation doubtless is that, being quite satisfied about the plain meaning of the Code, they saw no reason to seek information from the Legation in Tokyo. It is to be regretted, however, that the Kobe memorialists did not adopt that simple precaution before putting their names to the document which they addressed to the British Foreign Office last year. They laid much stress in their Memorial on the fact that 20 years was the maximum period for land leases in Japan, and they dismissed, as practically valueless, the form of lease called "superficies," thus showing not only ignorance of facts, but also carelessness about seeking information, which, added to the intemperate and unjustified charges preferred in another part of the Memorial against the good faith of the Japanese Government, stamped the document as one of the most unfortunate that ever received the signatures of a number of responsible men. Sir Ernest Satow, in his letter to Mr. Whitehead, might have supplemented his information about superficies by pointing out that, although individual foreigners will not be entitled to own land in this country under the new system, companies registered in Japan will enjoy that privilege.

This leads us to the old question, now again brought on the tapis by the Kobe Chamber of Commerce, namely, the question of foreign capital and foreign ownership of land. The Chamber has placed on record its opinion that capital will not come to this country until the restriction upon foreign ownership of land is withdrawn. It is a pity that some demonstration of that proposition is not given by its formulators. We ourselves are strongly in favour of removing the restriction, for it merely injures Japan and hampers enterprise without conferring on the Japanese any beneficial security whatever. Moreover the land question has been pushed into such prominence that it now possesses factitious importance, and constitutes a kind of bogie in the eyes of foreign capitalists. But has it really any claim to so much consideration? If an individual foreigner can obtain a lease of land for one hundred or two hundred years, and if two or more foreigners organized into a company can become actual owners of land, what is there to deter the foreign capitalist from erecting factories, building warehouses, constructing docks, or engaging in any other money-making enterprise? We know of one foreign company engaged at this moment in acquiring, for a purpose that will involve a large outlay of capital, lands which will be held from next July under a superficies, or owned by the company in its capacity of a legal person. Unfortunately all questions of this nature, instead of being discussed with the calm intelligence which they deserve, are quickly carried into an atmosphere of controversial caloric which stifles dispassionate reflection. But the Kobe Chamber of Commerce might have offered some demonstration of its very radical dictum about land and capital.

RELIGIOUS TEACHERS IN PRISONS.

It has been shown very clearly from the Government's explanations that the accusation preferred by some over-zealous persons in the matter of the Sugamo Prison was without foundation. Whether the Buddhist teachers at the jail mistook the nature of the official action, or whether rumour, as usual, perverted facts, the allegation that some of the Buddhist priests were authoritatively removed in order to make room for a Christian pastor appears to have been quite incorrect. What the Governor of the Prison did was simply to grant permission to a Christian pastor to take part in the functions hitherto discharged by Buddhists alone; a just and natural step, seeing that a fraction of the prisoners were Christians. The Buddhists seem to have taken umbrage at this infringement of their monopoly. They declined to work side by side with a Christian, and the result of their self-effacement was a situation which could easily be made to wear an arbitrary and unjust aspect. For whereas, out of some 1,900 prisoners only 30 were Christians, the withdrawal of the Buddhist teachers left the whole flock in charge of one Christian pastor, and the friends of Buddhism had no difficulty in demonstrating the impropriety of such a state of affairs. But it will be seen at once that the fault did not lie with the officials; it lay with the Buddhists themselves, since they preferred to abandon the field altogether rather than to share it with a Christian. We should be doing them an injustice, however, if we rested our statement of the case there. Another point has to be noted, namely, that prisoners in Government jails are not altogether free agents in the matter of receiving religious instruction. They have to attend services performed and listen to sermons preached in a hall set apart for those purposes. The Buddhists, therefore, argue, with much reason, that to compel 1900 persons to attend the ministrations of a Christian pastor because there happen to be 30 Christians among them, is arbitrary and unfair. It suggests itself at once to ordinary minds that the simplest way out of the difficulty is to give practical effect to the provisions of the Constitution by granting entire freedom of conscience to the prisoners. That they should be required to receive religious instruction may be very well, but that Christians should be compelled to attend Buddhist ministrations, or Buddhists to listen to Christian services and Christian prayers, is contrary to the principle of freedom of conscience. It is conceivable that some difficulty might be experienced in regulating the hours of prison labour so as to make separate services possible for the followers of different faiths, but, since the thing is done in Europe and America, it can be done in Japan also.

Another point which seems to have been overlooked in connexion with this question is that to exclude Christian teachers from the jails would be to deprive the female prisoners of religious ministrations by persons of their own sex. In Western countries the fact that reformatory work among women should be done by women is constantly receiving wider recognition. The English Prison Gate Mission, which is under the patronage of the Duchess of York, the Prisoners' Aid Mission, and others have combined in testifying how much women may do for women criminals. The Japanese Government fully recognises that the prison system stands in need of improvement. Undoubtedly an important step in the right direction would be to allow educated female teachers of morality to have access to the thousands of women undergoing sentence in the jails throughout the country. There is no question of paid instructors. Plenty of women are ready to undertake the work for the love of charity and morality, as they do in England and other Occidental countries. Buddhism does not furnish female instructors at present, but doubtless that defect would soon be remedied if the fact of its existence were recognised. We understand that Buddhist priests now visit the women's jails regularly, and it can not be questioned that they do a great deal of good. But their usefulness must always be inferior to that of sympathetic educated women, who not only minister to the convict while she is undergoing sentence, but are ready also to advise her after she has emerged from prison. Apart from the problem as between Buddhism and Christianity, we have here a very obvious deficiency on the side of the former.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

The Dreyfus affair must soon be carried to its finale. This morning the telegraph says that the celebrated dossier secret will be handed almost immediately to the Court of Cassation by the Minister of War, and thereafter there should be little delay in the Court's proceedings. It may reasonably be hoped that the verdict of the highest tribunal in the land will silence all further cavil or objection: Dreyfus' guilt or innocence will be placed beyond question so soon as the Court has spoken. Meanwhile, the public will learn with pleasure that Colonel Picquart is to be tried by a civil tribunal. Rightly or wrongly a strong impression prevails that, in view of the passions which have been excited, a court martial would not be likely to render full justice. At all events M. de Freycinet is adopting the most sagacious course when he resolves to employ every possible means of disarming criticism.

JUDICIAL AFFAIRS.

The Minister of State for Justice has addressed to Public Procurators an instruction having for its object the promotion and facilitating of judicial business. The document runs as follows:—

1. Since among the functions devolving upon a Public Procurator that of instituting a prosecution demands the utmost circumspection, it is essential to the proper discharge of his duty that when, in consequence of a charge preferred or of any other circumstance, he undertakes to institute proceedings, he should, whether a preliminary examination or a public trial be in contemplation, make the fullest possible scrutiny into the facts and the evidence, and should not take steps to institute a prosecution unless he is firmly convinced that a verdict of guilty can be obtained against the accused party.

2. The Judicial Police, also, should be instructed to act in accord with the above spirit and to exercise the utmost care to avoid any infringement of the rights of the person. With respect to trifling offences, when they consider that the proofs of guilt are not conclusive, or that, although such proofs are at hand, the injury caused by the offence is so petty that punitive measures are not essential in the interests of the public, the Judicial Police should conclude the examination at once, set the accused free forthwith, and merely send forward the documents relating to the case, so that anything like needless interference with the liberty of the subject may be avoided.

3. Alike in preliminary examinations and in public trials, the necessity of keeping an accused person under arrest is limited to cases where there is reason to apprehend that, if released, he may abscond or destroy the proofs of his guilt; and it is therefore a matter of course that accused persons should not be indiscriminately held under restraint. Hence, even in the case of accused persons who have been placed under arrest, their speedy release on bail or by intrusting (shifu), when their further detention is not deemed essential to the conduct of the case, should be borne in mind, and even though no application in that sense has been made by the accused, the Public Procurator, of his own accord, should inform him that consent can be obtained, and should make every effort, on the one hand, to respect rights of personal liberty, and, on the other, to shorten the period of detention.

4. Complaints have often been made that judicial proceedings are protracted and that the period of detention is lengthy. Such complaints are due primarily to want of accurate knowledge of the prescribed processes of Law Courts, especially in appeal cases where the facts are complicated and great difficulty is experienced in their investigation. Nevertheless the officials concerned ought to pay due attention to this point. Hence, in Local Courts and tribunals of inferior grade, when the facts of a case are simple and the proofs are considered sufficient, the hearing should be commenced with all possible expedition, whether there is question of a flagrant offence or otherwise, so that, provided no objection be raised by the accused, the judgment of the Court may be pronounced on the same day as, or on the day after, that when the prosecution was instituted. In cases of appeal, also, these points should be kept in view, and suitable measures should be devised with the object of expediting the proceedings and reducing the period of detention in jail.

Apart from the points covered by the above injunction, any measures which seem calculated to promote reform and improvement should be taken at once, to the end that all causes of dissatisfaction may be removed.

These are very excellent instructions, and if the delays that occur in judicial proceedings are attributable to want of diligence on the part of the police, the Public Procurators, or the Judges, the Minister's circular ought to produce a good effect. There are reasons to doubt, however, whether the judicial establishment in Japan is adequate to discharge the duties devolving on it. The Minister of Justice, speaking recently in the House of Peers, said that whereas France has 359 local courts and 2,866 district courts, and Ger-

* Kiroi ni hore no shabaku shi (not "release on bail," as one of our contemporaries has translated it).

† Kenji wa susunde hore no koto suru no i oon kyoshi (not "the public prosecutor should in his own initiative allow bail," as translated by a contemporary. A Public Prosecutor has no power to grant bail.)

many 172 local courts and 1,914 district courts, the corresponding numbers in Japan's case are 49 and 298. That is a very glaring discrepancy, and when we consider it, our wonder is, not that delays occur, but that so much expedition should be achieved. In the same speech the Minister read a table which it will be well to reproduce in this context:—

Number of persons who underwent preliminary examination in 1897				20,482
No. of decisions rendered within	5 days			930
do	do	10 do		1,903
do	do	15 do		2,365
do	do	20 do		2,229
do	do	30 do		3,376
do	do	60 do		5,475
do	do	90 do		2,076
do	do	180 do		1,424
do	do	do one year		231

No. of decisions not rendered within a year. 23
It should be explained that with the Public Procurator rests the primary duty of deciding whether a case shall be brought before the examining Judges or not. If he concludes that there is no evidence justifying such a course, the matter ends then and there. The cases tabulated above are those which were brought forward by the Public Procurator, and certainly the fact that out of every twenty cases examined by Juges d'Instruction only one was disposed of within 5 days, only three within 10 days, and only five within 15 days, does not constitute a very eloquent testimony to the rapidity of judicial proceedings in Japan. No doubt an increase of the number of Juges d'Instruction would expedite matters.

With regard to bail, it will be observed that the Minister of Justice instructs Public Procurators, of their own accord, to inform the accused person that an application by him will be successful, when he has failed to make such application though the circumstances of the case warrant it. In Japanese criminal procedure there are two methods of releasing a prisoner pending final judgment. Bail may be granted, or the Judge may hand him over to his relatives, enjoining the latter to produce him if necessary. The former is called hoshaku; the latter sekifu. It is scarcely necessary to say that a Judge has no power to grant bail unless an application be duly made for it. That is in the nature of things, for bail requires securities, and a Judge can neither furnish securities nor require the accused to furnish them. The Judge is, therefore, quite powerless in the matter of bail until the accused or his counsel makes application for it. When, however, the case is so trivial, or when the accused is implicated to such a small extent, that, in the opinion of the Court, no guarantee for his re-appearance is necessary, the Judge has competence to release him, even without application, merely desiring his family or relatives to re-produce him, if required. No penalty attaches to failure on the part of the family or relatives, so that the matter is altogether distinct from bail. It has been found in practice that the privilege of bail is not so largely claimed as it might be, the accused being often ignorant of his rights or of the procedure to be followed in asserting them. With the object of correcting that defect Public Procurators are now instructed to advise an accused person when an application for bail or "intrusting" is likely to be successful, and Judges are reminded that, consistently with the interests of justice, release by bail or by the process of sekifu is desirable. There has been a great deal of very singular writing in Kobe on this subject of bail. The newspaper which distinguished itself in 1897 by confusing and obscuring the facts about land-leases and superficies, insisted recently on the manifestly absurd proposition that Japanese Judges are required by law to grant bail even though no application has been made for it, and then endeavoured to hide its blunder under the subterfuge that the law does actually confer such competence on Judges with regard to sekifu, though sekifu and bail are two entirely distinct affairs. We observe that the same journal, referring to the instruction translated above, interprets it thus:—"When the case is of a trivial nature the accused must be liberated on bail or placed in the care of his relatives, even though the accused does not ask for bail." This is very misleading, and if any unfortunate foreigner happens to rely on such a rendering of the law, he will commit a costly mistake. It can not be too clearly understood that Japanese Judges have no power to grant bail of their own initiative, and that the Instruction just issued by the Minister of Justice does not, and could not, alter the law in any way, but merely recommends Public Procurators, in certain cases, to advise accused persons that an application for bail or sekifu is in order and will doubtless be favourably entertained by the Judge.

THE POLICE AND THE JAILS.

We stated, some time ago, that the Government had decided to open a place of instruction for police and jail officials. The information may now be supplemented by saying that three German experts are to be employed as instructors. It will not be thought invidious, we trust, if we express some surprise that Germans only should be chosen for such a purpose. They do most things well in Germany, and Japan might congratulate herself if she possessed a prison system such as that which has been gradually organized in Saxony, for example, since the establishment of the celebrated penitentiary of Zwickau. But it can scarcely be claimed that German prisons stand first on the list in Europe, and, with regard to police, the force in Germany is generally said to be permeated by a military spirit which detracts greatly from the popularity of its methods. The political police constitute an important element in Germany, and the duties they perform with regard to the press, societies, clubs, and public and social amusements are not regulated by careful regard for the liberty of the subject. It may reasonably be claimed that in view of the very large preponderance of Anglo-Saxons among the foreign residents in Japan, police instructors should have been taken from England and America, for, other things being equal, Japan would certainly find it most convenient to train her police after the methods of the countries with which her chief intercourse will always be. We are aware that, at some points, her institutions have more in common with those of Germany than with those of England and America. For instance, the department which exists in Berlin for the supervision of prostitution has no counterpart in London or New York, whereas Japan has such a department. That is a partial explanation. One thing seems quite plain, however. It is that if Japan wants to see the Revised Treaties work smoothly, she ought to engage three or four British or American inspectors of police for executive duty in Yokohama and Kobe. The foreign offender will be incomparably more tractable if he knows that he has to do in the last resort with a constable or inspector of Occidental origin.

MR. MARIANO PONCE.

Mr. Ponce, who is spoken of by the vernacular press as a Secretary of Aguinaldo, was entertained by the journalists of Tokyo at the Tokyo Club—not the Club of mixed nationalities, but the purely Japanese Club which has its habitat in the former Tokyo Hotel—on the 13th instant. It is carefully explained that the affair was not intended to be a demonstration in any sense, but that the hosts desired to learn what views are really entertained by the Filipinos as to the situation and its probable outcome. Mr. Ponce spoke very frankly. He said that the Filipinos were sincerely grateful to the Americans for driving the Spaniards out of the island, but that they did not intend to be swallowed up by their benefactors, nor could they believe that a people like the Americans, richly endowed with the spirit of righteousness and wedded to the principles of popular Government, would attempt to impose the yoke of a foreign Power on a nation struggling for freedom. He claimed that the administration of the islands during the past eight months had demonstrated the competence of the Filipinos to discharge autonomic functions; that the constant attempts made to discredit their capacity for self-government were simply pretexts to justify annexation; and that the cession of the Philippines to America by Spain was illegal, inasmuch as Spain, having ceased to be mistress of the islands, had forfeited her right to hand them over to a foreign State. Altogether it was a defiant and mettlesome speech, winding up with an appeal to Japanese journalists to help in obtaining recognition of Filipino independence. Some phrases seemed to suggest willingness to accept local autonomy under American suzerainty, but other utterances implied a resolve not to accept anything short of full independence. Dr. Ponce failed to suggest a fact which has now become apparent, namely, that had the Filipinos refrained from rebellion, they would have received much more consideration than they are likely to get now.

THE EDUCATION OF THE JUDICIARY.

Five Public Procurators and Four Judges have been ordered to proceed on a ten months' tour to foreign countries for the purpose of studying judicial procedure. Two Procurators and one Judge are destined for Germany and Austria; one Procurator and two Judges for Italy and France, and one Procurator and two Judges for England and America. This step is taken in connexion with the preparations for the operation of the Revised Treaties, and we may therefore infer that these Procurators and Judges will, on their return, be employed in tribunals before which foreigners are likely to appear.

Owing to the severity of the weather three bears made their way into the city of Vancouver on Feb. 17. They were promptly killed, however.

THE LAW OF ELECTION.

THERE seems to be a great deal of misunderstanding about the points of difference between the two Houses of the Diet with regard to the new Law of Election. The Government had four objects in view when it framed the project submitted to the Lower House. It desired, first, to extend the franchise; secondly, to widen the area of election districts; thirdly, to introduce the system of unsigned ballots and scrutin individuel, thus securing to every elector complete independence and providing for the representation of minorities; and fourthly, to procure larger representation for the commercial and manufacturing classes, which are now most unfairly outweighed by the agricultural members. As to the two first of these objects, the Lower House raised no objection. It went even farther than the Government in lowering the franchise qualifications, and it was quite content that Cities and Prefectures should be the future electoral districts. But it would not have unsigned ballots; it would not have scrutin individuel, and it declined to make any new arrangement with regard to the representation of the urban and rural populations. The Upper House, on the contrary, endorsed the Government's proposals en bloc. Hence, when a conference of the two Houses was held, the major points of dispute were:—(1) Signed or unsigned ballots; (2) scrutin individuel or scrutin de liste; and (3) the relative representation of the urban and rural populations. It was supposed that the delegates of the Lower House would show some obstinacy in adhering to scrutin de liste and signed ballots. They did not. They conceded these two points without difficulty. Hence there remained only the problem of adjusting the ratio of urban to rural representatives. That, however, was a crucial problem. The Government's project was that every urban district should return at least one member, and that if its population exceeded 50,000, it should return a second member for each excess of 80,000, or fraction of 80,000. A rural district, on the other hand, was to return only one member until its population exceeded 120,000, after which limit it would be entitled to elect a second member for every additional 12,000, or fraction of that number. This system the Lower House amended radically. It swept away the distinction of urban and rural, and decided that every district should return one member until its population exceeded 100,000, after which it should have an additional representative for every additional 10,000 of population, or fraction of that number not less than 50,000. The results of the two projects would have been:—

GOVERNMENT PROJECT.
Rural Representatives	347
Urban Representatives	98
Total	445

LOWER HOUSE'S PROJECT.

Rural Representatives	394
Urban Representatives	76
Total	470

The urban population of Japan aggregates 10 millions, in round numbers, against a rural population of 32 millions. Hence, assuming the two classes equal, unit for unit, in respect of wealth, intelligence, and education—an assumption very unfair to the urban folks—there ought to be one urban representative for every three rural; in other words, if the total membership of the House be 445, the urban constituencies should have 111 seats and the rural, 334; and if the total membership be 470, the ratio of urban to rural representatives should be 118 to 352. These calculations show how widely the Lower House's project diverged from the indications of justice; and the divergence becomes still more flagrant when we observe that in every moral and material qualification for parliamentary representation the urban population has a marked advantage over the rural. Thus when the conference of the two Houses came to consider this question, it was necessary either that the Delegates of the Lower House should agree to a fundamental change, in the sense of discriminating between the urban and the rural populations; or that the delegates of the Peers should abandon one of the chief purposes, if not the cardinal purpose, contemplated by the Government in framing the Law. It was here that the Conference failed. The delegates of the Representatives declared their willingness to raise the inferior limit from 100,000 to 120,000 for urban and rural districts alike, thus reducing the total membership to 406. The delegates of the Peers declared that they were not concerned about the dimensions of the total membership, their paramount aim being to secure a proper proportion of seats for the urban population. They offered to concede certain minor points—namely, to reduce the security lodged by persons appealing to the Law Courts against the result of an election, and to enfranchise the inhabitants of the Goto Islands, of Sado, and of Iki—but they insisted on re-asserting, in part at any rate, the basic principle of the Government's project. To this the delegates of the Lower House would not agree, and thus the Bill failed to pass. Impartial onlookers must condemn the action of the Lower House's delegates. The urban population's electoral rights demanded just recognition, whereas they were sacrificed on the altar of party interests. Of course these reforms are only deferred.

The blizzard that raged through the eastern States on February 12th was very severe. In Washington snow fell to the depth of three feet, and the Senate had to open without prayer, the Chaplain being snow-bound. In New York, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, and other big cities many deaths resulted. In Florida great damage was done to the orange groves.

CONCERT AT UYENO.

A most interesting concert was given in Tokyo on Saturday afternoon, the 11th instant, by the Meiji Ongaku Kwai—in the Uyeno Music Hall. This society consists of Japanese gentlemen who are devoting their leisure time to the study and practice of European instrumental music. After working by themselves for a year or two they have recently induced that enthusiastic amateur, Mr. E. H. House, to become their Conductor, with excellent results.

The band consisted of thirteen pieces, Violins (4), Viola, Cello and Contrabasso, Flute, Clarinets (2), Cornet, Horn, and Trombone, and was most admirably balanced. Mr. House is a true artist, and, though he had not a large palette of colours with which to work, he succeeded in producing some exquisite paintings in miniature.

As to the performers they showed an earnestness of purpose worthy of all praise. Intonation and timbre generally good, the selections performed were done with a mechanical and technical precision, remarkable in beginners. Courage, gentlemen! press on! you have overcome the initial difficulties, and possess the key which will unlock for you the mighty thoughts of the great tone poets of the West.

With regard to the programme, numbers 2, 5, and 10 were the most satisfactory in performance. Indeed so well was the dainty Elfen-marsch played that it had to be repeated. The efforts of the society are at present most successful in quiet slow movements; the necessary élan for the proper representation of quick brilliant numbers has yet to come.

Mrs. Mollison kindly gave some vocal pieces in her own inimitable style, the accompaniments thereto being essayed by Mrs. F. H. Clark in the absence of Mr. Mason.

The hall was well filled by an attentive and delighted audience, and we congratulate the Meiji Ongaku Kwai upon its present success; but above all upon securing the help of their talented conductor, who is devoting his erudition and cultured leisure to their cause.

Ancient Dorian Mode.)
- 10—Galea "Storm" —

PROROGATION OF THE DIET.

The ceremony of proroguing the Diet took place on the 10th instant at 11 a.m. The Speech from the Throne was, as usual, very brief:—"We hereby inform the two Houses that the Imperial Diet stands prorogued from this day, and We take the opportunity of expressing Our satisfaction that you have fully discharged your functions of consent in accordance with Our intentions."

TOKYO ROADS.

There is a story current in Tokyo at present which illustrates the citizens' idea of the state of the roads. A rustic, having paid his first visit to the capital, is said to have been questioned, on his return home, about his impressions of the city. "Well," he replied, "it was certainly fine. But everything wasn't on as big a scale as I expected. The shops are grand, and the houses are rich, and the electric light wakes one up; but the paddy-fields are poor things. Why, we have much bigger ones in our own village." The gentleman had mistaken the streets for paddy-fields.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Rikugō Zasshi has an article on the fear of foreigners which has for centuries rested like a nightmare on the minds of a certain class of Japanese. It existed, says this organ, to a limited extent in the Ashikaga era, but under the Tokugawa rule it was immensely increased by the anti-Christian policy of the Government. The arrival of Perry and the forcing of a treaty on the hitherto powerful Japanese Government multiplied a hundred-fold the vague apprehensions of the nation. It cannot be said that the events of the last thirty years have altered the feelings of the mass of the people. The general notion throughout the provinces, as may be seen by the public utterances of the representatives of the people, is still a craven and unworthy dread of the Occidental, who is regarded as a grasping, unscrupulous intruder, who comes to Japan in order to take what he can, but gives nothing in return. The Rikugō divides the people that still regard the foreigner as a hobgoblin into two classes, namely, those who bark and those who wag their tails, and adds, sono nasu koto wa ryōhō betsu naredomo, sono kokoro no soko wa onaji, tada osore no kokoro, kore nari, "Though their action is different, at the bottom of their hearts both parties have the same feeling, which is nothing but fear." The barkers and the fawners alike, says the Rikugō, are under a misapprehension. As a matter of fact, if Japan will but set about fitting herself for the altered situation she can have nothing to fear. The respects in which it is necessary for us to show a bold front to foreigners are five in number. (1) In armaments; (2) in learning, arts, and industries; (3) in law and politics; (4) in wealth; and (5) in religion and morality. About the three first there is no room for apprehension, but as regards the two last we are not ready to compete with the Occidental, say some. All the hysterical writing about mixed residence is connected with a consciousness of comparative poverty or a consciousness of a certain class of moral and religious inferiority. Not a few allege that foreigners are so rich that they will buy us up everywhere; while others affirm that Christians are pushing and their methods of propaganda so superior to ours that our creeds will stand no chance against them. There is a good deal of truth in what is said about the superiority of foreigners in the two particulars above specified. But the proper remedy is not to decry competition, but to encourage it to the utmost, to rest assured that the fittest will survive, and to make up our minds that we can improve ourselves to such an extent as not eventually to fall behind Occidentals in the race. We welcome the near approach of mixed residence, because we believe that it is destined to remove the last of all the causes of fear that have been cherished by a large section of the nation. The policy of trying to defend what is indefensible had better at once be abandoned. What is destructible nobody can save. The test about to be applied will soon show what is trustworthy and what not.

A magazine has been started in connection with the Central Tabernacle, Hongō, which bears the title of the Chūō-kaidō Kyōhō. In the first number, the Rev. H. H. Coates states the principles which the new periodical is designed to enunciate and explain, which are of the ordinary orthodox type. At a meeting held at the Tabernacle reported in the new magazine Mr. Tomeoka Kōsuke spoke on "Prison Reform." As Mr. Tomeoka has made a special study of this subject, we furnish an abstract of his address:—There are three kinds of prison reform that should be considered separately, namely, reforms effected by governments, reforms which result from educating agencies, and reforms brought about by religious teaching. It is in this last that I take a special interest, and which for the past 15 years I have been endeavouring to further. I have met with a good deal of indifference and opposition to my work even among professing Christians. After visiting various prisons I came to the conclusion that the reformatories and other facilities for improving the minds of criminals were altogether inadequate. I laid my views before the Authorities, and as a result I was employed in the Sugamo prison, where I had an opportunity of carrying out the principles that I had advocated. . . . The urgency of prison reform in Japan may be shown by comparing Japanese statistics of crime with those of other countries. According to the latest report issued by the Home Department, the number of prisoners in Japan to-day is 70,000 and the number of prisons a little over 100. No fewer than 13,000 men are required to guard these prisoners, and the cost is about 4½ million yen, to which must be added another 16 million yen as the cost of the maintenance of the Police and Courts of Law. Criminals are on the increase year by year, and the number of persons who are committed for second offences is stated to be 70 per cent. In England there is one criminal among every 1,600 persons. The rate in America is 1.2 for every 1,000 persons, America having 90,000 prisoners in a population of 70 millions. Our rate is almost 2 for every 1,000 inhabitants. . . . There are many who maintain that it is quite impossible to reclaim persons who have repeatedly been transgressors, but our experience goes to prove that this theory is quite false. According to statistics furnished by Mr. Hara Taneaki, who is engaged in Reformatory work, about 84 per cent. of the ex-prisoners in Reformatories have been reformed. My experience goes to show that the majority of the prisoners that return to a life of crime do so on account of the difficulty of making a living by honest work rather than as a result of the promptings of criminal instincts. The study of crime which I made while serving in the Sugamo gaol convinced me that in a very large number of cases it is his surroundings that makes the criminal, and that if we wish to bring about a decrease of crime, we must purify the moral atmosphere which is inhaled from morning to night by certain sections of the lower orders.

In the magazine from which we have quoted above Mr. Takagi Jintarō contends that there are three ideas that are absent from the Japanese mind in its normal condition. (1) A definite idea of God. (2) A clear notion of what constitutes sin. (3) A belief in a future life. Entirely new conceptions on these subjects need to be imported from abroad and instilled into the minds of the rising generation, says Mr. Takagi.

Mr. Uchimura Kanzō has some hard things to say about the Dōshisha trustees in the magazine of which he is the editor, the Tōkyō Dokuritu Zasshi. The title of the article is 神と金, Zoku to Kami ("God and Mammon," or "Things Sacred and Things Common"). "The Dōshisha," says Mr. Uchimura, is "an institution that was established by an extremely heterogeneous set of people. Among its originators there were men of strong Unitarian tendencies, there were clerks of foreign merchants, there were stockbrokers, there were banking people, there were evangelists of an emasculated type, there were religious schemers, and there were newspaper editors. On the one hand the promoters of the movement accepted money of American Christian believers; on the other they helped to fill their coffers with the polluted coin of men like the late Count Goto. Who can be surprised at the turn that things have taken? The fruits that the tree has borne are just what might be expected from it. To our minds Buddhism, Confucianism, or Mohammedanism is infinitely preferable to such a veritable hodge-podge of things sacred and things secular as has been dished up by these Dōshisha caterers. The whole affair is something of which Japanese have reason to be ashamed. . . . It is not of the failure of the institution that we complain, but of the ignominious way in which it failed. The Dōshisha, it is quite evident, does not believe in the Christianity on which it is said to be founded. The action of the trustees has damaged Japanese reputation and injured the Christian cause in Japan. As citizens these men have been disloyal, and as professors of religion they have been insincere."

The Dōshisha question is discussed in other organs, but it seems to us that there is not much that is new to be said about it. A long article that lies before us contends that the Japanese trustees were willing to carry out the spirit of the original rules of the Association, but that the American Missionaries insist on the observance of the letter of the rules as well, and wish to have Christian services regularly held in the school, as was at one time done. It is quite evident that the parties concerned have lost confidence in each other. By the parties concerned we mean the former trustees and the representatives of the American Board. From information which has reached us from another source, we gather that the New Trustees are likely to come to an understanding with the Board as to future action.

We read in the Kirisutōkyō Shimbun that arrangements are being made to call a meeting of leading Japanese and foreign Christians for the middle of March. It is to be a grand affair, and the Kirisutōkyō Shimbun is confident that it will cause a stir. Invitations to attend are to be sent to Ministers of State and other high officials. Addresses will be given, and the meeting at the Imperial Hotel will be followed by a series of gatherings to be held in every district of Tōkyō, at which evangelists connected with the Fukuin Dōmei Kai and others will speak. The estimated cost of the whole movement is put down at 600 yen. It is over 15 years, says the organ we are quoting, since anything so big was attempted. A meeting of representatives of various churches to discuss the movement and make arrangements was held in the Young Men's Hall, Kanda, Tōkyō, on January 30th.

* * *
In No. 808 of the Kirisutōkyō Shimbun is published the report of an interview held with Bishop Nicolai by a person who signs himself "Kikusenshi." There is nothing at all original in the remarks that the Bishop is represented as having made except one that has reference to Protestant teaching, which was to the effect that Protestants aim too little at awakening the conscience, and that hence the development of intellect which they bring about is of little avail. The Bishop is represented as stating the well-known doctrines of orthodox Christians, the personality of God, the immortality of the soul, the efficacy of prayer, and the doctrine of original sin, in fact of preaching a little sermon to his interviewer, such as may be heard every Sunday in orthodox churches.

In the Fukuin Shimpō Mr. Oshikawa Masayoshi traces the connection between misconceptions as to doctrine or facts and steadfast faith. He says that it is customary with the majority of Christians to associate certain things in their minds, and that their belief is very much affected thereby. The following are the instances of this which he cites: (1) Men are in the habit of thinking of the doctrine preached and the life of the preacher together. They expect a certain amount of consistency between them; and should they find actual contradiction, their faith in the doctrine preached is very much shaken. Yet in point of fact a man's teaching may be everything that is good and worthy of being followed, while his life is bad. The ill-health of a doctor does not demonstrate the inefficacy of his remedies when applied. (2) There is much misconception as to the connection between Theology and Christianity. They are considered by some to be two names for one thing. But this is quite a mistaken view. Theology may change, but Christianity never changes. Theology is a system of Christian philosophy, and as such differs considerably from age to age and is not exactly alike in any two countries. Yet it is quite common to find the faith of Christians immensely influenced by some new development in theological teaching. Misconception here also produces unbelief. (3) How many there are that regard the Bible and Christianity as inseparable. But Christ is greater than the Bible. It cannot be said that the Bible as an expositor of Christ's character approaches any way near exhausting the subject. The true worshipper of Christ elevates him above the Bible and makes the latter only an imperfect mouthpiece of the one in whom all fullness dwells. (4) Another common misconception of Christianity that affects belief is the notion that by some supernatural process a person who has been living a bad life can at once be transformed into a perfectly virtuous man or woman. The return of the wanderer to the paths of virtue and goodness does not consist of a number of stupendous leaps, but of steady arduous plodding at an ordinary rate of progress. Mental changes and developments even with Christians are governed by laws that never alter. Nature is not to be hurried to please anybody. The Christianity of some people is far too transcendental. (5) There are misconceptions about the main object of Christ's coming into the world. He came to save men's souls and to fit them for the bliss of heaven. The things of this world are rendered insignificant by their comparison with those of the next. To say that Christianity is all for this world or all for the next is alike erroneous. It is for both. (6) How mistaken are the notions of a large number of Christians on the subject of doubts. They regard it as a sin to doubt, and talk as though faith could be forced on the soul in some arbitrary manner. They struggle against their doubts and suffer much. I have gone through this, says Mr. Oshikawa, and at such times have longed to retreat to the mountains and live as a hermit. I have suffered from all these misconceptions, but have at length arrived at convictions on several points which nothing can move: I believe that we can worship God. I believe that we can know Christ. Whether Christ be declared to be only a man, or whether he be called God is nothing to me (Kirisuto wa hito to iu mo, Kami to iu mo, ware ni oite kwankei nashi.) To me Christ is the 中和, Chūka,* the one standard by which all things are to be measured and the high way which we must all tread, and the 天地正夫の美, the Tenchi Seidai no bi, the one great, all-pervading Holy Spirit of the Universe.

* * *
In our last Summary we mentioned that Mr. Fukuchi Genichirō had published for private circulation an essay on Confucius. We have since been favoured by the author with a copy of his monologue and are now in a position to lay before our readers a somewhat fuller account of Mr. Fukuchi's views. Following Burmese history, Mr. Fukuchi makes out that Confucius and Shaka Muni were contemporaries, and that Confucius was born 13 years after Shaka, and died six years after him.† Speaking of the state of religious belief

* The reference is to a passage in the Chūyō, "The Doctrine of the Mean" where Chū is defined as tenka no fathon and ka as tenka 天. [Writer of the Summary.]

† We are surprised at Mr. Fukuchi's adopting such a theory. The date of Confucius' birth was B. C. 551 or 550. The dates given for Shaka's birth vary considerably. Chinese and Japanese Buddhists say B. C. 1027. Certain European scholars prefer B. C. 653, while T. W. Rhys Davids, a very great authority, speaking of Shaka's death, says, "The date, derived from Ceylon, which is usually assigned to that event is 543 B. C., but those scholars who have devoted most attention to the point hold this calculation to contain a certain error of about 60 years, and a probable error of 80 to 100 more; so that the date for the death of Buddha would have to be brought forward to 400 B. C., or a few years later." Thus we see that there is no foundation for Mr. Fukuchi's notion that Confucius and Shaka were contemporaries during the greater part of their lives. [Writer of the Summary.]

in China in the time of Confucius, Mr. Fukuchi says that the existence of a chief god called 上帝, Jōtei, was undoubtedly recognised, but that in addition to this Being a number of divinities known as 鬼神, Kishin, were worshipped. So that the form of religion in vogue at that time may be said to be polytheistic. Confucius most certainly acknowledged the existence of Jōtei and the divinities and demons included in the term Kishin. But though he refers to these beings and also constantly uses the term 天命 Temmei, "will of Heaven," yet he never undertakes to define any of these terms nor to explain the relation to the universe of the beings to whom they refer. Upon the use he made of these terms certain Chinese scholars have based the theory that Confucius was not an atheist and not a materialist, and that his system of ethics may be said to have a religious basis. Whether they are warranted in drawing this inference is very questionable. . . .

What concerns us, continues Mr. Fukuchi, is the fact that religion is to a certain extent mixed up with Confucian ethics, just as philosophy was mingled with all Shaka's religious teaching. In both cases the associations were the result of environment. . . . Confucius, like Shaka, suffered from the want of talented disciples. It is quite evident that the men to whom Confucius habitually discoursed on philosophic themes and on whom rested the responsibility of transmitting his views to posterity were very inferior to him. What they have given us only reveals glimpses of the sage's mind. Here and there in the "Analects" we seem to see indications of depths that his disciples failed to fathom. What we are told only makes us curious to know more. . . . His mind developed slowly. According to his own testimony he was 68 before he reached that stage of superior insight into things called 大悟, Daigo. This left little time for initiating his followers in the more abstruse parts of his philosophic creed. He spent 33 years in labouring to establish a higher moral standard in politics than existed at that time. He preached against aggression. He condemned the increase of armaments, set up a standard of morals for officials, and attacked existing abuses with such vigour that he alienated all those whom he sought to influence, and did not live to see any of his ideals carried into practice. It was only at the end of his career, when he was satisfied that nothing that he could do to arrest the march of events would be of any use, that he began to figure as a high class philosopher. It was during the latter years of his life that he uttered those sayings which have been cherished by successive generations. There is no higher political morality than was taught by him, and human life would be the better were the justice, the benevolence, and the sincerity on which he laid such stress more practised by the leading nations of the world, concludes Mr. Fukuchi, whose admiration, at the age of 60, for the sage whose light burnt brightest in his declining years is evidently very intense.

No. 3 of the Taiyō contains an article discussing the relation of Buddhism to the State, of which the following is the gist. In early times Japanese Buddhism laid itself out to obtain the patronage of the noble and the wealthy. Those who objected to its worldliness became hermits and retired to the mountains. Shinran and Nichiren had the honour of preaching a gospel for the poor, and their followers have made this a special feature of their teaching, but the majority of Buddhists rely on government help almost exclusively. It is high time that we should bury the past and either support Buddhism for what it is or not support it at all. What are its merits to-day? Is it not a mere cumberer of the ground? Will it bear comparison with Christianity in any one characteristic by which the influence of religion is to be judged? Where are its missions? Do the priests who go to foreign countries do anything but perform a few ceremonies for the Japanese who are residing in those countries? What has Buddhism done in the way of education? Is it not a fact that the non-government female schools are all Christian? In all the various works of benevolence how poor a figure does Buddhism cut! In great moral reforms its influence is in modern times practically nil. The crusade against concubinage it has opposed, because Christians have been its promoters. In total abstinence, a Christian movement, it has ranked itself with the defendants of drink. In the world of thought who can discover any power wielded by Buddhists? They are fond of talking of their connection with the Government; but what Government measure can be traced to their influence? Upon the great questions of the day do Buddhists ever make their voices heard? . . . What hope there may be for the future is centred in the young men who have just entered or are about to enter the ministry. But the question is, will they be strong enough to regenerate the whole sect? Is it not more likely that they will, like so many of their predecessors, become the victims of environment?

In the pages of the Shinri (No. 108) the Rev. H. Minami gives us an article entitled, Tōhon Nihon Kirisuto Kyōkai no Mondai (Questions [to be considered] by Japanese Christians at present), which is characterised by his usual earnestness, honesty, and wisdom. The idea that things must be superior because they come from the West having exploded, says Mr. Minami, Christianity has, among other things, been treated with disfavour. There was talk of a Christian revival in our midst, but of late one has heard nothing about it. I for one do not regret that things are progressing slowly, and deprecate anything like an attempt to force the pace by unnatural excitement. Among the advocates of revivals how many are there whose faith is steadfast? Sudden changes of any kind are accompanied by many evils. Foreign food and foreign cooking may be better adapted for nourishment than Japanese, but in the case of one unaccustomed to foreign diet violent fits of indigestion often attend its too sudden adoption. So is it with things mental. Slow progress is best for us, but we must not be content to stand still; and it is quite plain that evangelistic work must not be neglected. In connection with this there are two questions which it is important to consider at the present time, one concerns schools known as Dendō Gakkō (Mission Schools); the other regular Theological Seminaries.

(1). In reference to schools designed to give young men the education they require and at the same time intended to act as propagators of Christian doctrines among the unbelievers who are allowed to attend such institutions, thoughtful persons cannot have watched the Dōshisha experiment with considerable interest. The question which the course of events connected with that institution has forced on the attention of the Christian public is this: Which is the better policy to adopt, to teach Christianity in an open manner in Mission schools and forego the privilege of being recognised by the Mombushō and of coming under its regulations, or to be content to allow schools to be Christian in spirit, while secular in name and in form, and thus secure a large number of students and exemption from military service for the pupils? The notion of making a school Christian in reality, through not so in name, sounds very well in theory, but can it be carried into practice? We Japanese Christians have certainly no data to go on in this matter. We have not tried any such experiment, and therefore should proceed with extreme caution. It cannot be said that the Kyōto attempt to teach Christianity in an indirect manner by means of an education that was for the most part secular has yielded such results as would warrant the adoption of this policy by mission schools generally. It is quite plain that the Christianity which it would be possible to teach in a school controlled by the Mombushō would be very hazy and unpronounced. If Christianity is to be properly understood its whole history must be studied in a methodical manner and the Bible must become a text-book. It has been proposed to establish a Christian department in connection with secular schools and make attendance at the classes held by Christian teachers voluntary. But the present Department of Education could not be induced to sanction such an arrangement. Is there no hope of Christian schools receiving the recognition from the Mombushō to which they are entitled and of their being endowed with the same status as other government schools? This is the only satisfactory solution of the difficulty in which we find ourselves.

(2) The connection of Theology with Christianity is a subject that is attracting considerable attention. In the pages of the Shinseiki Mr. Kosaki Hiromichi undertakes to instruct his readers as to the views held by the party which he calls the Jiyūshingaku-ha (the Liberal Theology party). He says that we are content with a moral creed founded on the Sermon on the Mount; that we reject the doctrine of the personality of God and of the Divinity of Christ, that we do not believe in the atonement or the orthodox teaching about sin, nor in miracles, and that we are teaching a Christian morality that has no Christian Theology—a Christianity deprived of all supernatural elements, and so on. This is all very foolish. What authority has Mr. Kosaki for alleging that the Liberal section of the Christian church teaches a Christianity that has no Theology in it? The only thing that we do allege is that Christianity and Theology are different, that Christian dogma and Christianity are not to be confounded. But we have never maintained that Theology and Christianity should be entirely severed from each other. That Christianity and Theology are different is recognised by Christians who do not belong to our body. Take for instance the utterance of Mr. Oshikawa Masayoshi in the Fukui Shimpō,* Kirisutokyo to Shingaku wa onaji mono ni arasu; Shingaku wa hensuru mo Kirisutokyo wa hensazu. "Christianity and Theology are not the same; though Theology may change, Christianity does not change." I, for one, concludes Mr. Minami, rejoice that the connection between Christianity and Theology is attracting attention, and the discussions that are taking place will affect the Theological teaching carried on in Divinity schools.

The Greek Church organ, the Seikyō Shimpō, has in its 436th number an article on the connection of Spain's defeat with the religion she professes. Whether religion be connected with the State or not, in every country State losses and gains are keenly felt by the professors of any form of faith, says the Seikyō Shimpō's editorial. Times were when victory was said to be the result of the help of God and defeat a sign of His anger, when superiority in war was thought by many to indicate religious superiority. Many Christians have a way of talking that leads one to infer that Christianity and civilisation are the same thing and that in war the most Christian nation always wins. But history contradicts this, and furnishes numerous instances of most pious people being overthrown and downtrodden by comparatively godless armies. Nevertheless there is no doubt a close connection between the decline of Spain's power and the creed of her people. It is well known, continues the Seikyō Shimpō, that her priests purposely keep the masses of the people in ignorance and that there are few darker places in Europe than the interior of Spain, unless we include some parts of Italy. Where power is placed in the hands of the priests, where they control the press and have charge of most of the schools, and where it is to their interest to keep the people ignorant, one may say they are in a sense responsible for the failure of a State to prepare itself to meet such a crisis as that through which Spain has recently passed. It is the universal testimony of Japanese who have lately visited Roman Catholic countries that they are behind the rest of the Western world. A short time ago the Roman Catholic organ, the Tenchijin, tried to prove that Roman Catholic Christianity and advanced civilisation work together hand and glove, but the facts which are published from time to time about the state of Roman Catholic countries are directly opposed to any such theory, concludes the Seikyō Shimpō.

We have several times noticed books on Christian subjects from the pen of L'Abbé Francois Ligneul. We find now that at the office of the Tenchijin no fewer than 15 small works on evidence, philosophy, Christian doctrine, and ecclesiastical history are advertised for sale. These books are highly spoken of in several organs. They are said to be written in a style that is suited to the comprehension of all classes and to be characterised by the lucidity for which so many French writers are specially noted.

This year's Kirisutokyo Meikan (Christian Directory) has been enlarged. It is divided into 8 parts, with the following headings. (1) Male Individuals. (2) Pastors. (3) Churches. (4) Schools. (5) Associations or Corporations (Dantai). (6)

* Vide the account of Mr. Oshikawa's views given in an earlier part of this summary.

Benevolent Societies. (7) Magazine Publishing Companies and Bookshops. (8) Christian Statistics. The names are arranged alphabetically, that is, according to the Japanese alphabet, and addresses are given in all cases, also the name of the sect to which each individual Christian belongs. The work is for sale at the Ginza Jūjiya, at 20 sen per copy. In the preface it is stated that some 8 or 9 persons have assisted in its compilation. Statistics bearing on mission work in Formosa are given for the first time in this year's issue. The book ought to prove of great value to Christians who are travelling from place to place, as they can obtain all the information they need from its pages.

MEMBERS OF THE INNS OF COURT RESIDENT IN JAPAN.

The Members of the Inns of Court now in Japan, foreign and Japanese, have organized a kind of social association. They met for the first time at dinner in the Hotel Metropole, Tokyo, on February 4th. The meeting was not open to reporters, but in view of the interest of the proceedings an account has been prepared, which we now lay before our readers. Those who attended were:—Viscount Nagaoka Morigoshi, in the chair; Mr. H. S. Wilkinson, Mr. J. F. Lowder, Mr. H. C. Litchfield, Mr. A. B. Walford, Sir Ernest Satow, K.C.M.G., Mr. Montague Kirkwood, Mr. Hoshi Toru, Mr. Okamura Teruhiko, Mr. Hodzumi Nobushige, Mr. Makujima Rokuichiro, Mr. Nemura Shimpei, Mr. Shimidzu Ichitaro, Mr. Hijikata Nei, and Mr. Tomizu Hirato.

The following also were invited to join, and the first three on the list signified their acquiescence in the scheme of organization, though they were unable to attend:—Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, Mr. J. C. Hall, Mr. J. H. Longford, Mr. H. C. Brushfield, Mr. J. B. Rentiers, Mr. J. H. Gubbins, Mr. Mochizuki Kotaro, Viscount M. Inaba.

In the course of the dinner Viscount Nagaoka, the Chairman, proposed:—"The Emperor" and "The Queen."

Next the Chairman proposed "the Inns of Court," to which Mr. Shimidzu responded as follows:—

SPEECH BY MR. ICHITARO SHIMIDZU.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen:—You have called upon me, as the youngest member of the Bar present, to return thanks for this toast, and this affords me the opportunity of addressing you for a few minutes. I feel the greatest pleasure and interest in doing so, and for these reasons: Firstly, to-day, the fourth of February, is the anniversary of my return to Japan from England, of my arriving at Yokohama the happy bearer of a certificate, showing that I was a member of our Middle Temple. Consequently, to-day for me is a memorable day, and I cannot help feeling infinitely pleased to think that on this very day should be held the first meeting of the Inns of Court in Japan, an auspiciously inaugurated. I sincerely believe and hope that this association will be organized on a permanent basis, and that it will meet with the support of all members of the Inns who may be in this country. Secondly, seeing that all the members present here to-night are my elder brothers, if I may have the honour to call them, I am greatly stimulated to become more diligent, more energetic, and more confident in the future in the hope that I may some day enjoy a like distinguished position. But not only that, their presence reminds me of those many happy days I spent in England, of lectures at the Middle Temple, of its library, of that grand Dining Hall, toasting Her Majesty the Queen on Grand Day, of the hope that filled my heart on Call Day—yes, your presence to-night renews and refreshes those happy recollections, and awakes again the memory of a thousand associations, forcing me to, in truth, exclaim that England is indeed my second native land. Thirdly, on my way back to Japan from Paris, I contributed an essay under the title of "The necessity of Treaty Revision with Japan" to "The British Economic Journal," through Count Hino, a friend of mine who was then staying in London. The editor, my friend wrote, asked him several times about the accuracy of my essay and then eventually cut off the vital part of it, in which I laid special stress upon the necessity of an alliance being formed between Great Britain and this country for the sake of the peace, of the world, and for the progress and development of the commerce and trade of all nations interested in the East. Have I not good grounds to-night to refer to this incident with delight? The editor doubted the accuracy of my essay, so much that he cut off the vital part of it. But now what a change of circumstances! Why, Lord Charles Bessborough has condescended quite recently to visit this country, far away from England in order to let us hear from his Lordship's mouth the necessity of an alliance in which Great Britain and Japan shall take the most important parts. Looking then at my expression of opinion in the past with the views that now prevail, I cannot help feeling infinitely pleased and gratified. Our countrymen, royalty as well as commoners, welcomed that distinguished guest heartily, and I confidently believe and sincerely hope that the good wishes we as a nation have given him will, through his Lordship's influence, find their echo in the British Empire, for Britain has, indeed, ever been a true and friendly Power to us—friendly at our most difficult times, namely, on the eve of the Meiji Revolution, as well as during our prosperous and victorious era. Contrasting the past and present, even I, Shimidzu Ichitaro, your young brother, feel intensely proud and happy that events have so shaped themselves, and I can fully imagine how deep an impression this must make on his Excellency Sir Ernest Satow, who is present to-night, when he looks back on his early days spent in this country more than thirty years ago, when he first enjoyed the friendship of the late Count Katsu Awa, and when he thinks of the present as he must have done when attending the funeral only the other day of that distinguished old friend, so deeply esteemed, venerated, and respected throughout the country. May I venture to say that His Excellency Sir Ernest Satow is one of the best European friends whom Japan has ever had, for he understands and sympathizes with Japan, is thoroughly competent to appreciate her progress, and to correctly estimate the strength of the ties that should cement an international friendship. Japan, as a country, is singularly connected with Anglo-Americans. Her exports largely go to America, whilst her imports chiefly come from Great Britain. The latter country has ever been our friend and teacher in commerce and trade, in politics and in state policy, and in naval affairs; but we have still much to learn from her in the future. The British Empire is the elder brother of my country, just as you, gentlemen, present here to-night, are my elder brothers—you have taught me much, but I have still much to learn from you. As these happy relations exist between us as individuals, so must they exist between our respective countries, and not merely exist, but be strengthened and developed for the reasons I laid stress upon some six years ago in my essay, for the sake of the world as well as for the progress and development of the commerce and trade of all nations interested in the East.

The "Japanese Bench and Bar" was proposed by Sir Ernest Satow, and responded to by Mr. Okamura:—

SIR ERNEST SATOW TOASTS THE BAR.

Sir Ernest Satow said that he was much tempted to follow Mr. Shimidzu upon the topics dwelt upon in his speech, but was prevented from doing so by a feeling of the heavy responsibility which devolved upon him in connexion with the toast he had undertaken. The famous judges of ancient times had acquired a wide celebrity under specially favourable circumstances, as they based their decisions not upon statute, but on what appeared to themselves to be just and right in the particular case. Modern judges could acquire a reputation for wisdom only by adhering to what was laid down in the Codes, but on the other hand they had the advantage of being assisted by a learned and acute Bar, which existed for the purpose of guiding the Bench in the right path. He regretted that of the gentlemen present only one had as yet attained to the dignity of the Bench, but he hoped that all those whom he saw round the table might in time reach that elevated position. He concluded by giving the "Japanese Bench and Bar."

REPLY BY MR. OKAMURA.

Mr. Teruhiko Okamura, said:—Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, the toast of the Japanese Bench and Bar having been proposed by Sir Ernest Satow, I rise to reply on their behalf. Such a task should of right be discharged by an occupant of the Japanese Bench, but as we have unfortunately none of our judges present here this evening, and as I for many years held judicial offices, it is perhaps fitting that, although not the senior member of the Bar present, I should reply to this toast. Having studied law in England and been called to the English Bar, I have had ample opportunities of observing the administration of justice in England. Good laws and their good administration are very different things; the one being the theory, so to say, of justice, the other being the practice. Many countries can boast of having good laws, but very few indeed can lay claim to their being well administered. In this England occupies a position without equal. And to what is this due? To the appointment of good judges assisted by a distinguished Bar. English judges are, as you are aware, selected from the members of the Bar; the Bar is therefore responsible for good judges, and without the co-operation of the Bar it would be difficult to obtain good men for the position. Guided by this conviction, I tried my utmost when President of the Yokohama District Court, to raise the position of the Japanese Bar. At that time the Bench and Bar were almost independent of each other, and the Bar was looked down upon by the Bench and held a very inferior position. I am glad to say that this is no longer the case, prejudices of the past are rapidly disappearing and the Bench and Bar will, I believe, before long meet each other on terms of equality and co-operate earnestly for the improvement of the laws and the better administration of justice. That such a relation should exist between the judges and barristers of Japan is, in the face of the revised Treaties coming into force, much to be desired. Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, I thank you on behalf of the Bench and Bar of Japan for the kind wishes you have expressed.

The "English Bench and Bar" was proposed by Mr. Hoshi Toru in appropriate terms, and Mr. Justice Wilkinson responded:—

MR. JUSTICE WILKINSON REPLIES.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen—I thank you most heartily for associating me with the toast which you have just now drunk. So much has been said, and justly said, by previous speakers in honour of the English Bench that it cannot but be a matter of pride to be connected, however remotely, with such an institution. Those of us out here who have administered justice in Her Majesty's name cannot claim the high dignity and repute of Her Majesty's Judges in England, but I do claim for myself and my predecessors one characteristic in common with them, an earnest endeavour at all times to do justice and right. With the English Bench the English Bar is indissolubly connected, and it is a great pleasure to look round me here and see so many members of that Bar. I am indeed impressed with the advantages of a doctrine so much inculcated of late—the doctrine of the “open door.” The Inns of Court, like all good inns, keep an “open door.” Men of all nationalities can enter in and partake of all the privileges. And when I see around me so many men of this country who have become members, I am further led to entertain the hope that they will become what has been contrasted with, but in this case at any rate is consistent with, the open door, that is, a sphere of influence. I regret to hear that not so many Japanese gentlemen as formerly are sending their sons to be educated for the English Bar. I cannot but think that, if that is so, it is a mistake. It is probably due in some measure to the fact that when Japan was framing her laws she looked for assistance to those countries who had the advantage, or disadvantage, of being supplied with codes. Those countries were probably compelled from the circumstances in which they found themselves to put their laws into the form of codes. Some of them at least had arrived at a stage in their history when they had to reconcile conflicting systems or conflicting developments of law in order that there might be one system for the whole country. Others have adopted with or without modification what they have found ready made. England's laws are the product of centuries of growth, expanding and being modified according to the growing and changing needs of the times. The peace of our Lord the King and our Lady the Queen has prevailed for centuries, and in those centuries the laws have slowly and steadily acquired their present form. The peace of His Majesty the Emperor has been in our own times restored and firmly established, and that it may prevail through the centuries to come is, I know, the desire and confident expectation of us all. But Japan has found it necessary in the circumstances in which she has been placed, to frame her laws in the form of codes, and in so framing them she has naturally had recourse to jurists from those countries whose laws are also in the form of codes. They have done their duty and have no doubt done it well. But the result is that the most distinctive features of English jurisprudence and English procedure, of which you gentlemen have expressed your admiration, have been overlooked or have not found adequate expression in the Japanese Codes as at present framed. I hope that you, gentlemen, will use your influence to secure fair play for the ideas which animate English jurisprudence with regard not only to the end aimed at but the mode of reaching it. No nation can claim a monopoly of the desire to do right. But what we claim for the English system of legal procedure is that it pursues the fairest and best of all existing ways in arriving at that goal. The animating principle is fair play and no favour. That principle has been nurtured by the system of the publicity, of its proceedings and by that publicity eventually led to the assistance of counsel at all stages of the proceedings. It is to be hoped that the codes which Japan has made for herself will not lead to her laws and her legal procedure being crystallized in the form they have now taken, but that improvements will be freely adopted from every quarter, and I know of no system from which Japan can borrow with greater advantage than that system which, having its home in England, has been carried by her people to America, to Australia, and to all quarters of the globe—to the countries that were once her Colonies and to those that still are, and has had no small share in making England what she is and those countries what they are. To you, gentlemen, who have become learned in the laws of England and appreciate the ideas which animate them, be the task of securing for your country the benefits which have been shown to result from them elsewhere.

The health of Sir Ernest Satow was proposed by Viscount Nagaoka. He referred to his long standing friendship and association with Sir Ernest, dating back in the sixties and Sir Ernest Satow responded:—

SIR ERNEST SATOW PROPOSES A HEALTH.

Sir Ernest Satow thanked the chairman for the kind manner in which he had proposed, and the company present for the heartiness with which they had received the toast. The noble chairman had spoken of the length of his connexion with Japan, but there was one gentleman present, his friend Mr. Lowder, who dated back even longer, in fact some forty years, and could also boast that his connexion with the country was unbroken. When little more than a boy he had been filled with the desire to visit Japan, and, having attained his object, had never ceased to feel a strong affection for the country and people. During the first few years of his residence, a barrier, erected by the Government of the day, kept foreigners and Japanese apart. His own wish had been that this barrier should be thrown down, and the relations of Japan with other countries be placed on a normal footing. It was only when the happy event of the Restoration of the Emperor took place that the first steps were taken towards the realization of this ideal, which he was happy to think was now within measurable distance. As it seemed to be the practice that a reply to our toast should conclude with the proposal of another, he begged to be allowed to give them the name of a gentleman widely known in Japanese and foreign circles, that eloquent ornament of the Japanese bar, Mr. Masujima.

Mr. Masujima then spoke as follows:—

I have to thank you, Sir Ernest Satow and gentlemen, for the kind manner in which you have proposed and drunk my health. I did not anticipate having to speak so early to-night, as the programme of the evening was complete without me. But nobody has been named to propose a vote of thanks to our honoured chairman, Viscount Nagaoka. With your permission, I will now express some thoughts I have been collecting for the purpose. I congratulate you, gentlemen, on the good offices which our friend Viscount Nagaoka has performed toward the organization of our Inns of Court Association. I am sure the association will be a success, and it will effect some good results by such a happy departure. I need hardly remind you what a good fellow our chairman is. Such a kind-hearted and entertaining companion you will seldom find. He is popular with everybody, and his popularity alone assures the success of the organization. It is true that Viscount Nagaoka fills no office which is part of the judicial machinery of Japan, but he is in the exalted position of a legislator in the Imperial House of Peers. He has already had a fair share in helping forward the enactment of the Japanese Codes of Laws. I feel certain that he will hereafter render valuable services in further promoting what Japanese legislation still aspires to. Many may consider these codes an excellent piece of legislation, and everybody should wish for their successful administration, but no one ought to be blind to the fact that there will always be inherent defects in any code; I mean the danger of narrow construction and arrest of development. Again, a good code of laws is one thing, but its enlightened application is an entirely different thing. Against such dangers, however, I have no doubt that, whatever our duties may be, legislative, judicial, or otherwise, we shall not fail to contribute some share of effective influence towards the correction of these failures. I am not afraid of the smallness of our number in Japan. For the knowledge, experience, and aspirations inspired by that nursery of English jurisprudence, the Inns of Court, have always been found efficient to accomplish any work such as the reform and improvement of law and the judicial system. I do not hesitate to add that Japanese legislation and judicial administration will always be imbued with the spirit of liberality, impartiality, and humanity such as are imbued in the principles of English jurisprudence; and what has already fallen in this respect from the lips of some previous speakers to-night will not be overlooked by the Japanese Government and people.

Viscount Nagaoka called for a speech from Mr. Lowder who spoke as follows:—

MR. LOWDER'S SPEECH.

My Lord, and Gentlemen—The thoughts and duties of the earlier part of the day have not been of a nature to encourage me to take more than a silent part in the conviviality of this gathering; but I feel that I may not decline to respond to the call of our noble Chairman, because I wish to express to him my entire sympathy with the inspiration which moved him to invite us to come here this evening, and take part in the inauguration of a Society in Japan of members of the Inns of Court. Looking around me, I do not recognize the faces of any with whom I was personally associated in that part of the process of preparation for the Bar which is peculiar to the Inns of Court, and which consists in eating dinners; but we have all fed at the same tables, and imbibed at the same springs, and derived our nourishment from the same source; and, therefore, I rejoice to think that, on the initiation of the noble Viscount, we are to be afforded an opportunity every year of meeting together, and of exchanging the pleasant reminiscences of that part which we have in common, and to which we owe our early professional education. My Lord, it is well that we should remind ourselves, as often as possible, of some of those grand principles to which we were introduced in our student days, and which form the foundation of that conception of justice to which we were then introduced, and which we have since learned to revere. Mr. Justice Wilkinson, in the eloquent address to which we have just listened with so much pleasure, has recalled to our recollection at least one of the elementary safeguards of liberty, namely the publicity in which trials are conducted; let me add to it these; the independence of the judiciary; the presumption of innocence; the allowance of counsel to a prisoner from the very moment at which he is put upon his defence; and the recognition of the principle that punishment should be awarded rather as a deterrent measure of warning, for the good of the commonweal, than as an angry vindication of the right of the ruler to our obedience. All these things go toward the formation of that monumental fabric which has been called the Humanity of the Criminal Law, as administered under the system which we have been taught. Let me in conclusion recall the noble language in which Coke closes the solemn epilogue to his third Institute of Criminal Law:—“The consideration of this preventing justice were worthy of the wisdom of Parliament, and, in the meantime, expert and wise men to make preparation for the same, as the text saith, ut benedicat eis Dominus. Blessed shall be he that layeth the first stone of this building: more blessed that proceeds in it: most of all that finisheth it, to the glory of God, and the honour of our King and nation.” Surely, my lord, these are sentiments and principles which it is worth the while of each of us in his several sphere of influence to maintain, and to endeavour to inculcate. I couple the sentiment with the name of the noble Chairman, Viscount Nagaoka Moriyoshi.

Next the health of Mr. Litchfield was proposed in cordial terms, and finally Mr. Kirkwood submitted the following resolutions, which were adopted:—

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Montague Kirkwood said:—Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen. Various toasts having been drunk and responded to, and the hour being somewhat advanced, I rise to bring before you the serious business of the evening by proposing certain resolutions with regard to this Association and its subsequent meetings. In the first place, we have to organize ourselves and appoint a Committee for the coming year with a President. I think there can be little doubt but that our chairman to night should occupy that position and that he should appoint his own committee and secretary. In the next place, we should, I think, pay some small annual subscription to cover various small expenses. This might be 5 yen or less. And in the third place, I propose that this meeting should only be considered as a preliminary meeting, and that we should meet annually on, say the last Wednesday of April in each year—a congenial season for any of our brother barristers at Kobe or elsewhere to visit Tokyo—and that our first meeting should take place on the last Wednesday of April next. To these dinners certain officials, as for instance the Minister of Justice, the Presidents of the Supreme Court, Appeal Court of Tokyo, and District Courts of Tokyo and Yokohama, the Public Prosecutor General, and the President of the Bar Association, should be invited, and each member be allowed to ask two guests.

After some discussion, Mr. Kirkwood proposed the following resolutions:—(1) That for the forthcoming year (that is until the last Wednesday of April, 1900) Viscount Nagaoka be President and that he do appoint a Committee of 4 and a secretary; (2) That the annual subscription be 5 yen; (3) That an annual dinner be held on the last Wednesday of April in each year, or as near thereto as may be; (4) That to such dinner the Committee be at liberty to invite as guests such personages as the Minister of Justice, the Presidents of the Supreme Court, of the Tokyo Appeal and District Courts, and of the Yokohama District Court, the Public Prosecutor General; and the President of the Japanese Bar Association; (5) That each member of the Society be at liberty to invite to such dinner upon payment and upon giving a week's notice to the Secretary not more than 2 guests.

These Resolutions were carried unanimously, a general opinion being expressed that the guests invited by members should as far as possible be gentlemen interested in law or the administration of justice.

The Chairman then rose and appointed as his Committee Messrs. Hijikata, Kirkwood, Lowder and Masujima and the last gentleman as Honorary Secretary.

IMPERIAL DIET.

THURSDAY, MARCH 9TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.
FORMOSAN AFFAIRS.

The House met at 10.20 a.m., and having passed, without discussion, the Bill relating to a capital Fund for Forestry purposes, proceeded to consider the Bill for raising a Formosan Public Undertakings Loan.

Mr. Isawa opposed the Bill. The loan was spoken of as a Formosan obligation, but it would ultimately have to be borne by Japan proper. They were told that funds to discharge the debt would be obtained by buying up the royalties held by Chinese residents and by recourse to the customs duties. But to carry out the former project a land survey would be essential, and a land survey was impossible. It had been essayed by the former Governor General Lin, and he had failed completely. Did any reasonable prospect of accomplishing such a work exist now in the face of the fact that no real success had been obtained in tranquillizing the insurgents? The Government was deluding them with idle tales. Undoubtedly many public works were needed in Formosa, but this was not the proper method of procuring funds.

Baron Ozaki spoke in the same strain. He dwelt upon the heavy addition that the measure would make to the burden of the State, asserted that land surveying was impossible, and that any attempt to carry it out would renew the old trouble of "hamboon spears and mat flags;" pointed out that only now was it considered feasible to undertake land surveys in Okinawa, and declared that money might as well be thrown into the sea as spent on defective surveys.

Mr. Mizuno urged that the works contemplated by the Government could not be deferred any longer. Land surveying in Formosa was absolutely indispensable. It ought to have been taken in hand at once by the Military Authorities in 1895, and to put it off on the grounds alleged by Mr. Isawa would disgrace Japan. Numerous telegrams had been received from persons in the Island, recommending that the project be carried out.

The Bill was passed as amended by the Lower House, namely, with a reduction of 5 million yen in the sum (40 millions) proposed by the Government.

NEW LAWS.

The following measures were then passed without discussion:—

Bill for amending the Special Accounts Law of Public Undertakings and Railway Bonds.

Bill relating to Hereditary Pensions and Pensions for Merit.

Bill for amending the Navigation Encouragement Law.

Bill for amending the Registration Law.

Result of the Conference of the Houses on the Tonnage Dues Bill.

Project of Forestry Law.

Bill for remitting the Monopoly Tax on Tobacco manufactured for export.

Various Supplementary Budgets, including that for granting special subsidies to the European and American services of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Toyo Kisen Kaisha.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

Bill for amending the Law of Election of Members of the Lower House. This Bill was largely amended by the Special Committee of the Peers. The scrutin individual system and unsigned ballots were restored; the property qualification was raised from 5 yen to 10 yen in the case of Land Tax; from 5 yen to 7 yen in the case of direct National Taxes; and from 5 yen to 10 yen in the case of Land Tax and other National Taxes combined. The Government's proposals with respect to the right of officials to become candidates for election, and with regard to the disqualification of illiterate voters, were also restored, but the Peers' Committee recommended that the minimum population of an enfranchised urban district should be 50,000, and also that the security given in election suits must be 300 yen, instead of 100, as fixed by the Representatives.

After the report of the Special Committee had been made, Marquis Ito, in his capacity of member of the House, spoke as follows:—

My lords and gentlemen,—I beg you to grant me a few minutes of the time remaining at your disposal before the close of the session. The Law of Election has a most important bearing on the working of the Constitution. Since it went into operation practical experience has indicated several essential amendments, and, being earnestly desirous of effecting these, the Cabinet of which I was Minister President submitted a Bill for the approval of the Diet last year. Unfortunately it failed to become law, and I desire now to lay before you briefly the view I hold on the subject. Representative institutions have existed for only ten years in our country, but during that time we have had no fewer than six general elections, which have afforded ample opportunity to test the working of the Law, the result being that many changes of a beneficial character present themselves. I was one of those that took part in the drafting of the Law. We were without practical experience, and, deeming it advisable to exercise the utmost caution with a view to future contingencies, we framed the law on a narrow basis, regarding it in an experimental light. The results of its operation did not, however, fulfil our hopes. On the contrary, it has been shown, of late, that candidates for election subject the electors to improper influences of persuasion or intimidation, and that the cost of elections is very great. It is essential that these abuses should be corrected, and that electors should be made entirely independent of undue influence. In some foreign countries the system of scrutin individual and unsigned ballots is in force, and in others different method is adopted. The various abuses are the outcome of special customs and circumstances, and can not be included in the scope of a general argument. We are now competent to decide, however, that in our own country the method of unsigned ballots is most conducive to the legitimate purpose of an election. The two prime objects to be attained are that electors should be perfectly free to follow the dictates of their own choice, and that elections should be purged of all corruption. These are the ends we must seek, above all things, to compass. With regard to qualifications for the franchise, our original ideas having been tentative and cautious, we proceeded upon narrow lines, and elaborated a system by which only some four hundred thousand persons were enfranchised out of a population of forty millions. Without discussing the fundamental necessity of giving the people a share in the government, it will be admitted that, after such a step has been taken, to extend their share to suitable dimensions is only proper. In short, the limits of the franchise are co-extensive with the limits of the people's power. The Bill now before you differs a little from that submitted to you last session, but in essentials it is the same. It lowers the qualifications for the franchise very considerably, yet I believe that the limits fixed by it are possibly still too narrow. Gradual steps of advance are wisest in these matters, however. At the time when the present Law was drafted, means of communication were very defective, and it was therefore necessary to have small election districts. But there has been a great improvement in that respect during the past few years, and a corresponding extension of the districts is desirable. Another point of importance is that the members of the Lower House at present are chiefly representatives of the agricultural classes, very few being returned by the mercantile and industrial classes, that is to say, by the urban population. Members of the Diet do not, of course, represent merely their constituencies. It is essential that they should represent the interests of the community at large. One of the reforms contemplated by the framers of the Bill is to increase the number of urban representatives. The development of commerce and industry is of vital moment to the material progress of the State, from the point of view of its domestic and of its foreign interests alike, and the importance of giving fuller representation to the urban population can not be questioned. Your session ends this evening, and I must limit myself to a mere fraction of the remarks I should like to make. I venture to hope that this Bill will obtain the approval of the House, especially in the form given to it by the Government, for I believe that the effect of the proposed changes will be to soften competition at elections, and to provide for the due representation of all classes. We have seen the violence of the strife between political parties at elections; we have seen appeals to muscular force, and we have seen a large waste of money, as well as many other abuses, which no effort should be spared to correct. The officials have from the outset done everything that was in their power and employed every means to secure the best results of the constitutional system, always keeping before them the great purpose of furthering the country's best interests. But many deficiencies are now visible. It can not be said, for example, that the progress of legislative business presents an entirely satisfactory aspect, and with regard to this I desire to invite the attention of the House to one or two points. In all countries the House of Representatives is a place of much discussion, and that it shows some lack of circumspection is well known to students of constitutional history. On the other hand, the Upper Chamber is a place of cool heads, where disputes about personal interests seldom occur, and where there is a special faculty for judging questions justly on their merits. Nothing is more to be desired than the preservation of that faculty. Yet the recent condition of our Legislature suggests that external influences have great weight in its councils; a regrettable state of affairs. I sincerely hope that the House of Peers will avoid such abuses, and that the two Chambers of the Legislature, in their attitude towards the Executive, will recognise their common responsibility of preserving good relations."

Viscount Tanaka—"Is your speech an exhortation to the House of Peers?"

Marquis Ito—"No. I am merely giving expression to my own desires."

Viscount Tanaka—"You are travelling beyond the question now before the House. We prefer to hear your exhortation on some future day." (Cries of "Order, Order. Be brief.")

Marquis Ito—"I am addressing the House in accordance with my right as a member, and the remarks I have made are intended to emphasize the importance of the Bill now under consideration. They do not appear irrelevant to that purpose. I trust that as the result of a Conference between the Houses this Bill will become law. Some folks may say that the arguments of political parties led to the presentation of the Bill, but I can assure you that no such shallow reason existed. Our great aim is that the legislative business of the State may be thoroughly transacted, so that the national reputation may be enhanced in the eyes of the world. I shall not detain you longer lest I again provoke your displeasure."

Barons Kikkawa and Ozaki spoke in favour of deferring the consideration of the Bill until next session, but the House voted the Second Reading, and taking it at once, passed the Bill, restoring the Government's draft in some parts and endorsing the Committee's amendments in others.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Bill for establishing a Credit Mobilier was next taken. The Special Committee recommended the excision of all the changes made by the Lower House, in the sense of authorizing the Government to guarantee the Bank's shares if they had to be offered for sale abroad. Mr. Kaneko Kentaro spoke in favour of the Representatives' amendments, but the House rejected them, and passed the Bill as recommended by the Committee.

The following measures were then passed:—
Bill relating to a Capital Fund for Forests.
Bill relating to the Treatment of Persons falling ill or dying when travelling.

Bill for the Regulation of Fertilizers.
Bill relating to Local Boundaries in Okayama Prefecture.

Bill for abolishing Branches of State Agricultural Experiment Stations and increasing the Aid granted to Principal Stations in Cities and Prefectures.

Representation for increasing the number of Students sent abroad to study.

The following were handed to Special Committees:—

Bill for restoring the Privileges of the old Imami Clansmen.

Bill for rescinding Law 11 of 1897, which empowers the Government to entrust to private companies the construction of Railways included in the State Programme.

The President announced that the Representatives had refused to accept the amendments made in the Law of Election, and that a Conference would be necessary. The House, having entrusted to the President the duty of nominating Managers, took a recess at 8.55 p.m.

On re-assembling at 10.25 p.m., the House was informed by the President that the Representatives had voted for a Conference on the subject of the Bill for establishing a Credit Mobilier, but had risen without waiting for a Conference to take place. He thought it unnecessary to appoint Managers under such circumstances.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

Marquis Kuroda reported the result of the Conference with regard to the Law of Election. It had been found impossible to come to any agreement. He had acted as chairman, and the Managers of the Peers being thus reduced to nine against 10 Managers of the Representatives, the latter had voted their own amendments by a majority, and had insisted on regarding that as the result of the Conference.

Mr. Matsunaka moved that the House of Representatives, in calling for a Conference of the Houses with regard to the Credit Mobilier Bill, and rising before a Conference could be held, had treated the Peers with discourtesy, and been guilty of improper conduct.

Viscount Soga said that Mr. Hoshi Toru, in reporting the result of the Conference to the Lower House, had declared that the Peers refused to make any concession whatever. That was quite incorrect. The Managers of the Peers had made every possible concession and had adopted a most conciliatory attitude. But Mr. Hoshi had accused them of failing totally in conciliatoriness, an accusation quite inconsistent with the spirit animating them.

The House unanimously voted Mr. Matsunaka's motion, and rose at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. CLOSING SCENES.

The House met at 1 p.m. and having listened to a long speech from Mr. Tanaka Shozo on his favourite subject of the Ashio Copper Mine, proceeded to the Order of the Day, and discharged the following business:—

Report of the Conference of the Houses on the Bill for restoring State Forests and Moors to their original owners. Adopted.

Report of the Conference of the Houses on the Bill for amending the Registration Law. Adopted.

Report of the Conference of the Houses on Tonnage Dues Bill. Adopted.

Report of the Conference of the Houses on the Bill for adjusting Hereditary and Good-service Pensions. Adopted.

Bill for amending the Regulations relating to security in Criminal Appeal Cases. Rejected.

Representation for opening, Ofunado in Iwate Prefecture to Foreign Trade. Adopted.

Bill for amending the Railway Construction Law in the sense of including in the First Period certain Lines now standing in the Second Period category. Passed; in spite of the opposition of the Government Delegate who explained that such a change would disturb the financial arrangements of the Government.

Bill for making entries in the Great Register the basis for assessing the Property Qualification of Electors and Candidates for Election. Rejected.

Bill for limiting the Dividends paid by Private Railways, by enacting that a reduction of fares may be ordered by the Minister of Home Affairs in the case of a line which has paid a dividend of 10 per cent. or upwards for three years consecutively. The Special Committee reported against the Bill on the ground that its provisions would conflict with existing laws, but its chief introducer, Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, denied that such would be the case, and the House passed the Bill.

Bill for amending the Law of Organization of Law Courts, in the sense of admitting barristers and others to the conferences held by Judges of the Court of Cassation in Appeal Cases. Passed.

Representation for renewing State Aid to National and Provincial Shrines. Adopted.

Representation relating to the Salaries of Inspectors of Primary Schools.

Representation urging the extended use of certain silk-reeling machinery. Adopted.

Representation for amending the Sections of the Civil Code relating to Family and Succession. Recommended by the Special Committee, but not discussed by the House.

The House adjourned its sitting three times, in order to adapt its proceedings to those of the Peers, who were then debating important Bills sent up from the Representatives. The first of these Bills—that relating to the amendment of the Law of Election—was sent down by the Peers at 7.15 p.m., with several radical changes. These the Representatives unanimously refused to endorse. Dr. Hatoyama, the leader of the Opposition, supported Mr. Hoshi Toru in urging their rejection. Ten Managers were accordingly appointed to confer with the Upper House.

The other Bills, three in number, came down from the Peers at 8.45 p.m. All had been more or less altered. In the case of the first—the Credit Mobilier Bill—the Representatives rejected the changes introduced by the Peers, and decided that a Conference of the Houses must be held. The same course was pursued with regard to the second—the Bill for making new delimitations of Rural Districts in Okayama Prefecture—; but the third, the Bill for the Regulation of Fertilizers, was passed as amended by the Peers.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

At 9.30 p.m. the House re-assembled, after a recess. Mr. Hoshi Toru, on behalf of the Managers who had taken part in the Conference on the Law of Election, reported that it had been found impossible to come to an agreement. According to the view of the Peers, the Law, as it left the hands of the Representatives, would provide for the election of too many members. Such a proposition had seemed untenable in the eyes of the Lower House's Managers, inasmuch as the difference between the total number contemplated by the Government's Bill, and that contemplated by the Representatives Bill was only 25—the former being 445 and the latter 470. Nevertheless, since an agreement between the Houses was essential to the life of the Bill, the Managers of the Representatives had proposed to reduce the number to 407; namely 72 for the Urban Districts and 335 for the Rural; being at the rate of one member for every 120,000 units of population, instead of one for every 100,000 as provided in the Lower House's Bill. To that the Managers of the Upper House had objected that 407 would be too few. Mr. Hoshi and his colleagues had then come to the conclusion that the Peers did not want the Bill to pass at all, and were deliberately opposing themselves to popular opinion. They had naturally been much annoyed, and they considered that the Peers had been wanting in courtesy towards the Representatives. The Bill had no special concern for the Peers, and they should have been ready to make large concessions to the views of the Representatives. It appeared that the only course now open to the latter was to reject all measures voted by the Upper House. It was an unhappy conjuncture. A compromise having been found impossible, the Conference had to take for its basis of discussion the Bill as amended by the Peers, and had rejected it by 10 votes to 9. With reference to these numbers, he explained that lots having been drawn for the Chairman of the Conference, the post had fallen to Marquis Kuroda, and the Managers of the Peers had thus been reduced to 9 voting members. Hence the Bill now before the Lower House, that is to say, the Bill technically endorsed by the Conference, was the Bill in the form it possessed before receiving the Peers' amendments, and he moved that the House do now adopt the decision of the Conference.

The motion was passed without dissent.

CLOSING THE SESSION.

The President said that, according to the House's decision, a conference should be held between the two Houses, with reference to the amendments of the Credit Mobilier Bill, but as it was scarcely to be hoped that an agreement could be reached under existing circumstances, he suggested that the House might rise without further delay.

This suggestion being unanimously approved, the President congratulated the members on their successful labours during the session, and announced that the House would now rise. This announcement was received with shouts of "banzai."

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORAL STANDARDS OF EAST AND WEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In your issue of Feb. 4th, in an editorial note on "Japanese Public Opinion on Extramarital Relations," you quote Dr. H. Kato as saying, "when we come to actual practice the Orientals and Occidentals are on a level, with one difference:—what is done in the East openly is carried on in secret in the West."

In the same number on another page there in an editorial on "Japan and her Foreign Friends," the tone of which largely coincides with Dr. Kato's remark, and strikes the general reader as hardly up to the Mail's usually high standard. There is, it is implied, really no difference between Japan and "the West;" the apparent difference is due merely to the fact that the Japanese "in his pursuit of vice is not secretive." I wish to protest most emphatically against this view of the case. It is true that "in the great cities of the West scenes of great depravity can be witnessed night after night," but that is far from proving that, taking the countries through, the condition of social morality is the same in the West as in the East. So far as the United States is concerned I know that there is a very great difference. The newspapers show it; the hotels show it; railway travel shows it; the songs of the people show it; conversation shows it; the lives of religious leaders show it.

It may be true, as you say, that "statistics show that the social evil has not larger dimensions here than in Europe," though I doubt it. I know that statement cannot be made with reference to the United States; first, because I have the highest authority for saying that there are no such statistics, and secondly, my knowledge of the two countries is such that I know what story such statistics when made are sure to tell.

Perhaps no better illustration of the different grades as morals in the two countries could be offered than that of Dr. Kato posing as an instructor in morals. If Dr. Kato were in America and charged with the offences against morals which the Foran Choko has declared him to be guilty of, he would be simply forced to do one of two things:—1. Prove the falsity of the charges; or 2. Abandon all his pretensions as a teacher of morality. The fact that he does neither shows clearly the extremely low standard of morality which prevails in Japan.

Very truly yours,
M. L. GORDON.

FOREIGNERS' RIGHTS UNDER THE NEW TREATIES TO LEASE LAND IN JAPAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In a leaflet headed the "Economic Condition of Japan" written by me in January last, the following statement appears:—

In England and America a Japanese is free to purchase as much real estate as may come on the market, but no foreigner can individually purchase or own a rood of Japanese soil. In the new Treaty which comes into operation on the 16th July, 1899, it is provided that subjects "may . . . lease land for residential and commercial purposes," and by the new Codes which are shortly to come into use land may be leased for twenty years only (section 7 para. 604), so though the new Treaty is avowedly based on the principle of equity and mutual benefit the equity in certain important respects is wanting and the benefit is extremely one-sided. With a view to have their country's resources developed other Governments have been known to give free grants of lands on the condition that buildings for industrial purposes are erected thereon, and it would repay Japan to do likewise. Without further delay the Government should remove every obstacle which hinders foreign capital from coming into the country through legitimate and natural channels, as the Japanese would assuredly derive great benefit therefrom certainly as much if not more than the foreign Capitalist.

In connection with the foregoing His Excellency Sir Ernest M. Satow, K.C.M.G., Her Britannic Majesty's Minister, has favoured me with a letter dated Tokyo, February 1st, 1899, which reads:—

Many thanks for the copy of your pamphlet about the Economic Condition of Japan. On page 5 I notice a passage which implies that foreigners (or perhaps it was intended to mean only British subjects) will not under the Treaties be able to lease land for terms of more than 20 years. It is true that owing to the existing Japanese Civil Code not then having been promulgated, the English word "lease" was used in an English sense in Article III. of our Treaty and not in that of the corresponding Japanese word rendered "lease" in the translations of that Code which have been published, and therefore there may be thought to be some want of clearness in the Article in question. Yet that the Japanese negotiator had no idea of restricting such leases to 20 years seems plain from the fact that in the Japanese translation of our Treaty printed by the Foreign Department the general word "kari-ukeru," to take on hire, is employed and not "chintai-shuku," the term used in paragraph 604 of the Code. "Lease" in our Treaty consequently includes not only those 20 year leases (which are comparable to the English lease of a house for 7, 14, or 21 years) but also "superficies" (see paragraph 265 et infra), which is the right to use another person's land for the purpose of owning thereon buildings, in consideration of an annual rent, without any limit of term, unless the parties should have omitted (paragraph 268) to fix it. Furthermore, there is an exchange of notes between the negotiators of the German Treaty, dated the same day, by which it is specifically declared that German subjects can acquire the rights of "superficies" where the technical word of paragraph 265 of the Code is used in both the German and Japanese texts. Our most favoured nation clause (Article XV. of our Treaty), combined with paragraph 2 of Article III., gives to British subjects exactly the same rights as Germans derive from their Treaty and the annexed exchange of notes. The apprehension entertained by some persons in this country who have not examined into the matter, that British subjects will not be able to lease land for building purposes for more than 20 years, is therefore without foundation. The newspapers have discussed it ad nauseam, but as no British subject has ever asked me for an opinion, I have not descended into the arena. Your kindly sending me your pamphlet, however, furnishes an opportunity of trying to make the point clear. If it seems so to you, pray make any use you like of this letter.

You will very greatly oblige me if you will be so good as to publish this letter for general information on an early date and, offering you my best thanks in anticipation,

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. H. WHITEHEAD.

Hongkong, March 1st, 1899.

[We publish this letter, but the facts it sets forth with regard to superficies have been several times asserted in these columns. They have been denied again and again by some of our Settlement contemporaries, especially in Kobe. —Ed. J.M.]

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND THE SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the House of Representatives there were offered on March 2nd two important representations. The one urges that there should be prepared, with a view to general adoption in all the primary schools of the country, a new text-book of morals to take the place of the widely varying books now in use. The other urges that all schools complying with the usual regulations, without regard to whether they make religion the basis of morals or not, should equally be granted the privilege of exemption from military conscription. These representations, whatever their immediate motives or results may be, suggest problems that must be courageously faced in the near future, and to the import of which you have repeatedly called attention. Kindly allow me to point out a few facts in the same connection.

It is no new thing in history that the spirit of religious intolerance may find its last refuge in the school. In the Roman Empire Julian, as keen an enemy as Christianity ever had, yet bound by his uncle Constantine's edict of toleration, could find no better way of repressing the abnoxious religion than by forbidding Christians to teach the classics, a measure which Ammianus, the historian of the age, himself no Christian, characterized as unmerciful (incomentia). The last measure of intolerance in the history of England, if I mistake not, was the "Schism Act," of Queen Anne's time, which forbade Dissenters to teach in any school; and it was not until twenty-eight years ago that Nonconformists were admitted to all the privileges of the English Universities.

His Majesty the Emperor, by the Constitution guaranteeing liberty of religious belief, has given Japan a place among the most advanced nations in this as in other respects. It is of course not to be expected of any government that it should remove every obstacle to the exercise of religious belief. In the case of Christianity, for instance, a tremendous hereditary prejudice and the authority given the head of the family in Japanese society operate to oppress believers in a thousand ways. But the Government is bound by the express decree of His Majesty, so far as it is concerned, to treat all religions, as religions, with impartiality. Even to antagonize all religions without distinction is to violate the Constitution. In the main the attitude of the Government has been, despite the enormous pressure brought to bear upon it, admirably fair and judicious. But here some educational authorities have failed in their loyalty.

We who are interested in the progress of Japanese Christianity have observed again and again that in most places Christians are not considered fit to teach school, and that as a rule the only kind of Christian that can get along in the educational world is the one who strictly hides his light under a bushel. This is so generally the case that it is hard to believe that local prejudices are the only cause.

In Miyagi Ken there is used in all the schools a text-book of morals (Shōgaku shūshin shō), prepared under the direction of Count Higashi and expressly approved by the Educational Department. It consists of eight readers for the children, accompanied with elaborate instructions to the teachers, all marked Mombu-shō kentei sumi. These are pervaded from beginning to end by a spirit of contempt or hostility toward foreigners' ideas of morality. The dictum of one Yasushi Aizawa is quoted more than once with evident approval: "All countries on the same principle exalt themselves and consider others base: so it is a fixed habit that they mutually honour their own and consider other countries barbarian (夷蠻戎狄)." The author admits that occasionally one may learn a useful lesson or two from foreigners, but thinks it best, since children are so easily captivated by alien influences, to set before them native ideals exclusively.

In one of the first lessons is a picture of the shrine at Ise, before which men are prostrating themselves. Two words are written in kana, "God" and "Man." The following questions are recommended to the teacher: Of what is this a picture? What are the men doing? What things do you think dwell in shrines? What are gods? (Require the answer, Our Ancestors.) Do you go to shrines and worship there? The temple in this picture is the precious shrine of Ise called Jingū. Do you think to worship there after you are grown? Do you know what gods abide in this Jingū? The teacher is further admonished: "Vulgar people, when we say gods, have a bad habit of understanding the term in the same sense as the chief idols of religion, so called, in Buddhism or Christianity. (Yozoku, kami to ieba kore wo miru koto Butsu aruwa Yaso ni oite shōsuru shūkyō no honzon no gotoku shii suru hei ari.) It is necessary that pupils be made to understand the difference well. Moreover in various places there are not a few witches and no forib, who, misusing and defiling the divine name, behave themselves shamefully. Great in the mischief wrought by such as these, who, using the name of the gods, thus sink themselves in error. Pupils should be carefully taught so as to perceive that gods are not such things as what are so called by those witches and their kind, but are holy."

Again, the eighth reader, in the course of the exposition of the Educational Rescript, sets before the pupils such sentences as these: "If [Japanese morality] was not originally derived from Confucianism, nor did it emanate from any religion. In truth our country's history clearly constitutes our sacred book and moral code." (Moto yori Yūgaku yori idetaru ni arawareba mata shūkyō yori ryūden seishi mono ni mo aranu. Makoto ni waga kiken min-i to narite akiraka ni kuni no rekishi ni tonsuru wo motte * * *). Moreover principles which rest on a different basis and destroy this morality can never be applied to our country, but this morality is applicable to every country in the world." Nomozomo sono yoru tokoro wo koto ni shite kono michi wa hakwai suru ga gotoki mono wa kesshite waga kuni ni hodo-koru koto atawasaru mo, kono michi ni ita-rite wa sekai kakkoku issho to shite hodo-kosarenu tokoro nashi.) These sentiments are to be explained by the teacher thus: "Our sacred book is our history, holy and perfect, the standard of morals throughout all time, having not the slightest flaw." (Somozomo waga kessen wa shinsei kwambi ni shite, honko ikkwan jinrin no hyōjun, gō mo kessen aru koto naki rekishi kore nari.) "Those other histories that are without principle or virtue seduce posterity and lead to evil. How shall we take such a thing and call it a sacred book of morality? Our most beautiful history, unparalleled among all nations, is the peculiar characteristic of the divine country. We have this divine sacred book of history. How do we need to seek another sacred book?" "Some, taking as a basis the instructions of one or another of various sages, have expounded and embellished the original. So, of course, their doctrines, depending on the men, are expressed differently. There is as yet no system by which throughout all nations together the greatest human happiness may be obtained. Nevertheless, the way of our Emperors, based on the instructions left by the Imperial Ancestors, is coexistent with heaven and earth. So, being the law for all under heaven and the great rule for all ages, it is not to be discussed on the same day with dogmas made by men."

Expressions such as these, vague and quite untranslatable, are in constant evidence. Even the dullest must be able to read between the lines. If they are not intended to teach religion, or to oppose religion, which amounts to the same thing, they mean nothing at all. And it is hard to believe that this remarkable polemical effusion is directed against Confucianism or even Buddhism. The Buddhists apparently have not felt much concern about it.

Any Japanese who honestly believes the religious sentiments inculcated in these books, is in duty bound as a patriot to proclaim them with all his might, but he has no right under heaven to bind them on the consciences of teachers or pupils in the public schools, so long as the Constitution stands. Nor has even one of His Majesty's Ministers the right officially to encourage anything of the kind. It is a plain violation of the Constitution to use the public schools, or officially to permit them to be used, for the purpose of advancing or antagonizing any religion qua religion.

I do not know how the Buddhists feel about it, but surely no Christian, unless he were a hypocritical Christian, could teach in accord with the spirit of the books described above. If a pupil says that in a Christian Sunday school he was told that the same God is the God of all the nations of the earth and loves all alike, the teacher is at once in a dilemma, if he has been faithful to his instructions. Quite recently it has been made plain to teachers in Sendai that they must not teach in Christian Sunday schools. For they would stultify themselves by so doing.

The practical effect of the Government's policy toward religious schools is that students who are at all liable to conscription leave before they are twenty years of age, and there are left the physically defective and youths so poor that their families have to depend on them for their daily rice. From this material must the educated Christian clergy be evolved! No better scheme could be devised to crush the spirit of the Christian Church in Japan. Without devoted and intelligent young men, sound of body and free from financial entanglements, the Japanese Churches can hardly ever become anything more than appendages of Churches in foreign lands.

Marquis Ito's commentaries on the Constitution refer the matter of religious liberty to "the inner part of man," "abstract questions of religious faith," "operations of the mind."

With unfeigned respect to the great statesman to whose wonderful insight Japan owes so much, it may be said that, while the facts stated are indisputable, this exposition of religious liberty strikes an Occidental mind as somewhat inadequate. The western peoples have shed too much blood for dear liberty's sake to cherish any vague ideas as to its meaning. To them the liberty to hold an opinion is no liberty at all. If the Japanese understand the constitution to mean that liberty of religious belief is guaranteed "so long as manifestations of it are confined to the mind" and that the Government may lawfully use its authority to limit other manifestations of it to the harmless vagaries of the ignorant and superstitious, then, to avoid serious misunderstandings, the fact ought at once to be made plain that the Japanese idea of liberty and the Occidental idea of liberty are different things.

A thing apart is the utter folly of gratuitously insulting friendly nations and inspiring Japanese youth with hatred or contempt toward them as "barbarians." In English-speaking countries it is left to the ignorant and vulgar classes, with the newspapers and politicians that pander to them, to decry the Japanese as barbarians. Thank God, the tone of the better elements of society is more manly. But if they who have been so ready to acknowledge the worth of Japanese civilization hear that men of culture who occupy positions of the highest influence here can assiduously teach the people to return this trust and confidence with scorn and derision, it will not be strange if from this fact they draw their own inferences as to the real state of Japanese civilization. The great majority of the foreigners residing in Japan are representatives of the English-speaking nations, which have proved themselves to be the best friends that Japan has in the world. They are generally disposed to rejoice in the prosperity of Japan and join heartily in the bansais of His Majesty's subjects. But how can they, if they know what ideas of patriotism are being instilled into the minds of the people, do anything but look on in painful silence? Enjoying the efficient protection of His Majesty's Government, they are willing to pay just taxes, but not very cheerfully when they know the taxes are used to foster a bitter prejudice that adds so much to the misery of their exile.

When will His Majesty's most trusted advisers awake to the fact that those who, while they boast loudly of their loyalty, strive to associate the glory and prestige of the Throne with their own pitiful conceptions of patriotism, are doing the Throne more injury than can ever be done by all the enemies Japan has in the world?

C. N.

Sendai, March 11th, 1899.

A MOCK PARLIAMENT.

In order to acquaint the students with the rules of debate and methods of procedure followed in the Imperial Diet, it has been customary for some years past for the Second Higher School, in Sendai, to hold one Parliamentary session a year. The affair usually occupies some 5 to 6 hours. This year's meeting took place on the 25th ult., beginning at 5 p.m. and lasting till 10 o'clock. The Minister-President was represented by Mr. Kikuchi, the Director of the School. The Education, War and Admiralty Departments being all concerned in the Bill before the House, both the Ministers and Vice-Ministers of these Departments were represented. 3 Professors acting in the former capacity, and 3 senior students in the latter, the Vice-Ministers bearing the title of Government Delegates. The Dean of the School, Mr. Tachibana, acted as President of the House, and the Professor of History, Mr. Saito, as Vice-president; the offices of recorders and secretaries were filled by the head of the business bureau of the school and students. The Bill, the discussion of which occupied the whole evening, was entitled, "A Bill for the Total Abolition of Examinations in the Higher Schools and the Universities." It was introduced by a senior Law student, Mr. Kato, with great clearness and ability. Mr. Kato occupied the rostrum from 3 o'clock till 7, which gives some idea of the amount of questioning to which he was subjected. Very ingenious attempts were made to show that the introducer of the Bill had contradicted himself. Every conceivable obstacle to the professed measure was suggested, but Mr. Kato held his grounds with no small tact, and in a great many cases the defeat of his opponents elicited roars of laughter from the audience. In order to facilitate voting, the number of members was confined to representatives of the various classes, being about 70 in all.

We may say, en passant, that this Mock Parliament is the event of the year at the Sendai Higher School. The large lecture hall, used on such occasions, was filled to overflowing, the galleries being packed in a way that to any but eager, excited young politicians would have proved very objectionable. Free comment from the audience was allowed throughout, and the spiciness of many of the remarks made by listeners during the speechifying was not the least pleasant feature of the proceedings. With one exception, the ridicule to which they were subjected was taken in good part by all the speakers, many of whom turned the laugh against the interrupters by sharp retorts, while others looked defiance at their opponents and shouted, yakamashii. But in the case of one student who had prepared a long speech in opposition to the Bill, the shafts which reached him from all sides found in his refined and retiring disposition a vulnerable part. He was evidently quite unprepared for any such treatment, took the thing too seriously, became more and more embarrassed, drank endless glasses of water, lost his places in the notes that he held in his hand, and after many painful pauses, finally left the rostrum with his speech only just begun. Japanese speakers are seldom the victims of such nervousness. Shakespeare's description of this class of would-be orators—

"They shiver and look pale;
"Make periods in the midst of sentences;
"Throttle their practiced accents in their fear,
"And, in conclusion dumbly have broke off."

does not apply to the majority of Japanese, who display remarkable coolness and absence of self-consciousness when speaking in public. We think that the authorities of the school were wise in not attempting to suppress the comments of the audience. It was all very harmless and was so plainly the result of youthful spirits and enthusiasm that nobody with any geniality of disposition could object to it. The ejaculations that greeted their ears seemed to afford endless amusement to impersonators of grave ministers of State, who were on several occasions convulsed with laughter at some happy hit at the language, manner, or views of the speakers. If this free criticism had not been allowed, half of the enjoyment of the evening would have been taken away. And, moreover, many of the remarks made by the audience showed up in a very effective way the mannerisms or other imperfections of the speakers. For instance, one speaker who kept mixing English with his Japanese, was asked whether he did this because he was ignorant of the Japanese equivalents and reminded that the audience wanted no foreign language to make things intelligible to it. Students who commenced with learned introductions on psychology or philosophy were reminded that they were not in a class room lecturing on the subjects.

The cry of Kantan! kantan!—"Be brief; be brief!"—was most frequent. Some speakers who after, as they thought, heaping up arguments in favour of or against the bill, began with the words "For the foregoing reasons," were told that there had been no foregoing reasons, but only plausible substitutes, and so on. Many of the best witticisms would not bear translation, being mere puns on words or phrase repartee which would lose force in English.

The ceaseless attempts to introduce urgency motions so familiar to readers of the Diet's Proceedings, were made, but were in every case rejected. The minute acquaintance with parliamentary language and the rules of debate shown by the students was quite remarkable. The choice of officers and speakers showed no small amount of knowledge of the requirements of the occasion. The Ministers of State imitated to an amusing degree the stand about (Chosenfeki) manner of many of the Ministers who have been called on to make speeches in the Diet, and the mock Government Delegates were students characterized by gravity and dignity of manner. The speeches they made ridiculed the Bill as a measure which only persons of very limited experience of human nature and the world in general would ever have dreamed of bringing forward. They challenged the supporters of the Bill to name any methods of testing ability that would work better than the examination system now in vogue, and ended up by describing the Bill as a friend of the idle and the incompetent, which, if it became law, would lead the substitution of fools for the wise men now in power. The supporters of the Bill, however, made out a very strong case logically. Not one of the well known objections to the examination system now in use was left unstated. Examinations were injurious to the mind. They encouraged cramming and instantaneous mental indigestion. They were equally injurious to the body. During the examination and for some weeks before, earnest students passed their days in anxiety and hard application, hastily swallowing their meals, taking little exercise and burning the midnight oil. And for what purpose was all this? Simply to allow the teachers who conduct these examinations to judge of the ability of each student. If teachers cannot devise a quicker and less painful method of testing ability, they must be a set of dullards. Surely it is not necessary to three parts kill a student in order to find out what ability he possesses. At the end of a long examination some of us are like walking ghosts, said one of the supporters of the Bill. Then, too, many are too nervous to do themselves justice when the critical hour comes. It not infrequently happens that such students awake on the morning of the examination with a splitting head-ache. The system now in vogue uses up strength that is needed for study of a kind very different from that known as cramming. Moreover, it crushes all the spirit out of students and makes them appear as full grown men when they ought to have all the vivacity and frolicsomeness of youth. The case of Germany was quoted as favouring the views of the promoters of the Bill. One student argued that examinations destroy the sequence of thought and the interdependence of branches of knowledge. The subjects are different in different terms and different years, and so necessary is it to prepare for future examinations that all branches of knowledge studied in previous terms are dismissed from the thoughts. In arguing against the bill one student, with rare nerve, said that were examinations abolished, such stupid, backward students as himself would stand a chance of being mistaken by an undiscerning public for learned men.

After considerable discussion spent over a verbal amendment of the Bill, it was passed by a large majority and hurried through its Second and Third Readings, and the proceedings terminated.

One incident we have omitted to mention was the skilful manner in which the Mock Minister for War, when called upon to express his opinion on the proposed change, cut the ground away from the supporters of the bill. His speech was somewhat as follows: "The supporters of the Bill oppose the present examination system on the ground that as a disciplinary measure it is too severe, that its effects physically and mentally are bad, that it weakens the body and renders the student spiritless. Now I have, through a long series of years, been in command of troops, and in the Army our discipline is a hundred times more strict than that to which you are accustomed; and as for examinations, we are always examining, yet I venture to say that for the endurance of fatigue and for real spirit the body of men who form our army are not to be surpassed in this country. It is your want of experience that leads you astray." The Minister President adroitly excused himself from speaking on the ground that the subject under debate was one in which Ministers whose departments superintended education were better qualified to pronounce an opinion than he. The measure was not one on which the President of the Cabinet was called on to speak prior to the Bill reaching the Cabinet in the ordinary way.

For some weeks before the meeting of Parliament copies of the rules of debate are circulated among the teachers and students. These rules are the same as those in use in the Imperial Diet.

MISSIONARY ITEMS.

Letters from Dr. and Mrs. J.C. Hepburn, now at East Orange, N.J., to friends in Japan, announce the death of the Rev. John Gillespie, D.D., one of the Senior Secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions U.S.A. Dr. Gillespie's death was from paralysis, and took place on Feb. 16th at his home, Elizabeth, N.J. The East and West Japan Presbyterian Missions were under his especial oversight, and as an experienced and able administrator and counsellor his loss will be greatly felt. It was but a few years since he made a personal tour of investigation in Japan and other oriental fields.

From the same source we have confirmation of the appointment of the Rev. Gen. W. Knox, D.D., formerly of the East Japan Presbyterian Mission, and recently pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Rye, N.Y., to the Union Theological Seminary, N.Y. City, as Professor of the Philosophy and History of Religion. Dr. Knox's acquaintance with the leading Oriental faiths, and the fact of his having held a professorship in the Theological Department of the Meiji Gakuin, Tokyo, may have had influence in this appointment to a chair in one of the leading Theological Seminaries in the United States. His well known dialectical ability, and rare logical and oratorical gifts, assure a success that will be gratifying to his many friends in Japan.

THEFT ON THE BLUFF.

A thief, the other day, broke into the residence Mr. Geo. Philip, 64 Bluff, Yokohama, and stole a fowling piece valued at $300, an overcoat and several other articles, also taking an overcoat and other clothing belonging to the cook. The matter was reported to the Kanagawa Prefectural Office, and the police investigated it, with the result that Constable Kimura arrested one Nakayama Gonkichi, a cook in the service of a foreigner. When apprehended he was very expensively attired, and was riding a first rate bicycle. He made a confession of his guilt. The fowling piece, which was found in his possession, was returned to Mr. Philip; and the bicycle proved to be the property of a Mr. Hagiwara Shintaro, which the accused had borrowed in the name of the owner's friend.

CUT TO PIECES ON THE LINE.

A serious railway accident is reported as occurring near Yokohama. About five p.m. on Wednesday three workmen belonging to the Glass Factory at Takashima-cho were walking on the railway track, when at the iron bridge at Fujimibashi they saw an up-train approaching. They kept to the right side, failing to notice the 4.30 Shimabashi train coming up from the rear. The latter dashed into the party, and one of them was killed outright, being mangled at most beyond recognition, while the others were thrown into the water. One was picked up by a boat which happened to be near. The body of the third man, however, has not been recovered.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Rev. Hugh Foss was recently consecrated as Bishop of Osaka at Westminster Abbey. The Archbishop of Canterbury officiated, and several other Bishops took part in the ceremony.

In his electoral manifesto, the Premier of Queensland pays a tribute of praise to the courteous and equitable spirit in which Japan conducted the correspondence on the subject of Japanese immigration to Australia.

Mr. Justice Romer succeeds the late Mr. Justice Chitty as a Judge of the Court of Appeal, and Mr. Cozens Hardy, Member for North Norfolk, is appointed to a Judgeship in succession to Mr. Justice Romer.

The M.M. steamer Farra, since she was here last year, has been thoroughly overhauled in her boilers and machinery at the yard of La Ciotat, and is now brought up to date as a modern mail steamer.

The following advertisement really appears in a home paper:—"Anz française, Un Anglais desirer reconstruire un jeune français pour conversation." There should be a rush of Frenchmen to enjoy conversation with that young man.

The recent "slump" in Japanese style house decoration is found to have exercised a depressing effect upon the popularity of the chrysanthemum in England. The enthusiasm for the delicately tinted it somewhat "raggy" Oriental flower has declined visibly of late, and a once flourishing society devoted to its cultivation has had to dissolve itself from lack of support.

The Hongkong A.D.C. are to be congratulated on the long run of their excellent Pantomime "The Yellow Dwarf"—twelve performances being given. An "Browie," in the China Mail, remarks:—"When it is remembered the rehearsals began in October, and that five months passed before the twelfth performance was given, some idea may be gathered of the trouble taken."

The Japanese intend, says a home paper, as soon as the vessels now being built abroad are completed, to make a series of experiments and comparisons between vessels built in Britain, Germany, France, and America, and it is hoped that the results of these will be published for the information of naval architects and ship-builders generally. The newly established Japanese Institute of Naval Architects has in this an opportunity of showing that it can render good service to science.

The financial sensation of the moment in London is the absconding of the Chairman and Managing Director of the Millwall Docks Company. The annual report admits that recent balance-sheets were falsified, the assets being overvalued to the tune of a quarter of a million sterling. The Board invariably confided in the Chairman's guarantee that the valuation was correct. The delinquent had a salary of £2,000 a year. A warrant for his arrest has been issued. Eight officials of the Company are also said to be implicated. The Bank balance was overdrawn to the extent of £40,000.

Consul General Wildman, says the Hongkong Daily Press, in receipt of a cablegram from Washington informing him that his request that the property of the wealthy Cortes family of Manila, that was confiscated by the Spanish Government, be returned to them has been acceded to. The President of the United States has restored all their family property by proclamation. This act of the President is in the nature of a reward and recognition of the unwavering allegiance of this powerful family to the interests of the United States in the Philippines, and will no doubt bind to the cause of the United States all the wealthy families of the Islands as against those who have nothing to lose by a disturbed condition of affairs. Don Maximo Cortes, who has been in Washington, is returning to take over his properties in Manila, which are valued at a million and a half of dollars.

CHINA NOTES.

The N.-C. Daily News has the following note on the San-moon affair:—

San-moon Bay, Chekiang province, which, it is reported, will be taken over by the Italians as a naval station, lies mid way between Ningpo and Wenchow. From a commercial standpoint it is a doubtful acquisition, and as a naval base, valueless to any but a first class Power. The mainland to the northward is practically unapproachable by vessels of any draft owing to the extensive mud flats. On the western side two rivers drain into it; the Ninghar, and a lesser one called the Hae-yu; the latter has only 4 feet of water on the Bar at low-water Springs, but as there is a rise and fall of 5 feet, trade may be carried on. On the left bank of the Hae-yu stands the walled town Kien-yan, which enjoys a considerable junc traffic. The Bay is well sheltered from the N.E. monsoon, but lies fully exposed to winds between East and Southeast. The district is but partially surveyed.

The date for the opening of Yochou, Huanan province, as a commercial port for international trade, seems near at hand, for, under instructions from Viceroy Chang Chih-tung, a Taoist of the name of Chang Hung-shun has been recently in Shanghai, engaged in taking notes as to the management of the new open port of Woosung, the administration of the new Chinese Bund district, and the workings of the Shanghai Waterworks and Electric Light department, cost of machinery, maintenance, etc., etc.

Mr. Pierre Piry, a Frenchman by birth and a very old resident of Shanghai, is dead. Mr. Piry was the Father of the Imperial Maritime Customs, which he entered about 1854, only retiring within the last two years. When a boy he was wrecked on the coast of Korea and taken to the Palace as a curiosity, and as such was sent by the King in a cage to Peking as tribute. The Court at Peking, not knowing what to do with him, sent him down to the Foreign Customs then just started by the Consuls at Shanghai, and he was regarded all his life as in some measure a special protégé of the Chinese Government.

A very handsome wreath in oxidized silver intended for the Illis memorial has arrived in Shanghai. This was dedicated, states the Ostasiatische Lloyd, as a token of respect for the gallant men of the Illis from the Russian Navy. Laurel and oaken leaves are wound as a garland and a long silver bow is attached to it with the following inscription:—"The Pacific Squadron in the brave comrades who perished with the Illis." This splendid gift, measuring about one yard in diameter, is now in the hands of the German Consul-General, and it is proposed to hang it up in the German Church which is to be erected in Shanghai, as it cannot be fixed on the monument itself.

The Shanghai bandmen have agreed, it seems, to return to duty, but this involves the retirement of Commander Vela. It seems that the real trouble is racial, and that the bandmen (Mauilamen) will not serve under a Spaniard, but they will sign on again under the assistant bandmaster, Mr. Martinazzi, who is an Italian.

The assessed taxes in Hongkong are at the rate of 13 per cent. as against 10 per cent. in Shanghai.

At Kashingfu a servant in an opium den was found dead near the door. The neighbors said he had committed suicide. This seemed a plausible explanation, but the dead man's friends refused or failed to remove the body and sent in an appeal to the Prefect. He sent the other magistrate to hold another inquest. Happening to notice some bruises on the body, the latter suspected foul play and reversed the former verdict. At this stage the keeper of the opium den and one of his guests sought out the dead man's relatives, and money enough passed to hush the matter up. It seems that a quarrel had arisen over the question of changing a ten cent piece, the servant paying only eighty-nine cash, and the opium customer insisting on having ninety for it. In the fight that followed the servant was thrown down a flight of stairs and died immediately. The current comment is that one cash is cheap for a life, even in such a cheap country as China.

On the 27th ult., a Chinese bank in Nanking, which had large business connections with the officials, failed with liabilities of over Tls. 300,000.

The Peiho is now free from ice, and river traffic once more in swing. There is not less than 10 ft. of water in the reaches, but the channel is too narrow for steamers to negotiate. However, great hopes are entertained for the near future, as the first steamers over the Bar had 11 ft. of water.

Governor Téng, of Nanking, received news of the capture of Niu Shih-him a fortnight ago. He immediately ordered the rebel chief to be executed on the spot, as secret information had been received that a desperate attempt would be made by the chief's followers to effect a renouveau en route, should the usual custom be followed in having such an important prisoner tried and executed in the provincial capital Niu's capture and death, it is said, will end the Anhui Rebellion.

The Hongkong Daily Press records the receipt of some excellent arawberries grown from American seed in a plantation at Happy Valley.

The Peking railway terminus, and the road from the station to the Yungting Gate, are to be lighted by electricity.

Liu Ju-i, who died just after being appointed Customs Taoist at Tientsin, had paid Tls. 80,000, it is stated, for the post.

According to a Peking letter, the native official version of the recent massacre of unarmed peasants by Cossacks last January near Port Arthur, agrees substantially with what has already appeared in N.-C. Daily News, but it is added that the surviving peasants carried the news to the country side, and in an incredibly short time some 6,000 armed village militia were gathered together who marched the next day to the scene of the massacre. There was, however, no fighting, for the Cossacks had already retired to Port Arthur; but when the Russians heard of this gathering of desperate peasants anxious to avenge their relatives' and kinsmen's deaths, the former sent an interpreter to explain matters. The exasperated peasantry, however, would take no explanations, and so carried him off as a prisoner into the hills. The man's fate is not yet known; but the peasants claim that during the massacre the Cossacks killed 94 and wounded 123 men.

Capt. M. F. Patterson, of the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company, at the age of 71, and after serving 32 years in China, during which time he made 600 voyages between Tientsin and Shanghai, has determined to take a trip home to America. He was recently presented with a cheque for $2,000 by the Company in recognition of his services; while the marine officers presented him with a handsome silver salver, and the Masonic fraternity gave the veteran a purse of gold "to be opened on passing the Golden Gate."

We notice in Shanghai papers that Dr. Stoughton, U.S.N., formerly of Yokohama, has been appointed to the Monocacy, at Shanghai.

According to a Nanking dispatch in the N. C. Daily News, the opening of that city to international trade will be only a matter of a few days. On the 1st instant work was begun on the new I.M. Custom-house, and it is intended to begin the collection of duties on the 1st of April on board a hulk lying off the bund. It is stated that some missionaries have purchased a very large number of lots in the proposed Foreign Settlement, while those natives who have not sold their land have now begun setting up landmarks to protect their property from encroachments. H.E. Viceroy Liu, it is further stated, telegraphed to Sir Robert Hart for the loan of a foreign employee or two to assist in the labour of opening the port.

AMERICAN NOTES.

It is reported that a settlement of the Central Pacific Railroad's Government debt has been agreed upon. The company, under its agreement, will pay to the Government the full amount of the outstanding indebtedness, with principal and interest on both the Central Pacific and the Western Pacific roads. The Central Pacific debt on February 1st was $25,885,120 principal and $36,604,385 interest, less $9,100,452 of judgments, bonds and sinking fund, leaving a debit balance of $53,389,053. The debit balance of the Western Pacific on the same date was $6,423,662, making a total debit balance of the two roads of $59,812,715.

General Woodford, the former American Minister at Madrid, made a remarkable speech at the New York Army and Navy Club. The Maine, he declared, carried with her to the bottom almost all the available stock of ammunition possessed by the United States Navy. After she sank, there were not two rounds per gun in existence. "I was told accordingly to exhaust the arts of peace until April 15th," the earliest date at which the United States could be ready for war. "I did the best I could, but let me tell you that had it not been for the untalented, unchanging, and loyal friendship of England, and the attitude of her Minister at Madrid, I might have failed to do the little I did do, because the representatives at Madrid of Continental Europe were ready at any time to interfere with the plans of the United States, if the British Minister would only join them."

At the 27th anniversary dinner of the Sikk Association of America, one of the principal toasts was "the Empire of Japan."

Land of the East: beneath the Heaven
There's not a fairer, lovelier clime;
Nor one to which was ever given
Ambition higher, more sublime.

The Japanese Minister, Mr. Komura, in replying, said—"Knowing well as I do that my power of expression is utterly inadequate to do justice to the occasion, it is with a great deal of diffidence that I venture to say a few words in appreciation of the extreme courtesy which has been extended to me as the representative of the Empire of Japan. In responding to the toast and in thanking you for the very cordial manner in which it has been given and received, the pleasure I naturally feel is enhanced by the conviction that something more than a mere formal compliment has been intended.—(Applause.) Any of my countrymen, speaking to any American assembly, can safely feel confident of the warmth and friendliness of his welcome. On this occasion I have the additional satisfaction of knowing that I am speaking to those who take not only a friendly but an active and intelligent interest in the affairs of my country and whose efforts tend to promote its prosperity. As you all know, intercourse between Japan and the United States has been unique, both in its origin and in its development; so much so that it would be difficult to find a parallel in the history of nations. There is, as far as I am aware, no other instance in international dealings in which a sense of strict justice and a sentiment of liberal friendship have been so constantly present as in the intercourse between those nations.—(Applause.) In the progress of Japan toward a higher and a wider plane of national life and in the efforts of her ruler and people to achieve by constant and earnest work a proper position among the civilized nations, no friend has been more sympathetic or more helpful than the United States; for that reason a Japanese among Americans always feels that he is in the house of his friends, just as I feel on this occasion, that the toast for the the prosperity and the well-being of the Empire of Japan is a reflection of that generous friendship of which we have had strong and undoubted proofs in the past.—(Applause.) This feeling of friendship is further gaining additional strength in the fact that the people of Japan and the United States have already begun to realize the entire identity of their interests.—(Applause.) Japan and the United States are not rivals or competitors in the sense that their interests clash. On the contrary their products supplement each other to their mutual advantage, as shown by the extraordinarily rapid growth of their trade in the past decade, and in contributing to this growth of trade, it might interest you to be reminded that the exports of this country in Japan have had by far the larger share.—(Applause.) This prospect of vast and extensive trade between Japan and the United States, joined by their neighbourhood in the Pacific, whose importance as a great natural highway is rapidly increasing, affords the best guarantee of a still closer and stronger friendship in the future.—(Applause.) From the standpoint of material interests therefore, no less than on sentimental grounds, I may say confidently that the Republic of the United States, looking out upon the widening horizon of a new era in its marvellous history, can find no truer and more sincere well-wisher than the Empire of Japan.—(Applause.) I will, gentlemen, no longer trespass upon your time, and in closing my remarks, I thank you again, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for your extreme courtesy to-night and for your kind and appreciative attention.—(Applause.)

It was expected that the new United States Ambassador to the court of St. James, Mr. John H. Choate, would be presented to Queen Victoria by the Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury, on March 7th at Windsor Castle.

The Manila Times says:—The cargo of the transport Morgan City is the strangest of all the odd assortments that ships' bottoms have carried to Manila since last July. In addition to army stores, she has three hundred hermetically sealed coffins and their box coverings. A superintendent undertaker, Mr. S. E. Reinhard, and five assistants are among the passengers, who will effect the disinterment and sending to the States of the bodies of nearly three hundred officers and men now buried in the vicinity of Manila. On arrival at San Francisco the remains of dead soldiers will be sent at the expense of the Government to their former homes. Several of the families of army and navy men and some additional Government nurses are on the passenger list.

The commission appointed by President McKinley to investigate the conduct of the war has made its report. It exonerates Secretary Alger and the War Department from all the charges made, and inferentially charges General Miles with dereliction of duty. Failures are pointed out, but the placing of the blame is left to the President. The American press is practically a unit in looking upon the report as "a coat of whitewash" for the War Department.

THE DOSHISHA.

"M.L.G."—presumably the Rev. Dr. Gordon—writes as follow in the Hugo Evening News:—

The public have been apprised from time to time of recent events in the history of this institution. Hon. N. W. Mylor having come to Japan in September last as the legal representative of the American Board, he and the former missionary teachers in the school began a series of conferences. These conferences failed in accomplishing a pacific settlement of the questions at issue, and just as all preparations had been made to take the case into the Japanese Courts, the trustees resigned in a body.

This made the organization of a new Board necessary. This has been done through nominations by the Japanese donors, the American donors, and the alumni. Fortunately, the representatives of the Japanese and the American donors were able to recommend the same men, and the Board now consists of the following gentlemen:

Mr. J. Kono, a graduate of the school, and now a Tokyo business man.
Rev. K. Tamekuni, a graduate, now Chaplain to the Sugamo Prison, Tokyo.
Mr. Sathara, M.P., Tokyo.
Rev. T. Hori, a graduate, now a pastor in Yokohama.
Rev. T. Matsuyama, a former trustee, a former professor, now professor in the Heian Girls' School, Kyoto.

Rev. A. Miyake, a graduate, now a pastor in Osaka.

Rev. H. Yamanaoka, a graduate, now a pastor in Osaka.

Mr. J. Maeyami, an Osaka business man.

Rev. M. Hiromi, a graduate, now a pastor in Hioyo.

Rev. H. Kozaki, formerly President of the school.

Mr. N. Kishimoto, a graduate, now teacher in the Unitarian school in Tokyo.

Prof. K. Ukita, a graduate, a former professor, now a professor in Count Okuma's school, Tokyo.

Mr. K. Shimomura, a graduate, formerly principal of the Harris Science School, now superintendent of a coke manufactory, Osaka.

The last four were elected by the alumni.

One of the first things which the new board did after organization was to restore the old constitution, whose "unchangeable fundamental principles" suffered at the hands of the old Board just a year ago. Thus Christianity has been restored to its original position as "the basis of the moral education in all departments of the Doshisha." The representatives of the American Board, in view of this action, in regard to Christianity, have given them a statement recognizing their full control over the institution. This statement closes with these words:—"It is understood by us that the Christianity which is to form the basis of moral teaching in all departments of the Doshisha under the unchangeable principles of its constitution is that body of living and fundamental Christian principles believed and accepted in common by the great Christian Churches of the world."

The trustees, on their part, recognize that they "hold all the property in trust to carry out the wishes and purposes of the original founders in accordance with the unchangeable principles of the constitution" as above referred to.

In this way this once flourishing institution takes a new lease of life. The way before it is not all smooth. Financial and other difficulties lie directly across its pathway. One of these is that of securing a President. The alumni are largely in favour of Mr. Kozaki, a former President. Other friends of the institution feel that his re-election would mean sure disaster. It is a grave difficulty. Let us all hope that a way out of the difficulty may be speedily found.

THE LEOPOLD BANKRUPTCY.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION.

The public examination of Charles Emil Leopold, a bankrupt, was opened on Friday morning at H.B.M.'s Court for Japan before His Honour Judge Wilkinson. Mr. J. F. Lowder appeared for the petitioning creditors, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, and for H. Ahrens and Co., Nachl.; Mr. A. B. Walford for the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation; and Professor Terry, of Tokyo, for the debtor.

His Honour—Are there any other creditors here, or representatives of creditors?

The Official Receiver (Mr. C. D. Moss)—No, your Honour, not to my knowledge.

The debtor was then called and was first examined by Mr. Lowder. He said he was a British subject and had been for many years employed by H. Ahrens and Co., Nachl. They were agents for the Norddeutscher Lloyd and also the London Assurance Corporation. Witness was in charge of those two departments. His remuneration consisted of a fixed salary and a percentage on the two departments.

Mr. Lowder—Roughly speaking, in 1897, your remuneration amounted from one source or another in regard to H. Ahrens and Co. to 7,000 yen, did it not?

Debtor (after making a calculation)—No, about 5,000 yen, I should say. For some reason or other the commission was very low in that year.

Mr. Lowder—You had estimated it at 8,000 yen to the accountant of the Chartered Bank, had you not?

Debtor—Yes, but it fell short of that.

In March, 1898, you estimated your yearly income at 6,000 to 7,000 yen, did you not, in a letter to the Chartered Bank?

Debtor—Yes.

In 1895 you commenced to do business on your own account with the permission of your employers?—It was at the latter end of 1894 or in 1895; I don't recollect exactly.

Your business at that time you proposed to confine to the exportation of furs?—Furs and other exports.

For the purposes of that business you placed yourself in communication with C. M. Lampson & Co., of London, who do a large business in furs?—Yes.

Did you then assume the firm name of C. E. Leopold and Co.?—No.

When did you assume that name?—My brother possibly assumed it in 1896; I don't recollect.

Can you tell us shortly why that firm name was assumed?—For business purposes in London.

The business I take it was your own business entirely?—I was responsible.

It was your own business entirely? You had no partners?—No partners.

Your brother adopted the firm name and you acquiesced?—Yes.

For what reason was it adopted?—For business purposes.

What were the business purposes?—It is always better in London to have a firm name instead of a business name. There was no other reason.

Will you refresh your memory by referring to the letter written by your brother?—I don't recollect when that letter was written. (After reference.) He writes here on 10th Oct., 1896, "If not objectionable to you please draw on E. C. Leopold and Co. It will avoid other endorsements." After that I drew on the firm, and not on myself. True, I was the only member of the firm, and was responsible for all losses.

Mr. Lowder—None of the fur business passed through the hands of C. M. Leopold and Co. in London?—No some fur drafts were drawn on them, but no fur business.

The manner in which the fur business was conducted, I believe, was this, that you procured the firm of C. M. Lampson and Company to address to the Bank of India, Australia and China, a letter of guarantee authorising the bank to accept your drafts accompanied by documents in the terms of the guarantee, and promising to pay them on maturity?—Yes.

I suppose what you got from the Bank was a letter advising you that you would be authorised to draw up to the amount to be stated in a telegram from Lampson?—Yes, and at certain prices.

And the moneys so obtained by you from the bank was to be expended in furs to be sent to C. M. Lampson and Company, was it not?—Yes.

And in order to do that it was occasionally necessary for you to overdraw your account at the Chartered Bank?—Yes.

And so on the 18th June, 1895, you addressed to the Chartered Bank this document, which is called a trust receipt?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—I propose to put this in. Mr. Lowder read the document, which was a printed form acknowledging a lien on all produce held by accused in consideration of his being allowed an overdraft, and engaging not to contract a loan from any other bank or person on the same produce or property.

Having signed that trust receipt it was your custom to hand into the Chartered Bank every month a list of securities held against overdraft?—Yes.

And in that statement you always referred to the letter I have just read?—Yes.

Is this a statement handed in by you on the 31st December, 1897?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder read the statement, which set out quantities of leathers, wall paper, straw braid, furs, &c., to the total value of 65,000 yen.

Mr. Lowder—Is this a statement handed in by you on 31st January, 1898?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder put in the document without reading it.

On the 21st Feb., 1898, you received a letter from the agent of the Chartered Bank as follows, referring to a telegraphic transfer of £5,600 remitted to London. In reply to that you sent this statement, showing goods in your godown to the value of 63,000 yen, did you not?—Yes.

What was the telegraphic transfer referred to in that letter?—I don't recollect.

Could you tell me by reference to your books? Perhaps I can save time. Was it this?—Witness (after reference to the paper produced)—Yes.

Mr. Lowder (reading) "10th February, 1898. Pay C. E. Leopold and Co. £5,600 sterling."

What was done with that money?—Remitted to London.

What for?—To take up accommodation bills. Drawn by whom and on whom?—By me on C. E. Leopold and Co.

In favour of whom?—Probably in favour of the Chartered Bank themselves.

On the 28th February did you hand in this statement of particulars against advances on furs and other produce?—Yes.

On 3rd March, 1898, you received a letter from the manager of the Chartered Bank as to your financial position and you wrote him this reply, did you not? (Letter produced).—Yes.

The letter informed the agent that he (Leopold) closed his books for the year on 31st March, and would hand in as quickly as possible his balance-sheet and profit and loss account. "I may mention that my estimated surplus is yen 55,000. Besides I hold property in Japanese town which will show a surplus of yen 100,000. I am also in receipt of rents for other leases showing a surplus of yen 500 per month, and my income from the firm will be between yen 6,000 and yen 7,000 per annum."

I hand you two statements dated 31st March, 1898. Just look at them, please: are they signed by yourself?—Yes.

It appears to me that one was sent in first and was afterwards corrected? Is that so? One is for 55,500 and the other for 52,000?—The smaller, I think, is the correct one.

The difference is made up by one item, 2,500 catties of feathers, value 3,500 yen?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—Then I will put in the proper one. Now on the 6th May you wrote this letter, did you not?—Yes.

And enclosed was this statement of particulars dated 30th April?—Yes.

In this you have not filled in the trust receipt?—There was a new letter of lien written out about then, but I don't remember.

Mr. Lowder—If so I haven't got it. In this statement other items are substituted for those contained in the statement of the 31st March.

Mr. Lowder read the statement, which gave a list of Japanese securities in land, coal, lighters, &c., totalling 55,000 yen.

Have you got the letter of the agent of the Bank to which this is an answer?—I don't think so; some of those letters I received at the Hospital, and I expect I have lost it. I will look. (After reference)—I don't think there was any letter written. Mr. McVicar came up to me from the Bank and I think that letter was written in reply to a conversation I had with him.

Mr. Lowder—This is your letter of 6th May (reading).

Yokohama, 6th May.

DEAR STEVEN,—Herewith I beg to hand you list of securities which I hold for your account and any money coming in under them will naturally be paid into you. With reference to the different items I beg to mention the following:—

Lumber awaiting transportation at Akechi. With reference to this lumber it will be held at your order on arrival in Yokohama, and will be manufactured into tea boxes.

Lighters in course of construction at Nakamura. As soon as these are finished payment will be made into you.

Wood and other work at Nakamura. Proceeds from this will be immediately handed you. Nakamura godowns, buildings, and leases. These godowns are rented to Messrs. H. Ahrens and Co., Nachf. at yen 200 per month. Surogacho Godowns and Lease. These are also rented to Messrs. H. Ahrens and Co., Nachf. at yen 235 per month and both these and the Nakamura Godowns are for a long term.

I am trying to expedite sale of the above buildings so as to hand you cash instead of securities. The above are all fully covered by policies against fire, and which I hold for your account.

I trust that you will be satisfied with these securities, the more so as you know well that when overdraft is suddenly called in the person has some difficulty in paying up immediately, and I have had this overdraft for some years.

Through my unfortunate illness I was unable to sign the documents with reference to the sale of these properties; I was therefore unable to pay you the amounts promised. In the meantime the Japanese have taken advantage of it and it will be some time before they get properly working again.

I hope to be out of Hospital next week, and will then show your people over the list of securities and of course any deliveries taking place under the above mentioned securities will be paid into you.

With regard to the godowns, you can if you wish refer to Messrs. H. Ahrens & Co., Nachf. for further information.

I will see that the bills on Messrs. C. E. Leopold and Co. are put in order; all the goods with the exception of about £800 have been either sold or contracted for.

This illness has been very unfortunate for my business, but you can rest assured that I have a considerable surplus over my liabilities.

Thanking you in advance for the accommodation, and you can rest assured that I will make it my duty to call upon you directly I am in town.

Yours truly, E. LEOPOLD.

Mr. Lowder—In reply to that letter the agent wrote to you demanding what had become of the securities set forth in your statement of the 31st March?—Some one wrote, but I don't remember whether it was from him or from you.

Now when you drew against a letter of credit from C. M. Lamson and Co. you always handed in shipping documents to the Chartered Bank, did you not?—Yes.

The documents consisted of bills of lading, invoices, policies of insurances, and bills of exchange?—Yes.

Now I ask you to look at an invoice dated 29th December, 1897, purporting to be signed by yourself. Was it signed by you and handed to the bank?—Yes.

That relates to 20 bales of furs?—Yes.

Now I hand to you another document, a policy of insurance referring to the same 20 bales of furs, and ask you if you handed that to the bank and also the bill of lading?—Yes.

Did you against these 20 bales of furs draw on C. M. Lamson and Company for £1,500?—Yes.

Now the furs mentioned in these shipping documents were not shipped?—I can't say.

They were not shipped at the date of these documents?—No, some may have been shipped later on.

How did you obtain the signature of H. Ahrens and Company to the bills of lading and policies of insurance?—They were sent in for signature in the usual course and were signed.

You don't wish me to infer that your employees knew that these goods were not shipped at the time?—No.

Mr. Lowder also put questions with regard to an alleged shipment of eight bales of furs, and debtor admitted that they were not shipped at the date mentioned on the bills of lading or invoices. The freight was not paid, nor was the insurance, but the latter was debited to him.

Against those documents you drew on Lamson for £600, and you were credited with 5,847 yen 72 sen?—Yes.

With regard to six similar cases of furs witness returned similar replies. He drew on Lamson and Co. for £750, and obtained credit with the Bank for 7,309 yen. With reference to 14 packages of furs he drew for £2,500 and obtained credit for 24,305 yen. As to 16 packages he drew for £2,875 and obtained credit for 28,191 yen, and as to 15 packages he drew for £2,625 and obtained credit for 25,780 yen. All these bills were drawn within a period of a little less than seven weeks.

Mr. Lowder—The sterling amounts aggregate £10,850?—Yes, I suppose so, I haven't added them up.

Now I wish to know what has become of that money?—It has been used for general purposes. I am afraid I must trouble you for more detailed information than that. The cheques and the pass-book will show what the money was used for.

Mr. Lowder—Earlier in the morning there was a telegraphic transfer of £5,600 in favour of C. E. Leopold and Co., date 22nd February, 1898?—Yes.

Was that a portion of the £10,000?—Yes.

Now what have C. E. Leopold and Co. done with that £5,600?—Took up drafts drawn by me.

Do you know which drafts?—I can't tell exactly which. Some for goods shipped and some not shipped.

Mr. Lowder—You see I want to know whether that money is in your brother's possession or not, and I must have particulars from you. If I do not get them I shall not be satisfied.

Debtor—I shall be able to tell when I get the final accounts from London.

On 9th Feb., 1898, you drew a cheque on the Chartered Bank for 26,432 yen in favour of the Russo-Chinese Bank and on the same date a cheque on the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank for 28,000 yen in favour of the Russo-Chinese Bank?—Yes.

And the sterling equivalent of these sums was also remitted to E. C. Leopold and Co.?—Yes.

What has become of that money?—Used for taking up drafts.

Can you give us particulars of the drafts?—Not at present. When I have the dates and particulars I can tell you exactly what I did with it.

Mr. Lowder—Perhaps it would be convenient to adjourn now. Perhaps in the interval the debtor will take advantage of the opportunity of reminding himself with regard to that.

The Court adjourned accordingly.

On resuming debtor in answer to Mr. Lowder said he did not remember any remittances to C. E. Leopold & Co. other than those which had been mentioned. Debtor said he could now explain as to the remittances of February 9th of 26,000 yen through the Chartered Bank and yen 28,000 through the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank to C. E. Leopold & Co. They were to cover up drafts drawn on C. E. Leopold & Co. in favour of the Chartered Bank against which he (debtor) had received cash at Yokohama from the Chartered Bank. He offered the same explanation as to the remittance of 5,500 yen—Hongkong Bank and Chartered Bank. On the 7th April debtor drew on the Hongkong Bank a cheque for 29,767 yen. That was to meet a bill drawn on debtor by Lamson's. There was a claim sent to the London Assurance Co. through Lamson's by witness, and they refused it, and it was sent back to Yokohama, and witness admitted it. Witness had previously drawn upon Lamson's for £3,000 on this account and they had paid the draft, presumably to the Chartered Bank. This was in respect of an insurance claim some goods. That claim had since been assigned to Ahrens & Co., and debtor did not know what had been done in the matter. Lamson's drew on him for the £3,000 which they had failed to collect from the Insurance Company.

Then you remitted this £3,000 to Lamson and Co. out of money which Lamson and Co. had placed to your credit with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank for the purchase of furs?—Yes, I used that money.

And knowing that the Assurance Company refused to pay this money you put it among your assets?—I did not know at the time that they definitely refused—not until after I came out of the Hospital. When I put it in the list of my assets, I considered it a perfectly justifiable one, and expected to ultimately collect the amount.

On the 31st December, 1897, your position vis-à-vis the Chartered Bank was that you owed them 86,000 yen odd, was it not?—My pass-book stands at 60,000 yen odd.

Look at the 30th, what was the balance then?—That might have been so on the morning of the 31st.

What was to your debit on the 30th?—About 84,000 yen.

You reduced that by a cash payment of 6,000 yen and a sterling draft on Lamson and Company for £2,000?—Yes.

And the goods against which that draft was drawn were not shipped?—Not at that date.

And your position vis-à-vis the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank at the same date was a debit balance of 40,000 yen, was it not?—I don't remember; if the pass book says so it was.

And against that debit balance you drew a draft on Lamson and Co. for which you obtained credit for 42,000 odd yen, did you not?—Yes.

Against furs that were not at that time shipped?—Yes.

So that your position vis-à-vis the two banks was a debit balance of something over 120,000 yen against which you drew on Lamson and Company?—Yes.

That was the result of your trading for how long?—That I don't exactly know.

For about two years?—There were outstanding against it; I had other securities then.

Considering that position, did it not occur to you that you were bankrupt or very nearly?—No, I considered there were securities and profits I should make that would enable me to cover everything.

By securities you mean investments of those various sums of money that you had obtained from the bank?—Yes, and untraded stocks.

Now this morning I gave you a list of bills on Lamson and Co. amounting to £10,850 against furs that had not been shipped—these bills were met by C. D. Lamson and Co. as they fell due?—Yes, I suppose so.

And they were subsequently repaid by Ahrens and Co.?—Yes, and debited to me at my request.

They were repaid by Ahrens and Co. on the supposition that they were legally liable because they had signed the documents?—I never knew the reason; I never asked them to repay more than £5,000. But I presume that was the reason.

You never asked them to pay more than £5,000?—No, after that I had no communication with Ahrens and Co.; they would not communicate with me in any way or form.

Do you remember sending to Mr. Wisner a statement of your assets which showed a total of 340,000 yen?—I do not know. There were so many things written in the Hospital that I do not remember.

Look at that letter.—Yes, it was written when I was in Hospital.

Here is another in which you state that you will make out an assignment to Ahrens and Co. in proper form, and also a list of securities for the Chartered Bank. Why were you saying all that?—To protect the firm.

I am suggesting that at your request Ahrens and Co. paid off the whole of these drafts, that they thought they were liable because their signatures were attached to the documents, and that you assigned them assets represented as 340,000 yen to protect them from their liability?—I have no recollection of asking them to remit more than the £5000. I expected that they would have to meet the whole if I did not pay. Somebody would have to meet them, either Ahrens or myself.

Can you tell me how you invested the proceeds of the bills you drew on Lampton and Company for £10,850?—The principal seems to be in straw brash, lime, coals, Phoenix Saw Mills.

What is the amount of Phoenix Saw Mills?—Several amounts (Continuing). There was that cheque of 26,000 yen through the Russo-Chinese Bank, feathers, payment in regard to land, telegraphic transfers to London—these are the principal items.

You just mentioned the Phoenix Saw Mills—they belonged to you, did they not?—Yes.

When did you purchase them?—I can't recollect exactly. At the beginning of 1896 I was half shares in it with Kildayle. (After referring to books). From February, '98, I was the sole owner.

What did you pay for his share?—I paid some amounts in cash, and he was to have something monthly. In May, 1898, there was 15,000 yen owing to him still.

What amounts did you pay to him?—In February he did not have much: in March 10,000 yen (After reference to books). In March 2,400 yen, April 1,000 yen, in May 1,000 yen, then there was a bit of lumber in the country, value 7,000 yen, that I had paid for and which he took over.

On the 6th May you assigned the Phoenix Saw Mills to Ahrens and Co., did you not, as security among other goods?—Yes.

And you valued them at 80,000 yen?—Yes.

And they belonged at that time entirely to you?—Yes.

How did you arrive at that valuation?—Well, considering the money I had put in it I considered it a fair price, and if my troubles had not come I think I should have realised it.

Did you have a balance sheet of the saw mills made out on May 31st?—Yes. It is audited by Mr. Stone and has also Mr. Curtis's signature. Mr. Curtis was a secretary and cashier in my employ and Mr. Stone was simply the auditor.

Now this account begins with an entry on the debit side of 48,240 yen, which is called capital account. What is the meaning of that?—It is money paid in by me from time to time into the Phoenix Saw Mills account.

Is that what you paid?—I paid in cash.

To whom?—Into the concern.

It is not purchase money?—Yes, it is the same thing as part of the purchase money.

There is an entry here of 62,164 yen, for timber belonging to Ahrens and Co. taken over by the Saw Mills and never paid for?—No, it arrived in bad condition.

And was used by the Saw Mills?—Yes, we made it up for kerosene boxes and partly for tea boxes. The proceeds of the tea boxes were drawn for by Ahrens.

And the kerosene boxes?—They were paid for by Raape into the Phoenix Saw Mills.

And not paid over to Ahrens?—No.

And the loss on the Saw Mills during the time of your working was 47,813 yen?—Yes. The principal loss was on the Selkirkshire. The total loss is larger than that. It is 65,000 yen, besides 15,000 yen unpaid lumber.

In view of that do you not think that 80,000 yen was a high valuation?—No, the inventory alone was 65,000.

Have you the deeds of transfer of the Saw Mills?—No, I have not. They were taken over again by Kildayle at the request of the late Mr. Keil. Mr. Keil acted for H. Ahrens and Co. It was done at my house in the presence of Akiyama, Mr. Keil, and Mr. Terry. This was at the end of June. The amount for which they were resold was 66,800 yen. I do not know in whose hands they are now. The documents are not in my possession.

The next item is "Yoshihama-cho shed and lease at 40 yen per month." Where is the lease?—I have not got it. The Japanese have the documents. I never could get the documents of that; there is something peculiar in the title. If anybody has it would be Uyeda, my bando. I don't think there is any lease to that ground. Uyeda lives in Sumiyoshi-cho; I don't know whether he is there now. He was in my employ in 1896 and 1897. He was previously in my department at Ahrens and Co.

Do you know to whom the shed is let at 40 yen a month?—I don't know now. It was let to Halm for 40 dollars a month, but I don't know now.

Who collected the money?—I did.

What were the terms?—It was for six months. Does the shed belong to you?—Yes.

You value it at 1,000 dollars?—Yes.

Is it still your property?—That I can't tell you. I haven't got it now.

Have you sold it?—No.

Now will you explain your answer?—All my Japanese property is in the hands of Uyeda Yoshizawa and Tada Ginzaburo.

Can you give me the address of Tada Ginzaburo?—I don't know it.

Have you not been in communication with them through your attorney, Mr. Uchiyama?—Mr. Uchiyama could do nothing with them.

Do you know if this shed has been sold?—I don't. I should say it has not been sold.

If you wished to realise it now what should you do?—I should get hold of Mr. Uyeda, and instruct him to do so.

Are you willing to instruct Mr. Uyeda?—Certainly.

Now there are a house and godown in Japanese town which you value at 2,500 yen, and which you included in your list of assets. Where are they?—Sold. I sold them after I came out of the hospital, and paid the proceeds to Ahrens and Co.

What were the proceeds?—2,000 yen, I believe.

When did you last see Uyeda?—I saw him last in prison—I should say about the first week in the New Year.

Now the next item in this list is land at Kanagawa which you value at 1100 yen? That is in Uyeda's name?—It should be. I have no documents, as they were taken out of my safe at No. 59 when I was in the hospital.

Who had the keys?—I had one set of keys, but the safe was always opened. Whether the Japanese or Mr. Lloyd, my clerk, had the keys I don't know. The safe contained no cash, only books. There was an office key for the outside. There were inner drawers that they did not have access to except Mr. Uyeda. There were two keys, I think. One I had and one Mr. Uyeda, I think. I could not find the documents after I came out of the hospital.

And you think that Uyeda had another key?—Yes, he had another key.

And you think he was the only person who could have access to the inner drawers?—Yes, unless he handed the keys to other people.

Did you ask him what had become of the documents when you came out of the hospital?—No. I did not wish to raise many questions with him, I was afraid that we should lose the big affairs. This being a small affair I thought I would let it slide.

Do you know what has become of this land?—I believe it has been sold. I asked him some time ago about it. I presume it has been sold or transferred. I did not take much trouble about it, as it was a small amount. In fact, I would have given him that land if he had transferred the other things.

You think, then, that land or the proceeds are in his possession, and you are willing that your name should be used for getting them from him?—Certainly.

The next item is Yoshihama Shinden land, which is said to be in the names of Uyeda and Ginzaburo—that is valued at 37,000, after paying off the mortgages upon it?—Yes.

What has become of it?—I have received information that it has been sold contrary to my instructions for 66,000 yen.

From whom?—Uchiyama Rosetsu, who holds my power of attorney, with another, Ishii Shichigoro. It is a joint power of attorney, and cannot be exercised without the concurrence of both. They both opposed the sale at such a ridiculously low figure. I heard that it was sold just before the New Year. I immediately did everything I could to get the sale cancelled.

Did you take any steps to apprise Messrs. Ahrens and Co. of the fact that the property was about to be sold?—I did not know that it was to be sold until it was sold.

Who sold it?—I should say only Uyeda and Ginzaburo could have sold it.

And you think it was sold for the exact amount of the mortgages upon it?—Yes, I suppose so, with interest.

You suppose it was taken over by the mortgages?—No, I don't think so.

Was it sold by public auction?—No, if it had been it would have fetched a far larger sum.

Whence did you derive this information?—Uchiyama and Uyeda, when I saw him once in prison.

Do you know what the documents of this land were?—They were certified copies of the title deeds and certified copies of the register.

Who bought the land?—I believe Mr. Kakei Otani, the banker.

Then you accuse your servants Uyeda and Ginzaburo of having sold this property against your instructions?—Yes, and for an absurd price.

Now there is an item of 34,000 yen claim against the Insurance Company. That they refused to entertain?—They did not refuse to entertain; they refused to pay.

Now there is an entry of "various unsold stocks amounting to 30,000 yen" in your possession. Were those unsold stocks in the hands of C. E. Leopold and Company?—Yes.

Can you give us details of them? Can you give us a list of the stocks you valued at 30,000 yen at that time?—I will try to get details, but I can't tell you now.

Mr. Lowder—At our next meeting will do. Now there is 3,000 yen sums owing?—They have been paid.

And what have you done with the proceeds?—The bulk has been paid to Ahrens and Co., and the remainder I used in business, 800 yen.

Now there is an item of a paper factory at Tokyo, valued at 4,000 yen. Where are the documents relating to that?—It was a mortgage. I don't know what has become of the documents. It was in Mr. Uyeda's name also. I have received no part of the proceeds, and am perfectly willing to assist in their recovery.

Now there is an item of 120,000 yen for shares. What are those?—There were 75,000 yen in the Lighter Company, which were made over to H. Ahrens. There were about 2,000 yen of Jinrikisha Company's shares, but those the firm would not accept. The Company is in Tokyo, and the shares are in Uyeda's name. They are good, and I am willing to assist in recovering from Uyeda. Then there are some small shares, Klondykes and Yukons; I don't know what they have done with them.

Mr. Lowder—Here is an item of 36,000 yen as value of skins, coal, wood, and other goods, unsold? What does that mean?—I have not got possession of any of those things. There is some wood belonging to me, I believe, lying in the north. It is all in Uyeda's possession. Some of the skins and other things were sold to pay current expenses by Uyeda. They never came into my possession. They were all stopped at Kanagawa. Awomori, and Hakodate and resold. I have never been able to get an account from Uyeda since my troubles. Uyeda received money from me to buy skins, and they used to be sent to me and I received them.

Mr. Lowder—Then I would ask you to make me up a paper showing the moneys paid to Uyeda for this purpose, amounting to 36,000 yen. Would you give assistance for the purpose of recovering these goods or their proceeds from Uyeda?

Debtor expressed his willingness to do so.

Mr. Lowder—Now as to the Chartered Bank assets—we have "lumber at Akeshi"—where is that lumber?

Debtor—That is still there. It is not any of the wood I had assigned to Ahrens & Co. It was purchased at Hakodate by my instructions. By whom purchased I do not know for certain. Uyeda would be able to tell you. He told me it was lost in floods last July. I had no money to pay freight to bring it down. The Japanese have the documents. The actual sum I paid for it would be about the same amount as it is assigned for—about 7,000 yen. The remittances were made through what I called the Hakodate account.

Mr. Lowder (reading from the list of assets)—"Wood and other work in hand valued at 6,000 yen." What is that?

Debtor—It was outstanding from Conder on the contract for the Nagasaki Hotel. I only got half the amount that it cost me. It was twice as expensive as the contract price, and I thought the architect would allow me something, but it appears that I have no legal claim, as a receipt has been given.

Mr. Lowder—Then this was a speculative asset.

Debtor—No, I thought it would be paid at the time. I considered it legally due from the documents. I had in hand.

Mr. Lowder—The next item is "Nakamura Godown and lease valued at 10,000 yen." What about the lease and godown?

Debtor—They were leased to me by Kakei Otani and by me to Ahrens and Co. I am not able to assign the leases and godown. The Japanese bantos have taken possession. That is how it is. So long as I was out of prison I could keep my Japanese in order, but since I have been in prison everything has gone to rack and ruin, and they have done what they liked.

Where are the lease and documents?—They should be in the possession of Tada Ginzaburo.

And the lease also?—Yes.

And are you willing to lend your assistance in regaining possession of them?—Yes. They would have been assigned to the Chartered Bank before, but for the action that was taken. We asked you to delay the action to get this lease transferred, but you would not.

Were these documents removed from your safe?—I don't think so. They ought to be in the possession of Tada. Uchiyama had told me they had raised some money on the lease.

Mr. Lowder—"Suraga-cho Godowns and lease, valued at 15,000 yen." What is that?
Dehtoi—"That is in the name of Uyeda. The documents are in his possession also. They were in the safe. I am willing to lend my assistance to obtain an assignment.
The examination was then adjourned till Friday next.

Saigon, March 12.

The Queen of England has started for Nice.

MAJOR ESTERHAZY AND THE ARMY.

Saigon, March 13.

Major Esterhazy, writing in Parisian journals, has made a violent attack on several officers of the General Staff, especially Generals Goussier and Pellieux. Both of the Generals sought permission to reply, but M. de Freycinet refused to entertain their request, being of opinion that the duty of taking decisive action in the matter devolves upon the Minister of War.

THE TOULON EXPLOSION.

Saigon March 14th.

The Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy, stated in the Chamber of Deputies that the technical inquiry and the judicial inquiry with reference to the explosion at Toulon have not, up to the present, afforded any positive result. It is still unknown whether the explosion was contrived or accidental.

LOUBET'S CLEMENCY.

Saigon, March 15th.

President Loubet has announced the pardon of 250 persons condemned to fines in connexion with the demonstrations of February.

THE SECRET DOSSIER.

M. de Freycinet, Minister of War, will soon communicate to the Court of Cassation the secret portfolio in the Dreyfus affair.

PICQUART'S TRIAL.

Lieut.-Colonel Picquart has been handed over to civil justice.

THE GERMAN ARMY BILL—POLITICAL CRISIS.

Saigon, March 16.

The Reichstag, by 209 votes to 141, has thrown out the second reading of the Bill for augmenting the Army by 7,000 men. The dissolution of the Reichstag is possible.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

London, March 11.

The Disarmament Conference (proposed by the Czar) meets on the 18th of May.

BRITISH NAVAL ESTIMATES.

Right Hon. G. J. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty, has introduced into the House of Commons the naval estimates. The total is put down at twenty-six and a half millions, and 4,250 more men are to be added. The new programme comprises two armoured cruisers, and three smaller cruisers of very high speed. It is intended to make Wei-hai-wei a secondary naval base, with adequate fortifications, coal stores, and small repairing shops.

NEWCHWANG RAILWAY.

Hon. St. John Brodrick, Under-Secretary to the Foreign Office, replying to a series of questions in the House of Commons regarding the Newchwang Railway Loan, said that he understood that M. de Giers' protest is directed against the supposed tendency on the part of China to ignore prior engagements with Russia and not against the British loan.

QUEEN ON THE CONTINENT.

London, March 13.

The Queen has started for Cimiez.

MR. GOSCHEN ILL.

Rt. Hon. G. J. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty, is laid up with influenza.

MAJOR MARCHAND.

Major Marchand and his party have arrived at Bourah, twenty days' journey from Adisababab.

MR. RHODES MEETS THE KAISER.

Mr. Cecil Rhodes has gone over to Berlin in connection with railway-telegraph schemes. He had an audience with the Emperor and attended the sitting of the Reichstag, while his mission was being discussed. Several speakers recalled the Jameson raid, and Rhodes' unfriendliness toward Germany. The Colonial Secretary said the permission to carry the Trans-African Railway through the German territory would be only possible provided that German interests were in every way guaranteed.

SUEZ CANAL BLOCKED.

The Rydal Hall is ashore at the Canal (Suez), blocking navigation.

London, March 14.

The Rydal Hall (which recently grounded in the Suez Canal) has been floated.

THE SAN-MOON QUESTION.

In the course of discussion in the House of Commons over the San-moon question, Mr. W. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, said that, if Italy could secure concessions by diplomacy, Great Britain would welcome Italy's appearance in China; that British policy was to safeguard her own interests and not to obstruct friendly Powers' safeguarding theirs; and that England was willing to support Italy by diplomatic means.

London, March 15.

An official declaration from Rome says that Minister Martino's second note was contrary to the instructions of the Government, and consequently it is not considered as an ultimatum.

This is equivalent to announcing the recall of Martino.

OBITUARY.

London, March 15.

The death has occurred of the veteran actress Mrs. Keeley.

PLAGUE IN INDIA.

EUROPEAN DOCTOR DIES.

A European doctor has died of plague at Calcutta.

The advent of warm weather is reducing mortality in Bombay, and a continual decline of the epidemic is expected.

SIR CLAUDE MACDONALD'S HEALTH.

London, March 16.

The Times learns that Sir Claude MacDonald's health makes a short leave of absence imperative for him.

THE SAN-MOON AFFAIR.

In the Italian Chamber of Deputies Gen. Canevaro, Premier, announced that the Government has disavowed and recalled Sig. Martino, because he had presented the ultimatum on his own initiative, whereas Italy had promised England and other Powers that she would avoid force; that Sir Claude MacDonald, English Minister, will represent Italy, until Martino's successor is appointed; and that Italy still adheres to her resolve concerning San-moon; but that she will do her utmost to avoid the use of force which will greatly prejudice her friend England, besides other Powers.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

ITALY IN A DILEMMA.

Peking, March 16, 10.10 a.m.

Great Britain from the first did not countenance Italy's effecting the acquisition of Sanmoon Bay by any other means than diplomacy. Now her demand is declined, Italy finds herself in a dilemma. The Italian diplomats imagined they could secure success by a mere menace.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM NO. 411.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1—R to Kt 3	1—P takes R
2—Kt to Kt 6 mate	1—K takes Kt
2—B to Q 6 mate	1—Kt (Kt 7) takes Kt
2—R to K 3 mate	1—Kt (R 6) takes Kt
2—R to Kt 5 mate	1—B to Q 6
2—Kt takes B mate

Correct solutions received from W.H.S., Marco, D.D., Miss S., and Schach.

VOILA.—1—Kt takes Kt (R 6) is met by 1..... Kt to K 6, then 2 to Kt 5 is not mate, for Kt interposes.

PROBLEM NO. 414.

By M. ANDREW.

A First-Prize Irish Problem.
BLACK.

WHITE.

White mates in two moves.

"JAPAN MAIL" PROBLEM COMPETITION.

Our chess readers will be glad to hear that "W.H.S." intends to present this year's prize to the winner of our problem-solving competition. We hope that with such an inducement before them many of our solvers in the years gone-by will make a reappearance in the lists and so increase interest in the affair. The competition begins with the problem to be printed in our issues of April 1st.

GAME NO. 488.

Notes by W. B. Mason, Tokyo.

The following game played by correspondence presents a few features which will be found useful to players unfamiliar with certain theoretical aspects of the openings.

EVANS' GAMBIT.

(Remove White's Q Kt.)

White—(Mr. M.)	Black—(Mr. S.)
WHITE.	BLACK.
1—P to K 4	1—P to K 4
2—Kt to B 3	2—Kt to Q B 3
3—B to B 4	3—B to B 4
4—P to Q Kt 4	4—B takes P
5—P to Q B 3	5—B to R 4
6—Castles	6—P to Q 3
7—P to K R 3

This move was not so attacking as White intended; but it has obvious advantages.

8—B to Q Kt 5

7—B to K 3

B takes B followed by Q to Kt 3 is probably better.

9—Kt to Kt 5

8—K Kt to K 2

A bad move. He should have Castled. Having missed this opportunity, White never gives him another chance of Castling without serious loss.

10—Kt takes B

10—P takes Kt

11—Q to Kt 3

11—P to Q 4 (best)

12—P takes P

12—Q takes P

Involving the loss of a pawn and a move.

13—B to B 4

13—Q to Q 4

14—B takes B

14—R to K B sq

White could now capture the Q Kt P, but this would liberate the action of the Rook.

15—B to Q R 3

15—B to Kt 3

16—P to Q 4

16—P takes P

17—Q to R sq

17—R to B 3

The beginning of an attack on the K Kt.

18—Q to Kt 5

17—R to B 3

All the play after this is full of interest.

19—B to Q 5

19—Q to Q 2

20—B takes Kt (B 3)

20—P takes B

21—Q to K 5

21—R to B 2

22—Q to R 8 ch

22—R to B 1 q

23—Q takes B P

23—P to B 4 (best)

Still threatening the Kt.

24—Q takes Kt P ch

24—R to B 2

Here White could equalise the game by R takes Kt ch. If Q takes R, then Q to Q B 6 ch, or if K takes R, Q to K 4 ch, and the Q R is lost in either case.

25—B to B sq

25—Q to Q 4

An excellent move, protecting as it does both his Rooks.

26—B to Kt 5

26—K to Q 2 (best)

27—B takes Kt

27—Q to B 4

For if B takes B, then R to Q 4. White has now no option but to exchange Queens. Black's position is probably the stronger owing to his advanced pawn; but the only ending being a long and tedious one for a game by correspondence, it was agreed to abandon it as a draw.

GAME NO. 489.

THE JANOWSKI-SNOWWALTER MATCH.

TWELFTH GAME.

QUEEN'S GAMBIT DECLINED.

White—Snowwalter.	Black—Janowski.
WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P Q 4	19 R x R
2 P Q B 4	20 R Q B sq
3 Kt Q B 3	21 R Kt 5
4 B B 4	22 Q B 2
5 P K 3	23 Kt Q 3
6 Kt B 3	24 Q x R ch (r)
7 P B 5	25 R x B ch
8 B Q 3	26 Kt B 5
9 P x P	27 P x P
10 R Q B sq	28 R B 6
11 Kt K 5	29 P x B
12 Castles	30 P x P
13 B x Kt	31 R P x Kt
14 B Kt 3	32 P B 4
15 Q Kt 3	33 R B 7 ch
16 P Q R 4	34 B Q 2 ch
17 Kt B 4	35 R x P ch
18 Kt B 4 (c)	36 K R 2
	Resigns (i)

Notes from The Press, Philadelphia.

(a) Too conservative. B to Q 3 or P to Q B 4 was preferable.

(b) He could not well play P to B 3 followed by P to K 4 on account of White Q to R 5 move which forces the P to B 4 continuation.

(c) Threatening P to Q R 5, followed eventually by Kt takes K P.

(d) He could not play R takes R. White would have answered B takes B P, and if P takes B, then Kt takes P, followed by Q takes P and Q takes Kt, coming out two Pawns ahead.

(e) Brilliant play. White gets a Rook and a B for his Queen. He will also win a Pawn, and the attack he obtains is quite promising. The play seems sound though Black could hold his own.

(f) Well played. He could not move Kt to K 5 at once, for B to K 5 ch would have followed.

(g) Should White capture the Queen then B takes B and B takes Q P leads to an even game.

(h) Black thus far has defended splendidly, and had he now moved Kt to Kt sq or K to B sq his opponent could hardly do better than to draw by perpetual check. The text move, however, is a disastrous mistake which loses at once.

(i) He can not guard against the threatening R to R 4 mate.

GAME NO. 490.

THE "RAZZLE-DAZZLE."

During Pillsbury's recent visit to Chicago he played a game with Dr. D. T. Phillips. The Doctor, having the opening, sacrifices his Knight in the third move, and proceeds to "razzle-dazzle" the Champion in first-class style. We give this wonderful game with a few notes by Miron.

White—Dr. Phillips.	Black—Pillsbury.

27 P Q R 3	Q R B 2

NOTES.

(a) This is the key-note to the jolly tune.

(b) These churchmen are wonderfully well handled:—

"But whether player or sword subdue the foe, Bid those who fight these battles let me know."

(c) "Begins to let the halter draw, with poor opinion of"—original openings.

(d) An instructive example of self-restraint; he now gets his exchange and compels Black to let down one of his bars. The rest is interestingly played.

NOTES.

Mr. Steinitz has opened an office in New York where he proposes to give lessons in the high developments of chess and to contest matches by correspondence with opponents resident in or out of America.

Janowski places both Lasker and Pillsbury above Tarrasch, with whom he brackets himself. He thinks that in the matter of soundness Lasker stands first; but that Pillsbury stands first in power of combination. At the same time Janowski believes that, because of Lasker's conservatism, he would have the better chance of winning a set match.

Woman's Weekly, one of the recent journalistic ventures, goes interestingly on "The Queen as a Chess-player," as follows:—Her Majesty has, it is said taken to chess again, one of her old and favourite recreations. At one time she played it very regularly, and her chief reason for giving it up was because she used to lose her temper at being beaten. The Queen is a very solid player and fairly sound. She knows the openings well and can beat most of her kin, but the Empress Frederick is far and away a better player than her mother, and is able to give her a knight now although twenty years ago she could not. The argument is, of course, that the Queen's age has deteriorated her play, but this by no means follows. It is more probably due to the study by the Empress Frederick of the German Handbuch, which has now for years been her inseparable companion. The games of Von der Lase and other great players, and the various analyses of the openings with their possibilities, are Her Imperial Majesty's constant concern, as much so that the Kaiser, after getting a sound drubbing at the game by his mother—and he thinks he can play—remarked that it was a great pity she wasn't a man, as that would enable her to enter the lists against Dr. Tarrasch and others at the public tournaments. It is the enthusiasm of the Empress for the game which has induced the Queen to take to it once more. One wet day at Balmoral the chessboard was brought out, and the two ladies had a long and brilliant tussle, ending in the defeat of the Empress. This so elated the Queen that she played three more games and drew another one. Then a recent game between Steinitz and Tchigorin, the Russian master, was played through, after which dinner interrupted the worship of Chess; but even then the Queen could not get the sixty-four squares out of her head, and Lord Balfour, of Burleigh, the Master-in-Attendance, had quite an essay on chess to listen to through the meal. It is to be hoped that he understands the game thoroughly and is interested in it, for the Empress doted him with facts about the great chess masters of the past, and the Queen incidentally mentioned that the Prince Consort, during the Exhibition year of 1851, witnessed a game played between Anderssen and Staunton, the English champion, and believed that the Englishman was beaten. Anderssen certainly won the tournament of that year. Her Majesty's memory is marvellous, for she spoke of one La Bourdonnais, who came over to play before she was Queen, and also beat the then English champion, who, upon reference to a chess history in the Balmoral library, turned out to be one M'Donnell (1834).

BIRTH.

A Yokohama, on March 7th, the wife of E. T. OSBORN of a son.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE Diet was prorogued on Friday.

THE Queen of the Belgians is reported to be dying.

M. FALLIERES is the new President of the French Senate.

THE U.S. Congress has adjourned without dealing with the bills relating to Hawaii.

COL. PICQUART is to be tried by court martial on some counts, by the Assize Court on others.

MR. HOOLEY, the notorious company-promoter, is to be prosecuted for offences under the Debtors' Act.

IN Tokyo the prices of commodities have been falling since last autumn, but a rising tendency is now apparent.

THE condition of the Pope has been causing some uneasiness, but later advices announce that His Holiness is better again.

THE Spanish Cabinet has been reconstructed, owing to the impossibility of finding a majority to approve of the cession of the Philippines.

A POWDER magazine near Toulon exploded on March 6, spreading death and destruction over a wide area. Over 100 bodies have been found.

PRINCE HENRY of Prussia is the new German Naval Commander-in-Chief of the Asiatic squadron, replacing Admiral Diederichs, who has gone home.

REAR ADMIRAL DEWEY has been promoted to be Admiral and Colonel Otis to be Major-General, in recognition of distinguished services.

H.I.H. the Emperor graciously contributed yen 800 towards the funeral expenses of the late Lieut.-General Tamura, ex-Commander of the 12th Army Division.

FRANCE has obtained a coaling station at Muscat, but very conflicting statements in regard to the affair have been made in the French and English parliaments.

MR. GEORGE JAMISON, C.M.G., who was Acting Judge of H.B.M. Court for Japan some years ago, has been obliged to resign from the service owing to continued ill-health.

A SEVERE earthquake was experienced in Central Japan on Tuesday. Much damage was done to property at Osaka and Nara. At the latter place some lives were lost.

THE officers of the Kanagawa Prefectural Office have presented Mr. Takeshima, ex-superintendent of Police of Kanagawa Prefecture, with a gold watch-chain in recognition of his services.

PRINCE KONOYE is to proceed to Europe on a pleasure tour via Korea and China. He leaves by steamer Higo Maru on the 26th inst. and will return in time for the 14th session of the Diet.

THE military authorities have been encouraging the study of the English language among the Gendarmes, and there are now four or five in each regiment capable of acting as interpreters.

BARON A. D'ANNE HAN, Belgian Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan, was received in audience by the Emperor on the 2nd, when he presented a letter from King Leopold.

H.I.H. THE CROWN PRINCE, who is now staying at the Detached Palace at Numazu, will leave for the Detached Palace at Hayama about the 10th inst. and remain there until the commencement of April.

THE foreign community of Yokohama have formally set aside the accumulated funds of the Yokohama General Cemetery to be used as a trust fund to be applied to the up-keep of the grounds and graves in the years to come.

THE Diet this week passed the special subsidies to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Tokyo Kisen Kaisha; increased the emoluments of its own members, and approved of the amended Code of Criminal Procedure.

ITALY has demanded from China the cession of Sun-moon Bay, in Chekiang province. China refused the request and Italy is now sending a squadron of six ships, including the Stromboli, to make a naval demonstration.

RABIES being prevalent in Kanagawa Prefecture, Mr. Miyahara a veterinary physician in the service of the Kanagawa Central Police Office, has submitted proposals to the authorities for establishing protective regulations.

ONE Fukuda Takijiro (42), a paper hanger at Nichome, Otamachi, Yokohama, placed himself before a train near Ishizaki, Tobemachi, on Wednesday night, and was cut to pieces. He had been leading a dissolute life for some time past.

A MAN named Sakuma Isojiro (28), Shishikimura, Isumi-gori, Chiba Prefecture, recently opened a tea-house. He had, however, only a few guests, while an old woman of 72, Tonda Matsun, drove at excellent trade. In a fit of jealousy, Sakuma waylaid, and killed her with a hatchet. He was arrested.

THE Times, in a leading article, sympathises with Italian demands for concessions in Chekiang province. It hopes that the British Foreign Office will grasp the true condition of affairs before too late, as China is breaking up, its future lying with nations who understand what to do.

TANABE JITSUMI, aged 55, of 22, Sogakicho, Honjoku, who had filled the offices of Superintendent of the Agumabashi Police Station, and headman of the district, has been arrested on suspicion of obtaining yen 2,000 by false pretences from one Saito. His brother, Tanabe Katsuji, has also been apprehended for complicity in the alleged offence.

THE fire which occurred near the English Legation on the 2nd and appeared at one time likely to extend to the Legation buildings, and the Emperor despatched a message to the British Minister expressing sympathy with him in the worry and inconvenience resulting. Sir Ernest Satow expressed his thanks through the Minister of the Imperial Household.

REV M. CHRISTLIEB, who is leaving Japan on the 16th, for Germany, was given a farewell dinner on the 4th at Fujimiken, Tokyo. Over 100 foreign and Japanese gentlemen were present. Prof. Clay McCauley and Mr. Miwami delivered speeches eulogising Dr. Christlieb's work in Japan and his profound insight into Japanese character.

HERR VON BÜLOW, German Foreign Minister, in a speech in the Reichstag, stated that, unless the culprits who perpetrated outrages upon Germans at Tientsin are severely punished, or if such outrages be repeated, China would incur grave consequences. Referring to the Anglo-German Agreement, the speaker said that it deals rather with future contingencies than actualities.

MR. OTANI KANREI will attend the Philadelphia Commercial Conference to be held in October next as representing the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce. The Agricultural Department thinks it advisable to send as many representatives as possible from the Chambers of Commerce in Japan, and Mr. Kiuchi, Director of the Commercial and Industrial Bureau, will visit every Chamber on his way back from Kiushu to impress this on the officials.

THE Japanese 30 knot t.b.d. Yūgiri (Evening Mist) was successfully launched from the yard of Messrs. John I. Thornycroft and Co., of Chiswick, on 26th January, by Admiral Matsunaga, accompanied by Captain Kondo and Captain Kurabe, and other Japanese officers. This is the third of the six vessels being built by Messrs. John I. Thornycroft and Co. for the Japanese Government, and, with the exception of the armament, is similar to the numerous vessels launched from this yard for the British and foreign navies.

CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Saturday, March 4.

The Special Committee of the House of Representatives on March 3rd presented its report on the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure. The two points of prominent importance in connexion with this question are the abolition of the mise au secret and the concession of counsel to a person undergoing preliminary examination. As our readers are aware, the mise au secret was nominally abolished by the Government's original Bill; but only nominally, for the misshitsu, or secret cell, was replaced by a "segregated cell," where a suspect could be placed in solitary confinement at the discretion of the judge. The Government Delegate, in explaining the difference between the two systems, emphatically denied, more than once, that the segregated cell was intended for purposes of solitary confinement, and alleged that its object was merely to separate a person not yet committed for trial from persons already committed. But, inasmuch as the amended Article indicated that the segregated cell was to be used "when the Judge considered it necessary for the purpose of eliciting the truth," there could be no doubt that the intention was to invest the Judge with power to order a prisoner into separate confinement during the preliminary examination, and to keep him there until his reluctance to make incriminating admissions had been overcome. The Peers showed their appreciation of that point by eliminating the words "for the purpose of eliciting the truth," but they declined to adopt the recommendation of the minority of their Special Committee, namely, that the system of separate confinement during the preliminary examination should be abolished altogether. The Special Committee of the Representatives took the same view. They recommended the adoption of the Article as modified by the Peers, and the House endorsed the recommendation. There is therefore no hope of the complete abolition of this objectionable feature of Japanese criminal procedure, for the present at all events. But with regard to the second, and more important, point, namely, granting the assistance of counsel to an accused person at the preliminary examination, the Representatives showed themselves far more enlightened than the Peers; for not only did their Special Committee, with practical unanimity, report in favour of the privilege, but also no voice was raised against it in the House except that of the Minister of State for Justice. The next step, therefore, will be a Conference of the Houses, and if the Representatives stand firm, the credit will belong to them of having effected a radical reform of the country's criminal procedure.

The Minister of State for Justice, opposing the recommendations of the Lower House's Committee, made a speech which strikes us as singularly inconsequential. He admitted that the rights of the individual would be better protected by allowing an accused person to have the benefit of counsel at the preliminary examination, but he claimed that the interests of society must also be considered. What did that mean? The intention must have been to suggest that the detection and punishment of crime would be rendered more difficult by the intervention of barristers. If such a proposition can be established, barristers ought to be abolished altogether. But the Minister further alleged that the criminal procedure of a State must be adapted to the moral condition of the nation. What did that mean? It must have meant that the Japanese people are not yet sufficiently civilized to adopt the most enlightened form of criminal procedure. Yet, in the same speech, the Minister asserted that the criminal procedure of Japan is based on that of France. We do not think that there is lack of civilization in France. As a matter of fact, France herself has already modified her criminal procedure in the very sense recommended by the Committee of the Representatives. But the Minister also said that the Government contemplated very extensive amendments of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and expected to present a Bill embodying them to the Diet next session. What did that mean? If it had any bearing at all on the question under discussion, it must have meant that the Government expected the country to be sufficiently civilized for the proposed change next December, though it is not sufficiently civilized this March. We have been attentive observers of Japan's doings for over thirty years, and this is the very first instance on record where the Government deliberately places itself in an unenlightened and illogical position vis-à-vis the nation.

Monday, March 6.

We certainly did much wrong to the Minister of Justice in our last issue, when we accused him of delivering an illogical, illiberal, and un consequential speech in the Lower House, with reference to the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Our comments were based on the brief résumé of the speech that reached us on the day of its delivery. A more misleading résumé could scarcely have been compiled. We have now translated the Minister's speech verbatim from the stenographic record, and our readers will see that it is not open to adverse criticism. His Excellency's position is prudent and rational. He does not oppose the principle of the proposed amendment—namely, permitting accused persons to have the aid of counsel in preliminary examinations—but he contends that as such a change signifies the abolition of the secret examination, and therefore displaces the whole basis of the yoshin procedure in Japan, the law must be revised in every part, so that the altered system may work smoothly. In short, he maintains that merely to amend or supplement one article, without subjecting the rest to corresponding revision, is an impractical and perilous way of dealing with Codes of law. The Government itself is desirous of making the indicated reform, but has not yet been able to complete the correlated modifications. The Minister's views differ in one respect, however, from those of the Representatives. He is inclined to impose some limitations on the employment of counsel, being convinced that, without limitations, the intrusion of barristers will tend to complicate and prolong the preliminary proceedings. He may be right in that forecast, but we do not think that there can be the least doubt as to how the balance of advantage sways.

Thursday, March 9.

The result of the Conference between the two Houses of the Diet with regard to the Code of Criminal Procedure is that the amendments of the Representatives have been abandoned, and counsel are not to be allowed in preliminary examinations. When this decision was announced to the Representatives, they endorsed it without a murmur, though, at the time of debating the original Bill, they had unanimously voted for the granting of counsel. Their acquiescence was prudent, for, had they insisted on their own amendments, the Bill must have been wrecked altogether, which would have been a very unfortunate result in view of the other reforms that it embodies. It is probable, too, that, from the outset, the Representatives were not very sanguine of carrying their point this session. They understood that, in order to introduce such a radical change of procedure, extensive alterations and careful revision of the whole Code would be advisable, and they were content to place on record an emphatic declaration of their opinion that the system of secret examination should be abandoned. The reform is only deferred. Its ultimate consummation is now quite certain.

ALLOWANCES OF THE MEMBERS OF THE DIET.

Wednesday, March 8.

A curious feature of the measure for increasing the emoluments of members of the Diet is that a number of those who originally appended their signatures to the Bill, voted against it when it came before the House. Possibly our readers remember that, about six weeks ago, when this question first came upon the tapis, vernacular newspapers announced that the project would certainly be carried, inasmuch as it had obtained the written endorsement of 240 members of the Lower House. Yet the ballot taken on the 6th instant showed only 134 "ayes" and 125 "noes;" a narrow majority of 9. In fact, the Progressists changed their attitude at the eleventh hour. This incident has given rise to some very bitter comments. The belated opponents of the measure are accused of having behaved with hypocrisy. They wanted the Bill to pass, and they knew that it would pass, so they attempted to make capital for themselves by posing as virtuous and disinterested servants of the State. Thirty-three names of members who thus veered round are published by Tokyo papers, and it is said that the list could be greatly enlarged. The question now is, what will these objectors do about accepting the increased allowance, supposing that the Bill passes the Upper House and becomes law? As originally drafted by the Government, the measure left no choice to a member: he had to take the money whether he wished or did not wish. But the Special Committee, doubtless having regard to the unexpected conjuncture which had arisen, erased the negative from that particular clause, and craftily created a right of choice. Will the members who cast blue ballots assert their consistency by declining to receive the additional 1,200 yen tendered by the Treasury? If they do not decline, they will expose themselves to a great deal of criticism. If they do decline, and if to decline becomes the rule of the Progressist Party, the latter will find itself terribly handicapped, for to be returned in Liberal interests will then bring 1,200 yen a year more than to be returned in Progressist interests. We think that the Progressists would have been more astute had they decided to figure as children of this world rather than as children of light, but if they act up to their professed principles in this matter, they will deserve and obtain great honour.

As to the question itself, the only point deserving consideration seems to be the seasonableness of the measure. There are great differences of opinion in Europe about the wisdom or unwisdom of giving salaries to members of Parliament, but Japan made up her mind on that point ten years ago. She decided in favour of salaries, and so soon as the main proposition that salaries are necessary is granted, there should not be any difficulty in conceding the corollary that they ought to be sufficient salaries. Two thousand yen a year is the Japanese Government's estimate of a sufficient salary. We presume that it is a fair estimate. But the time for making the change appears to be very badly chosen. That can scarcely be denied.

Thursday, March 9.

On Wednesday the Bill for amending the Law of the Houses, in the sense of increasing the allowances of the members, came up for discussion in the Peers. The Special Committee reported unfavourably, the chief reason assigned being that the present time is unsuitable for such a change, in view of the pending augmentation of the taxes and the heavy weight of the people's burdens. On the other side it was urged that a fair day's work merits a fair day's pay: that although the titled nobles sitting in the Upper House may not have any need of increased emoluments, the case is very different with the Imperial nominees, who are generally poor men, depending chiefly on their salaries for means of sustenance; and finally that in order to enable the Sovereign to select suitable nominees from all classes of the people, the emoluments must be sufficient to support a man in comfort. An unsigned ballot produced 119 in favour of the measure and 100 against it, so that the advocates of increase have won the day. It was expected that if the Peers passed the Bill they would restore the provision depriving a member of the right of choice as to accepting the increase, but no such step was taken.

HOUSE OF PEERS AND THE PILOTS LAW.

The House of Peers, in dealing with the project of Pilots Law submitted by the Government, has added a clause restricting to Japanese subjects the right to practise this profession. Such action on the part of the Diet had been anticipated. There is obvious and sound reason for a restriction of some kind. A State can not prudently allow persons of alien nationalities to acquire competence which endows them with highly dangerous potentialities in the event of war. This is especially true in the case of a country where a body of water like the Inland Sea exists. The Inland Sea is practically safe against the inroads of foreign war-vessels so long as they can not procure pilots. One method of guarding against the danger would have been to require every pilot of foreign nationality to give an engagement, as a condition of receiving a certificate, that under no circumstances should his services be placed at the disposal of an enemy of Japan. But the value of such an engagement would be very problematical. The Japanese can not be expected to forget that of the two Americans who came eastward in 1894 for the purpose of selling to the Chinese an invention which would, they alleged, destroy the Japanese fleet, and who, having been arrested in Japan, were released on giving a pledge not to take any part in the war—of these two one only kept his word, the other joining the Chinese and ultimately figuring among the prisoners at Wei-hai-wai. He was not recognised by his captors, or perhaps they did not want to recognise him, but he demonstrated the valuelessness of pledges when subjected to the test of war. The only thoroughly trustworthy method of averting all dangerous contingencies is to confine the practice of the profession to Japanese subjects. The restriction looks illiberal, but we can not justly complain of it. What is to be done, however, about the foreigners who have already received licenses, and are practising as pilots? There can not be any idea of interfering with them, we presume. Indeed, we see no cause for uneasiness on that score, for the provisions of the new Law are applicable only to the granting of licenses after it goes into operation: it can not have retrospective force. Nevertheless as it declares distinctly that only Japanese subjects can engage in the profession of pilotage, the House of Peers might have been better advised had they supplemented their amendment by a provision in the sense that persons already duly licensed would remain beyond the purview of the restriction. The famous "métier" of the French Revised Treaty will probably be cited by some critics as invalidating the action taken by the Peers. The British Treaty secures for foreigners the privilege of manufacturing and trading in all goods of lawful commerce, and the French Treaty adds the right of practising any métier. Dr. Lönholm says that the meaning of the word métier in the latter Treaty is "handicraft or mechanical occupation." That is also the primary signification of the term according to Littré:—Exercice d'un art mécanique. The same authority, however, in his sixth definition of the word, says:—Par extension, profession quelconque. A great deal of capital was made, some time ago, out of the fact that this sixth definition is given by the eminent lexicographer, and we, as well as Dr. Lönholm, were freely charged with dishonesty and all kinds of moral obliquity, because we took the primary meaning instead of the sixth. The framers of the Treaty know what they meant, and are at hand to assert their interpretation.

THE DIET AND RELIGION.

If the near approach of the era of mixed residence has caused some trepidation in Japanese commercial and industrial circles, the prospect seems to be viewed with even more apprehension in the sphere of religion. So greatly, indeed, do the believers in Shinto shrink from the collision with Christianity which they seem to expect as an immediate consequence of the opening of the country, that they want to be allowed to step out of the arena altogether, abandoning their claim to be regarded as the representatives of a religious creed, and preferring to be called professors of a mere cult—a cult which confines itself to the management of rites and ceremonies. That is plainly the object of the agitation recently fomented by the leaders of Shinto. Their ambition is to cease to be a "church" and to become a bureau of rites, covered by the Government's ægis and secured against the storms of religious controversy. The Buddhists are working on different lines, though it is plain that they also feel very uneasy. They want to have Buddhism recognised as the State religion of Japan. But they are too subtle to present their wishes in the form of an ordinary aspiration. Their plan is to claim that their religion is in very truth the State creed of Japan, that it has always been recognised as such, and that the onus of disproving its title rests on its enemies. Such is the obvious import of a Representation now awaiting discussion in the Lower House. It relates to the appointment of religious teachers in jails, and is, of course, connected with the celebrated Sugamo incident, about which the Buddhists raised such a commotion. The Prison Regulations now in force give no indication as to the creed of the persons employed as religious instructors (shōkashi) in jails. They leave that point entirely unsettled. Thus, when the Governor of the Sugamo Prison appointed a Christian pastor, he was strictly within his rights, whatever may be said of his discretion. The Representation proposes that in future the persons appointed to give religious instruction in jails shall be professors of the State religion. Such is the rule always obeyed in Western countries, say the drafters of the document, and such ought to be the rule in Japan also. Now there is no State religion in Japan. Certainly Buddhism cannot assert any valid title to the epithet, for whatever its status may have been under the Tokugawa Regents, it was emphatically disestablished at the Restoration. But if the proposed alteration were made in the Prison Regulations, it would amount to an official declaration that there is a State religion, and the Buddhists might then fairly assert that the definition applies to their creed and to no other, especially since, as we have seen, the professors of Shinto are willing to be erased from the roll of religions rather than to fight for their place on it.

HIGH SCHOOLS IN JAPAN.

A very clever case has been made out from educational statistics bearing on the progress of higher education in Japan. When Viscount Mori was Minister of Education ten years ago, he planned and organized Five High Schools (Kōtō-gakko), and since that time only one has been added to the number, namely, the Yamaguchi High School. Under such circumstances it is not surprising to find that while the Middle Schools and the students attending them have increased rapidly during recent years, the record for the High Schools has remained, at best, stationary. The following figures are striking:—

	1899.	1898.	1897.	1896.	1895.
Number of Middle Schools.....	58	65	73	79	126
Public.....	15	16	18	21	107
Private.....	43	49	55	58	119
Total Middle Schools.....	73	84	95	100	125
Students attending Middle Schools.....	19,917	22,331	20,679	20,577	52,442
Number of Upper Schools.....	1	1	1	1	1
Students attending Upper Schools.....	4,483	4,304	4,285	4,231	4,426

It may easily be conjectured that great numbers of students have to stop their education half-way on account of the impossibility of obtaining admission to the High Schools. Thus, in 1897, the number of applicants for admission was 2,923, and the number admitted was only 1,358, or 45.87 per cent. The case is not much better at the University. It has to turn back a large number of applicants every year, though the figures are not so striking as those relating to the High Schools, for the obvious reason that the want of accommodation at the latter serves as a kind of barrier to the crowd of students who, could they enter the High Schools and graduate there, would pass on to the University. An obvious remedy for this unhappy state of affairs is to remove the restrictions which now operate to drive private enterprise from the educational field. If the status of a high school received official recognition without regard to the nature of the religious instruction included in the curriculum, the number of such institutions would soon cease to be only six. Japan is pursuing a suicidal policy in this matter.

We may mention in this context that the establishment of a new High School is contemplated in Hayama Prefecture. The people have agreed to contribute 100,000 yen and twenty thousand tsubo (about 17 acres) of land, and the Government has promised, conditionally, of course, on the Diet's consent, to defray the remaining cost, namely 109,328 yen. A Supplementary Budget in that sense has been submitted to the Lower House, and we learn from it that the work is to take two years; that expenditure during the first year will 20,000 yen, and the Treasury will not be required to contribute anything until the fiscal year 1900-1.

THE COURT OF CASSATION AND THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Monday, March 6.

The first step taken by the Court of Cassation, sitting in full conclave, is unfavourable to the Dreyfus cause, as will be seen by our telegraphic news this morning. Picquart was cited before the Correctional Police last October, on a charge of having communicated to a third party (Boullot) secret military documents. The police tribunal declared that, his case being intimately connected with that of Dreyfus, then about to be revised, its hearing must be deferred. General Zurlinden thereupon placed Picquart in confinement and appointed a court martial to try him on December 12th. But Picquart applied to the Court of Cassation for a ruling, and the Criminal Chamber of the Court demanded that the Picquart portfolio be placed in its possession. That meant an indefinite postponement of the court martial, and it was generally believed that the postponement would last until after the revision of the Dreyfus case. But the full Court of Cassation has evidently decided to depart from the procedure followed by the Criminal Chamber, and Picquart will now have to appear before the court martial. This incident will, of course, be regarded as a check to the Dreyfusites.

Thursday, March 9.

So many letters have reached us with reference to our recent remarks on the Dreyfus case that we are led to suspect the foreign community of being almost as much excited over this strange business as the folks at home. We perceive, also, that our own position in the matter is misunderstood. It appears to be thought that we firmly believe Dreyfus guilty; that we accuse the Jews of being mainly responsible for the complications which have ensued; that we blame them for the stand they have made, and even that we sympathise with the persecutions to which they are subjected. No description of our views could be more incorrect. Nothing seems to us to disgrace the nineteenth century more than the recrudescence of racial antipathies which its closing years witness. In our mental vista the Jew is as good as the Christian. If Continental Europe, to its shame, turns its back on him, we are proud to think that he will always find a welcome in England, and that England will benefit largely by his presence. For the part he has played in the Dreyfus drama, we have only praise, so far as he has been instigated by impulses of justice and fair play. But it is idle to pretend that the Jews are in no sense responsible for the prejudice which has been developed against them in France, in Germany, and in Russia. There is something in their method of life or their manner of doing business that provokes the hostility of the peoples among whom they sojourn. It may be their exclusiveness, it may be the peculiar aptitudes which harsh restrictions have developed in them; but whatever it be, the folks whom it revolts are not swayed by the vertigo of racial prejudice only. These things must be taken into account when we attempt to cast up the rights and wrongs of the singular struggle now convulsing French society; a struggle which, for aught we know, may be destined to leave an indelible mark on the history of Europe. The Jews did not make their début upon the Dreyfus stage after his trial and conviction only. They were dragged upon it even before his arraignment by that curse of modern times, the journalistic agitator. Rochefort, Drumont, and the crowd of sufferers from hysterical epidemic whom they lead sought, from the very outset, to inflame popular passion against Dreyfus because he was a Jew. In justice, therefore, we must admit that the Jews did not strike the first blow. But in justice also we must try to place ourselves in the position of the average Frenchman, and to estimate the aspect which this affair presents to him. When we do so, we are confronted at once by the cold fact that every person who has had an opportunity of examining the whole of the evidence against Dreyfus has pronounced him guilty. There has been no exception. Picquart is not an exception. Picquart's knowledge did not extend beyond the three documents produced by Cavaignac in the Chamber of Deputies. Every man who has had access to the whole of the evidence has declared that no doubt could be entertained of Dreyfus' guilt. That is what the average Frenchman sees. Nothing can obscure that fact. In his eyes the question is between a verdict pronounced by a tribunal of officers and endorsed by five Ministers of War, and a theory advanced by men who have not seen the proofs, and supported largely by the funds of aliens whom he has learned to dislike and distrust. It is the fashion at present to raise hands of horror over France's action in this Dreyfus affair; to picture her as inundated by a wave of hysterical passion which has swept away all the landmarks of justice. Yet thousands upon thousands of Frenchmen in every rank of life have sacrificed fame and fortune in the cause of right, as they discern it, and are insisting upon a revision of the Dreyfus sentence. Even those foreign onlookers who have persuaded themselves to think that French soldiers, French Ministers of State, French deputies, and French private gentlemen are either so indifferent to justice or so blinded by prejudice as to have lent themselves deliberately to the perpetration of a most inhuman crime, even such persons must admit that there is a noble side to this drama, and that, if it is to become a tragedy, it will have its martyrs as well as its malefactors. To us it seems that a large section of the foreign public who have convinced themselves of Dreyfus' innocence without seeing the proofs of his guilt, and of France's military, ministerial, and magisterial degradation without balancing the motives that influence her or the circumstances that aggravate them, are not many degrers removed from the prejudice which they condemn so loudly.

PRISONS.

Statements are published by vernacular newspapers interested in disturbing the entente between the Government and the Liberals, to the effect that the latter are indignant because the former postponed the transfer of the Prison Expenditures from the Communes to the Treasury. That is interesting. It has been well understood and clearly stated for a considerable time that, under any circumstances, the condition of the finances did not permit the carrying out of this much-needed reform until next year. In the decennial programme of finance submitted to the Diet, on the basis of a Land-Tax of 4 per cent., it was shown that, from the fiscal year 1900-01, the Treasury would have incurred a charge of 5,077,322 yen on account of the prisons, from which outlay had to be deducted the earnings of the prisoners, namely, 1,038,500 yen, the net addition to the Treasury's burdens thus being 4,038,822 yen. But in consequence of the Land Tax being reduced to 3.5 per cent., the Government's programme was dislocated, and the prison question was shelved. If the Liberals were so anxious to see this reform effected, why did they vote against it again and again in former years? The story of the prisons is not at all creditable to Japanese party politicians. Originally the Government handed over the prisons to the Communes under pressure of necessity,—the necessity of accumulating a specie reserve for the resumption of hard-money payments. That object having been successfully accomplished, the Diet, when it assembled in 1891, found a large surplus in the Treasury and a flourishing financial condition, the revenues of the State being always in excess of its expenditures. One of the very first proposals made by the Government to the newly assembled House of Representatives was that it should consent to the re-transfer of the prisons to the central administration. But the majority of the members had committed themselves to a promise, as a means of conciliating the constituencies, that they would insist on a reduction of the Land Tax when they confronted officialdom in Tokyo. So they rejected the Government's proposal with regard to the prisons, and even pretended that it was a device, on the one hand, to shelve the Land Tax question by absorbing the available surplus; and, on the other, a manoeuvre to placate the communes by relieving them of the comparatively small prison expenses, though making no reduction of the heavy burden of the Land Tax. Again, when Count Inouye last spring formulated a scheme of finance providing for the immediate transfer of the prisons to the Government, the two political parties combined to defeat the reform by opposing the increased taxation necessary to effect it. Finally, when the present Government planned to raise the rate of the Land Tax from 2½ to 4 per cent., thus obtaining an additional revenue which would have justified the Treasury's assumption of the prison outlays from next year, the Liberals once more interfered on behalf of the tax-payer, and by reducing the rate to 3½ per cent., and insisting, at the same time, on re-assessment which involved a further loss of 3½ millions of revenue, necessitated a postponement of the reform. Yet now these same Liberals have introduced and passed a Bill for effecting the reform which they so often prevented in the past, and they quietly leave the Treasury to find means of defraying the 4 millions involved in the change. What is the meaning of their volte-face? Confronted by the record here set down, it is impossible to suppose that the Liberals care anything about prison reform as compared with the tax-payer's goodwill. They have persistently sacrificed the former on the altar of the latter, and plainly what they want now is to be able to say to the constituencies:—"It is true that we have agreed to increase the Land Tax by 12 millions of yen for a term of five years, but, on the other hand, we have insisted on re-assessment, which means a reduction of the burden by 3½ millions, and we have further insisted on the transfer of the prison expenditures to the Treasury's charges, which means a diminution of the communal burdens by over 4 millions, so that the net increase of your payments is only 4½ millions. Moreover, after the conclusion of the period of 5 years, you will find that your sum of taxation is actually 7½ millions less than it was before we consented to a temporary increase. In short, by paying 4½ millions for 5 years, you are purchasing permanent immunity thereafter to the extent of 7½ millions." We do not detect a genuine desire for prison reform among these manoeuvres. They may be good as party tactics, but they are not suggestive of any sincere spirit of progress.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

The staff of the Industrial Bank seem to have been visited by the same vertigo that recently overtook the staff of the Bank of Japan. Several of them have resigned en masse, and to make the analogy perfect, the cause of their discontent is said to be some purely sentimental grievance against the President, Mr. Kawashima. There are also rumours that whereas the object of the Government in establishing the Bank was to provide cheap capital for manufacturing enterprise, persons seeking accommodation have been obliged to devote from 2 to 5 per cent. of the amount to what is euphemistically termed undo ho, or "movement expenses." We mention that for what it may be worth—not a great deal, we imagine—and as to its bearing upon the resignations, we can not pretend to offer any explanation.

NATIONALIZATION OF RAILWAYS

The Commission appointed to consider the question of nationalizing the principal private railways has resorted to the practical course of appointing a committee to conduct preliminary investigations. Any attempt to do business with such an unwieldy number as that of the Commission itself, must have been futile. The Committee includes the names of Mr. Sakatani and Baron Tajiri of the Finance Department, Mr. Matsunoto of the Railway Bureau, and Lieut-General Baron Oseko. These representatives of officialdom are all men of acknowledged ability, and any recommendation endorsed by them will command public confidence. The president of the Commission is Viscount Yoshikawa, Minister of State for Communications. In addressing the Commission at its first meeting, His Excellency made some interesting statements. He said that, owing to the extraordinary rise which had taken place in the cost of labour and materials since the programme of first-period railways was drawn up, the Government's estimates had been completely dislocated, so that the figure—68 millions—originally set down for these lines would probably be doubled before their completion. That is a very serious consideration. There is not, at present, the slightest prospect of the Government's being able to find a market at home for its Public Undertakings Loan and Railway Bonds. Recourse must be had to foreign capitalists, and, if circumstances have so greatly affected the estimates in the matter of railways, the same must be true with regard to the building of barracks, the construction of forts and dockyards, and the making of arsenals. Japan can well afford to contract a substantial foreign loan, but it is to be hoped that she will set about it in a substantial manner.

The second interesting statement made by Viscount Yoshikawa was that the Government, in drawing up plans for the construction of railways and laws for their control, had always proceeded on the principle that the whole system of lines throughout the country would ultimately come into the possession of the State. That is a much more definite interpretation of the Railway Law than the public in general would have been disposed to put upon it. The Law does certainly reserve to the Government the right of buying up the private lines within a period of 25 years from the date of granting their charters, at a price determined by capitalizing the average market value of their shares during the three years preceding the transaction. But the mere reservation of such a right differs essentially from its actual exercise. From one point of view it is desirable that several of the lines now in private hands should be transferred to the State, for their owners show no disposition to keep them in proper repair or to spend money on improvements. But the railways already under official control are run on the essentially faulty principle that a profit should be derived from them for the purpose of general revenue. The State has no right to manage these lines with the object of obtaining a surplus, unless the surplus is applied to building new roads or increasing the facilities offered by those already built. A net profit of about 5 million yen annually accrues to the Treasury at present from the State Railways, yet not only are the conveniences of travel exactly what they were twenty-five years ago, but fresh loans are raised for every additional mile constructed. The same remark applies to the Post and Telegraph Services. Japanese publicists gravely inform us that the Department of Communications has no funds to employ good and trustworthy letter-carriers and telegraph-clerks, and, that, being thus obliged to rely on the dregs of the population, the officials can not fairly be held responsible for delays in delivery or other defects of administration. Yet the Posts and Telegraphs transfer to the hands of the Treasury every year a sum of nearly 3 million yen net profit, and the Government, with the consent of the Diet, has just raised the rates so as to obtain an additional revenue of 1½ millions. In the face of such facts, it is a strange contradiction to speak of insufficient funds. "Misapplication of funds" seems a more appropriate term. Were the Communications Department free to employ the profits of the posts and telegraphs on purposes connected with the improvement of the services, there would be few causes of complaint, whereas there are now a great many. The gross earnings of the posts and telegraphs for 1893-1900 are estimated at 16,879,837 yen, and the gross expenditures at 14,027,430 yen. The difference—2,852,407 yen—is thus more than 20 per cent. of the expenditures, and there can be no doubt that it would amply suffice to place the two services on a thoroughly sound footing. In short, under the heading of railways, posts, and telegraphs, the State is earning a net profit of 8 million yen annually—it will be more than 10 millions when the increased rates are imposed—not a sen of which should be carried over to the general revenue while new railways remain to be built, and while the posts and telegraphs continue to call for improvement. If the true principles of the economy of communications were applied in Japan, every one would rejoice to see the private railways transferred to the State, for, though official methods of conducting business are always costly, that objection does not weigh for a moment against the incomparably greater advantage of having the people's money devoted to the interests of the people at large instead of going into the pockets of a few monopolists.

LOANS OF THE BANK OF JAPAN.

It is stated, as an evidence of increasing ease in the money market, that the Bank of Japan's loans are being rapidly discharged. They amounted to 81 million yen at the beginning of the year, but have now fallen to 56 millions. No less than 4 millions were returned on the 3rd instant. The issue of convertible notes is now 8½ million yen below the legal limit (80 millions). This state of affairs is attributed mainly to the fact that the balance of trade has been restored since the commencement of the year. During January and February exports exceeded imports by 7,800,000 yen, and there was a considerable inflow of specie. In February, the excess of exports—at Yokohama and Kobe—was 4,221,704 yen, and the excess of specie imported was 127,689 yen.

JAPANESE PUBLIC OPINION ON ITALY'S DOINGS.

The concentrated essence of the Tokyo press' comments on Italy's San-moon departure is that Japan should go and do likewise. We admit that such a version of our contemporaries' theses is rather blunt; but it is correct. Undoubtedly they all speak—some in very admirable terms—of the neighbourly duty that they owe to their ancient friend, the paragon of the East, and there is no difficulty in crediting them with a sincere desire to keep China on her feet, if that were possible. But they recognise that it is quite impossible, and, being practical folks, they abandon the fruitless occupation of crying for the moon, and are now chiefly solicitous lest their country, restrained by qualms of conscience, should allow herself to be excluded from a scramble which offers such rich prizes. There can be no second opinion about the wisdom of this attitude. Japan was shouldered out of Liaotung by a conspiracy which will stand in the pages of history as one of the most solemn specimens of international chicanery ever perpetrated. Territory which she had fairly won by the sword was taken from her on the plea that its alienation from China would be dangerous to the latter's integrity, and then the chief of her despoilers deliberately stepped in and annexed the same territory for itself. Liaotung has at least taught Japan what to expect. She knows now, or ought to know, that any ace scored to her credit in this game of grab must be played with her own cards. Perhaps she hesitates to take a hand because she hopes that the dimensions of the gamble may still be limited. Vain hope, in truth. If Italy joins in without having any stake whatever in the pool, Japan may fairly claim to be the croupier. Italy? Why, her appearance on the scene reduces the whole thing to a farce. By-and-by we shall perhaps get accustomed to think of her seriously as a claimant, but at present we can only regard her procedure as an example of the well-known metaphysical phenomenon that the human mind, by familiarizing itself with the thought of a crime, can succeed in mistaking it for a virtue. The Italian statesman who conceived the notion of acquiring a naval station and a province in China, doubtless laughed at the comicality of the phantasy when it first flashed across his mind. But when it next visited him, it looked less grotesque, and at last it came in the guise of an old friend with a prescriptive right to tender treatment. The world has not enjoyed a similar opportunity of accustoming itself to this wonderful coup, and may therefore be excused if its astonishment is breathless. But Japan should thank the statesmen in Rome for helping to elucidate the situation. Perhaps she will now awake, and abandon the policy which her littérati cleverly describe as "stolen rest" (tsan saku).

FOREIGN EMPLOYEES AT THE IRON FOUNDRY.

Fourteen foreigners are to be employed at the Iron Foundry. Their engagements are to be for two years. Two will receive annual salaries of ten thousand yen each, and the remaining twelve will have 4,000 yen a year; and all will be handed a sum of 3,000 yen each at the termination of their engagements.

GERMANY IN CHINA.

It is alleged that the reference made recently in the German Reichstag, by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to "outrages upon Germans in Tientsin" has for its explanation a fracas which occurred on the night of February 24th. Four Germans entered the walled city in jinrikisha to witness the festival of lanterns, and, in making their way through the crowd, were roughly handled. One of the jinrikisha was overturned, but neither its inmate nor his three companions suffered any serious injury. We have no information of our own on the subject, but it appears to us scarcely credible that the above version can be correct. The streets in the walled city of Tientsin are incredibly narrow. At all times, even in broad daylight during rain, when the traffic is comparatively small, few persons ever think of driving there in jinrikisha. The writer of this note has passed through frequently, and has always, as a matter of course, alighted from his jinrikisha and sent it round to meet him at some other point. If that is true of daylight, what shall be said of the night, especially a night of festival, when the streets are thronged with women and children? No one, unless he has actually visited the walled city of Tientsin, can conceive the extraordinary narrowness of the streets, and the multitudes that struggle through them when there is anything to summon the people from their houses. Canton is not to be spoken of in the same breath. If such conditions existed in any Western city, the streets would be permanently closed to wheel traffic. It is alleged that, in deference to the complaint of the German Consul, the Viceroy promised to punish the policeman on duty at the place where the disturbance occurred, but declared his inability to lay hands on the particular units of the seething mob among which the jinrikisha had become entangled. We certainly think that the policeman should be punished; not for failing to restrain the crowd, however, but for permitting any one to ride through the streets in jinrikisha. But we refrain from further comment lest the impression be created that we credit the story. We do not credit it. Our conviction is that had the incidents been such as we have here set down, the German Minister of Foreign Affairs could not possibly have deemed the matter worthy of parliamentary allusion.

PARENTAL OFFICIALDOM.

Some speculations have probably been caused by Mr. Taguchi's proposal—embodied in a Bill now lying before the Lower House—that when a private railway company has declared a dividend of 10 per cent. or upwards for three years consecutively, the Minister of State for Communications should be competent to order a reduction of the fares charged on the company's lines. Mr. Taguchi's reason for drafting such a Bill is that the private companies devote themselves solely to the acquisition of profit, and take no adequate concern for keeping their roads in good order, still less for improving them. There is a very general impression that the same criticism applies to most of the industrial undertakings carried on by Japanese. People say that the machinery is not properly kept, and that no reserve is set aside for depreciation.

We are disposed to think that such a comment does some injustice to the management of the industrial undertakings. Last spring, when the cotton-spinners complained of being crippled by want of working capital, the then Minister of Finance, Count Inouye, came to their rescue and assisted the Industrial Bank to provide them with funds, on condition that they complied strictly with certain regulations, one of which related to the provision of a suitable reserve against depreciation. It is to be presumed that the Bank adopts means of enforcing the regulations. It has power to do so. Recently a Tokyo Journal predicted that the Agricultural Bank would soon find itself confronted by a serious state of affairs, for several of the farms in Hukaido, to whose owners it had given accommodation, were practically exhausted owing to lack of fertilizers, and would have to be abandoned. A danger of that kind is on all fours with the imprudent policy attributed to many industrial concerns, but we can not believe that the Banks take no step to protect their interests against such obvious perils.

TELEGRAPH RATES.

It is possible that our readers may have been misled by our statement of the increased telegraph rates, for the frank truth is that one point in the new regulations defied our own comprehension without reference to expert explanation, which we had not time to seek before going to press. That point is the rule about the name and address of the sender. The Japanese regulation says that the name and address of the sender are charged, as a general rule, but that if written on what is termed the Yohaku (literally "remaining white space"), there is no charge. The simple fact is that if the sender wants to telegraph his name and address, he must write them into the body of the address, and pay for them as so many syllables. If he does not wish to have them telegraphed, he writes them in a separate place, merely for the information of the telegraph clerk. As for the name and address of the person to whom the message is sent, they are not charged for, unless there is more than one name, when the first only goes free. These are the rules applicable to Japanese telegrams. But the sender of a message in an European language is not so well treated. He has to pay for the name and address of the sendee. It is interesting to see how this "pans out." Here, for example, are two fairly illustrative sentences:—

Yokohama 75 A-ada
A-u-gu-en jinrikishu Tanaka = 13 syllables.
Cost 20 sen.
Yokohama 75 Jones.
Coming to morrow ten forenoon Robinson =
8 words. Cost 40 sen.
Kobe yamate 50 Hamada.
Dô kakeatte mo samô de tsukôchi = 16 syllables. Cost 25 sen.
Kobe Hill 50 Brown.
He will not consent on any terms = 11 words.
Cost 50 sen.

On the whole it will probably be found in practice that to telegraph in an European language over Japanese wires costs from 50 to 100 per cent. more than to telegraph in Japanese. Of course some additional charge is fair, but the difference seems too great.

WHAT WILL ITALY DO?

The present situation in the East is particularly interesting. China has refused Italy's application for a lease of San-moon, and Italy is waiting until she is in a position to convert her proposal into a demand. Perhaps it would have been better had she held her peace until she was ready to speak peremptorily, but the mischief is done now, and it only remains to be seen whether China will stand to her guns. The wrong is absolutely on Italy's side. Germany's action at Kiaochow had one redeeming feature, its magnificent indifference to international usages, and had also the pretext of a murdered missionary. But Italy's enterprise is frank brigandage. She wants something which does not belong to her; she asks for it; is refused, and then proceeds to take it by force. Five years ago, who could have seriously entertained the notion of Italy's essaying to seize and hold Chinese territory? It is the most striking coup we have hitherto had the pleasure of witnessing, and from a theatrical point of view the effect is fine, though in that respect the palm must of course be awarded to the pioneer act of piracy in Shantung. China is now fully forewarned. She knows precisely what is to be exacted, and she can accurately localize the pending stroke. Will she make preparations to resist? The alternative is to admit definitely that she has surrendered herself to the knife of the nations and will endure dissection without wincing. We predict that she will embrace the alternative. Unfortunate China. For centuries she has been placing her reliance upon time, and results have generally justified her confidence. But her old friend is now going back upon her. The longer she waits and the more patiently she takes her woes, the worse her plight becomes. Of late, too, she has found safety in the mutual jealousies and rivalries of her oppressors. But even that resource is failing. They are marshalling themselves into two camps for the purpose of cutting her up, and instead of manoeuvring to keep each others' hands off her altogether, their sole aim will henceforth be to divide her to the best advantage in their own interests.

REGISTRATION OF FOREIGNERS' RIGHTS OF PROPERTY.

There is now before the Diet a Bill relating to the registration of the rights of property acquired by foreigners within the Settlements. These rights have hitherto acquired validity against third parties by registration at the Consulates, and the question now arises, what arrangements shall be made for perpetuating their validity so that cognisance may be legally taken of it by Japanese tribunals? The Government evidently finds some difficulty in devising a system which shall fully meet the requirements of the case, and we can easily appreciate the nature of the puzzle when we remember the varied character of the procedure pursued at different Consulates. Instead, therefore, of attempting to draft a hastily elaborated measure, the Government wisely confines itself to asking parliamentary authority for the settlement of the matter by Imperial Ordinance hereafter.

THE EARTHQUAKE

The earthquake on the 7th instant belongs to the category of serious shocks. Our daily life in this country is perpetually disturbed by tremblings and shakings which become at last so familiar that we scarcely notice them. Yet not a few of these ugly visitors fall short of calamitous dimensions by only a narrow margin, and the unconcern with which we receive them is simply the result of habit. Apparently the centre of disturbance on the 7th instant was somewhere in the vicinity of Osaka. Such, at least, is the conclusion arrived at by the Meteorological Bureau, though the record of damage done suggests that Nagoya may share the honour. The time telegraphed from Nagoya is 9.45 a.m., and that telegraphed from Osaka, 9.56, but it is not possible to place much reliance on these figures. Nagoya city does not seem to have suffered. The damage occurred chiefly at Ono, Handa, and Chirin, where houses are said to have been overturned. Wakayama, also, was severely visited, houses and godowns being overthrown in the two districts of Nishi-mura and Higashi-mura. The most accurate accounts come from Osaka. There the direction of the shock was from south-east to north-west. At first vertical, the movement presently became horizontal, the latter phase, which lasted about two minutes, developing the maximum intensity. Apparently the only personal injuries were not directly due to the shock, but resulted from a panic among the employés at the Osaka Cotton-spinning Factory. In attempting to escape from an upper storey, several fell downstairs, and 28 were hurt, two severely. Fuller details may show, however, that the falling of chimneys and buildings was not unaccompanied by loss of life.

Considering the wide area through which the seismic disturbance on the 7th instant was felt, it is inferred that the origin of the force must have been at a point very deep below the surface. The great majority of the earthquakes experienced in this country are of distinctly limited scope. Thus, the statistics collected by the Seismological Bureau show that out of 2,670 shocks felt in 1891, only 8 were felt throughout an area of over 10,000 square miles. The great earthquake on the 28th of August in that year made itself perceptible throughout an area of 15,750 square miles, and the shock on the 7th of this month had a range of 15,000 square miles. The latter did not reach farther north than Yokohama: it was not felt at all in Tokyo.

A telegram received by the Home Department from Nara Prefecture gives details of the damage done by the earthquake:—

A strong shock was felt at 10 a.m. on the 7th. At T. Katsunuma twenty houses fell and two children were hurt in the ruins. At Sakurai, a man was crushed to death. Other damage is in course of investigation.

A telegram received subsequently says:—The result of investigation shows that three persons were killed and eleven injured, 67 houses destroyed, and 24 damaged. The mountains in Amanogawa Mura, Yoshino District, shook greatly and emitted a thunderous sound, and the ground opened in parts, landslides occurring here and there. Roads westward of Hirase have been broken away in places.

Ten workers in the Tenwa mine were buried alive, but were dug out safely.

THE LAST DAY OF THE DIET.

The two Houses of the Diet discharged a mass of business on Thursday, the closing day of the session. The Peers sat from 10 a.m. to 11.05 p.m., and the Representatives from 1 p.m. to 10.15 p.m. We necessarily hold over our report of the proceedings, which, for the rest, were of little interest to foreigners. Perhaps the most important point was the passing of the Supplementary Budget for granting special subsidies to the European and American services of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Toyo Kisen Kaisha. It was expected that this measure would meet with opposition in the Upper House. More than one of the leading Tokyo journals had denounced it in strong though ill-considered language, and had endeavoured to raise a prejudice against it by alleging that its successful passage through the House of Representatives had cost a hundred and fifty thousand yen, and by challenging the Peers to reject it in the interests of parliamentary morality. These manoeuvres failed signally, however, for the Budget was voted without any hesitation or appreciable dissent.

ITALY IN CHINA.

THERE is no reason why Italy should not have colonial aspirations. She sends abroad every year a large number of able-bodied men who thenceforth become wealth-winners for foreign countries. The first business of every human unit on the face of the globe is to live. That people should go to foreign lands in search of the sustenance which they can not find at home is natural and proper, and that the land of their adoption, in return for granting them facilities to support life, should seek to derive a maximum of benefit from their labour, is also natural. If the story ended there, the greed of colonial expansion would scarcely become a passion. Men would make new homes for themselves wherever favourable opportunities offered; would preserve a warm corner in their hearts for the place of their nativity, and, in matters of buying and selling, would be, as far as possible, customers of "the old country." But Protection effectually mars the record. Protection compels a man to throw patriotism over-board when he embarks to seek his fortune abroad. Protection lays claim to everything that he earns, and penalizes every attempt he makes to contribute to the support of his own countrymen. The people of the United States are proud to think that they have never been carried away by the mania of territorial expansion; yet the people of the United States, by their protective policy, have contributed not a little to the spread of that mania. They have presented to the world an object-lesson not easy to misinterpret. A prominent factor of their growing greatness has been the absorption and monopolization of the surplus population of other nations. Millions of Italians, for example, have migrated to America. Under a free-trade system they might have opened in the land of their adoption a rich market for the land of their origin. Protection has put its veto on anything of the kind, and has thus gradually led Italy to think of colonies where her migratory sons may contribute to her strength instead of diminishing it. The analysis is not exhaustive, of course: other factors have to be included. But it may fairly be claimed that if countries like Italy and Germany had not seen the wall of protection raised between them and their overseas nationals, they would have remained comparatively beyond the contagion of the colonial epidemic. We have no right, then, to condemn Italy's aspirations, though at first sight it seems a little startling to find her taking part in the big drama of assassination upon which the curtain rose at Kiao-chou in 1897. Assassination is the only appropriate term. China is being deliberately and slowly assassinated. It has come to be simply a game of cut in who cut can. There was a pretence for Germany at Kiao-chou. There was a pretext for Russia at Port Arthur. There was a plea for England at Weihai-wei. But there is neither pretence, nor pretext, nor plea for Italy at San-moon: there is only an apology. If any of the ordinary canons of morality were applicable to international dealings, sermons innumerable might be preached on this text. But morality is out of date. The plain fact is that the arena of Western politics is being shifted to the Far East, and that the allies and rivals of Europe are providing for themselves new bases of union and antagonism in China. Any right or title of independent existence that belongs to the Middle Kingdom is a valueless quantity. China, as a living entity, does not count in the matter at all. She is simply a cake for every one to bite into. If diplomacy were omniscient we might credit it with having contrived in the Far East a situation necessitating alliances which are unmanageable in the West; for, though England has been able to stand aloof from the Dreibund in Europe, she certainly can not stand aloof from it in China. It is true that Austria has not yet entered the Oriental lists. But that is probably a question of time only. Interests can be created for Austria quite as readily as they have been created for Italy; and though it is a far cry from Vienna and Rome to Chili and Chekiang, it is a much farther cry from St. Petersburg to Liaotung if the Suez Canal be closed to the Russian flag. In short, events are now unfolding themselves in China exactly as they have marshalled themselves already in Europe, with this difference, that England has had to enter the circle of alliances and that the United States has come within arm's length of it. Our Tokyo contemporaries are disposed, we observe, to draw two conclusions: first, that England has abandoned the open-door policy; secondly, that she is herself contriving a violation of the pledge which she exacted from China with regard to the Yangtze Valley. Both of these views seem to us to be erroneous. That England has abandoned the idea of preserving China's integrity can scarcely be denied. But the open-door is a different matter. In encouraging Italy to enter the arena England merely provides another janitor. As to the Yangtze Valley, San-moon can not be called a part of it. Chekiang, however, is a Yangtze province. Perhaps some folks will say that in promising Italy that Chekiang shall not be alienated, China merely repeats, on a limited scale, the pledge already given by her to England. But if these quaint engagements which it has become the fashion to exact from China, confer a reversionary title on the Power to which they are given; if it is understood, for example, that when England obtains a promise from Peking that the Yangtze region shall not be voluntarily vivisected for the sake of any outsider, the promise includes a constructive pledge that, if vivisection ever does take place, it shall be in British favour, then indeed her alleged endorsement of the Italian proposal about Chekiang is a surrender of a portion of her own titles. We do not, for our own part, see how the affair can be otherwise interpreted, for it becomes a mere comedy to exact a public promise from a country that she will not surrender to any third party a particular section of her possessions, unless the promise implies an exception in favour of the Power to which it is made. Of course it implies such an exception. Of course the British nation considers that the Yangtze Valley has been solemnly placed within England's sphere of influence, and of course the British and Italian nations will fully understand that this arrangement about Chekiang indicates England's willingness to enter into partnership with Italy for the exploitation of the richest regions of the Chinese empire. Circumstances are much stronger than diplomacy or good intentions. England's hand is being gradually forced, and it is fortunate for her that she has taken care to be prepared for the new departure.

IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3RD.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

NEW BILLS.

The House met at 10 a.m., and, having read the four following Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House), handed them to Special Committees:

Bill for establishing a Movables Bank. With regard to this Bill the Government Delegate stated that the changes made by the Lower House could not be approved by the Government.

Bill relating to the rights of persons who have lost their nationality.

Bill for amending the portion of the Civil Code relating to foreign mortgages of land.

Bill for the better prevention of offences against the Tobacco Monopoly Law.

The Government Bill for regulating consular functions, under the conditions resulting from the operation of the Revised Treaties, having been endorsed by the Special Committee, with trifling amendments, was passed, and the House then (11.10 a.m.) went into secret session to continue the discussion of the Emperor's questions with regard to the amendment of the Peers Law. The doors were re-opened at 3 p.m. and the following measures were handed to Special Committees:—

REPRESENTATIONS

Representation urging that State Aid be given to the National Learning Association.

Representation for opening Itazaki in Hiroshima to foreign trade.

Representation urging that the branches of the Government Agricultural Experiment Station be abolished, and that the funds spent on them be handed over to the City and Prefecture Agricultural Stations, the main Government Station in Tokyo being, at the same time enlarged. The exposé of motives states that the effect of a few branch stations supported by the Government tends to retard rather than to encourage local efforts in the places where these stations exist, and that the better plan is to have only one main Government Station in Tokyo, leaving the local stations to rely on themselves solely.

The House, having dealt with 14 petitions rose at 3.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Nomura Goro said that although the Government had asked for speedy procedure in the case of the Bill relating to a Public Undertaking Loan in Formosa, the report of the Special Committee had not yet been presented, and the Chairman of the Committee had advanced an incomprehensible explanation of the delay. He thought that the Chairman should be invited to state the reasons clearly.

Mr. Nemoto Sei presented a Question with regard to the control of lepers and beggars. Did not the Government regard leprosy as a contagious disease, and if it did so regard it, why were no measures adopted for the segregation of lepers? As to beggars, they were left to their own devices in a manner which did little credit to the country's administration, and would certainly attract unfavourable attention when mixed residence was established.

The House having approved the amendments made by the Peers in the Bill for assessing and regulating lands in Okinawa Prefecture, and the Bill embodying a project of Pilotage Law, proceeded to consider the Government Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure.

AMENDING CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Mr. Seki Naohiko, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported the result of the Committee's deliberations on the Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure. He said:— "With regard to the purport of the amendments proposed by the Government, one is intended to abolish the mise au secret, which is a variety of torture (gomon no ishiki). Another is to extend the system of bail, so as to contrive that the privilege may be granted as freely as possible to persons undergoing trial in criminal cases. With regard, again, to the amendments introduced by the Upper House, one provides that a Court of Law must allot counsel for the defence of women, persons of tender years, or deaf mutes; another, that judgments in criminal cases shall embody a clear statement of the reasons upon which they are based. There are also excellent reforms. They have long been desired. Now that the Treaties have been happily revised and the era of mixed residence is about to be inaugurated, it would have been a very great disgrace to the country vis-à-vis foreigners had such bad and uncivilized systems of criminal procedure remained in operation, and while it is a matter for congratulation that the Government has been moved to introduce these reforms for the sake of the country's fair fame, we may reasonably ask why it was not done previously in deference to our own wishes. At all events, so far as the correction of such abuses is concerned, we have only to cooperate most willingly. The House of Peers, also, has shown itself an advocate of sound progress in this matter. The additional clauses introduced by it for the protection of women, minors, and persons afflicted with physical infirmities, and for the more lucid statement of judicial findings, are worthy of all praise. But as for us, we want something more. We want to have the privilege of employing counsel granted to persons undergoing preliminary examination. The denial of that privilege is the flaw in the bright jewel (hakuhaki no bisho); the one defect that mars the whole achievement. According to the present system, the preliminary examination of a person charged with crime is conducted in secret. The law, indeed, forbids the examining judge to employ either intimidation (kyō katsu) or deception (himan) in the procès verbal, but, as a matter of actual practice, these objectionable weapons are used with such freedom that the plight of the accused is often very pitiable. Frequently he is so flustered that he can not find words to say what he ought to say; so perturbed that he can not put forward proofs of the utmost importance to his case; placed in such a disadvantage by the superior acumen and the practised ability of his questioner that he involves himself in contradictions; so bewildered that he loses the power of defending himself, and is finally convicted of an offence which he never committed. If I do not dwell long upon these phases of the matter, it is not because I under-estimate them, but because language is inadequate to convey any clear idea of the abuses actually practised. (Hear, hear). Then when these painful preliminary stages have been passed, and the accused finally reaches the Court where his public trial is to take place, he finds judges few in number, overwhelmed with work, having scanty time at their disposal, and precluded by stress of business from giving exhaustive attention to his case. He applies for permission to call witnesses whose testimony his counsel considers cardinal but is probably met with a refusal from the Bench, and the upshot is that the judges, unable to find leisure for a really thorough sifting of the charge, fall back upon the indications furnished by the preliminary examination with all its defects and abuses. So fully have these things come to be appreciated, that in many of the provincial districts a barrister deems it hopeless to attempt the defence of an accused person, and declines the task. I am not speaking from hearsay. I am describing facts which have come under my own observation in the practice of my profession. Therefore it has seemed to your Committee, especially since the country is about to enter a new era of international intercourse, that the system of criminal procedure calls urgently for reform, and that, while gladly endorsing the Government's amendments, as well as those of the Peers, this House should insist upon adding an amendment of its own—namely, that the privilege of counsel be granted to persons undergoing preliminary examination, to the end that the accused may be able to do justice to his own case, to furnish evidence such as may lead to the elucidation of the truth, and to be secure from the abuses of intimidation or deception. This same amendment was advocated by the minority in the House of Peers, and we may therefore reasonably hope that, if our House adopts it unanimously, the Upper Chamber will not be unwilling to reconsider the question with the care and attention that it deserves.—(Cheers.)

The amendments proposed by the Committee took the form of additions to the 68th Article of the Code, and were as follows:—

Art. 68.—(add the following clauses):—

(a) The defendant is entitled to employ counsel at any time during the preliminary examination.

(b) The lawfully appointed representative of a defendant is entitled to select counsel.

(c) The Public Prosecutor or the counsel for the defence is entitled to apply to the judge, at any time during the preliminary examination, for permission to examine the record of evidence. Further, an extraordinary application in the above sense may be made if such a step be necessary.

Mr. Hanai—I am one of those that endorse the Committee's amendments, and I have sent in my name to the President as desiring to address the House in that sense. But as I see that the Minister of State for Justice is present, I will take the opportunity of asking two or three questions instead of delivering you with a speech. My first question is this—(Cries of "Never mind asking questions.")—In every Occidental Country, persons accused of offences against the law are granted the assistance of counsel during the preliminary examination. Such is the case in England. Such is the case in America. Such is the case in France. Why is the Japanese system different? What is the rationale of the difference? In the second place, the Code of Criminal Procedure is a compilation from the laws of France. At the time when the Code was compiled, accused persons were not allowed the benefit of counsel at their preliminary examination in France. But the French system was amended two years ago, and counsel is now allowed. If Japan followed France in the outset to the extent of adopting her laws wholesale, why should she now hesitate to follow the reforms effected by France in those laws? My third point is this:—His Excellency, in addressing the House of Peers with reference to this change which our Committee proposes, and which was suggested by the minority of the Upper Chamber's Committee, said that it would disturb the whole policy of the Code of Criminal Procedure and affect its very basic principle. What is the policy of criminal procedure in Japan? What is the basic principle? Did not that statement of His Excellency's partake slightly of a dust-throwing character? There is no such thing as a policy of criminal procedure in Japan at present, nor any such thing as a basic principle. Does the present system regard the defendant as a man or a thing? What we desire to have is a human policy; a humane basis. Why should any opposition be offered to this reform that we propose? Is it because, so soon as a man becomes a defendant in a criminal case, he ceases to be counted a human being? Is the preliminary examination an inquisition, an impeachment? Such certainly has been its character hitherto. Speaking to the House of Peers, Your Excellency intimated that you did not disapprove of this reform, but that you desired to postpone it for a little time. Why should it be postponed? If it is a good thing, why should we not have it at once? Is there any occasion for slow, hesitating methods when we see the right before our eyes? The Government has been introducing Bills about the stamps used by foreigners on legal documents, about their position as mortgagees, and about other petty matters that concern their convenience when they come under Japanese jurisdiction. But here is a really important reform; a reform which can not fail to exercise a potent influence upon our foreign relations. Yet we are told to wait. The Department of Justice has hitherto occupied a sort of insular position in the sea of politics. The waves of political strife have never invaded its coasts. We have left it virtually unmolested. But its immunity is not permanent. There are many charges to be brought against it, and if I attempted to marshal them all I could talk for a day and a night. (Voice—"Don't do that, please.") I content myself, however, with asking for answers to my questions.

The Minister of State for Justice (Mr. Kioura Keigo)—The session is drawing to near its close gentlemen, and so little time remains at your disposal, that I had not intended to encroach upon it. Several questions have been addressed to me, however, and though many of the subjects to which they relate are doubtless perfectly familiar to you, it seems advisable that I should entreat your attention for a few minutes. Stated briefly, the first question I am asked to answer is why, when all Western countries have embodied in their systems of criminal procedure the reform which your Committee now recommends, Japan should hesitate to do so. I answer that Occidental countries certainly have adopted it, but, before drawing any hard-and-fast conclusion from that general fact, we must examine it a little closely. England and America have long allowed counsel in preliminary examinations, but their system of criminal procedure differed radically from that of other Western States. How is it with Germany? She used not to allow counsel in preliminary examinations, and it was only quite recently that she removed the veto. And what are the facts about France? The proposal to allow counsel was submitted to her Senate in 1879—if I remember aright—but so important was the innovation deemed, and to such exhaustive consideration was it subjected, that not until the year 1897 did it receive the consent of both chambers and become the law of the land. It is an undeniable proposition that legislation must keep pace with the developments of the age and the progress of society. The Government has uniformly striven to discharge its duty to that principle. You yourselves see how many projects of law we have submitted for your approval during this very session. The Japanese Code of Civil Procedure is modelled on French lines. Well then, you say, if France has already allowed the employment of counsel in preliminary examinations, why should not Japan do the same. Need I point out that legislative reform must be adapted to the condition of the people legislated for? Need I insist on the vital necessity that a nation's laws should conform to the degree of its civilization? The fact that foreign countries have introduced a certain system does not seem to me a valid reason why we should introduce it. I am told that Japan has no policy of criminal procedure. But the argument that I have just listened to advocates nothing less than the total abolition of the proces verbal. (Mr. Hanai—"Yes. That is precisely what I advocate.") I must point out that if counsel have not been allowed at the proces verbal, neither have public procurators. That in the system, I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Government is radically opposed to the change your Committee advocates. It suitable methods of carrying it out were enacted, and if due limits were set, the Government would not object. It is mainly a question of providing methods. Allow me to point out, however, that if the bases of the present Code are to be preserved, it will not do, simply because we have applied our pens for the alteration of one part, to let them lightly run on to changes which affect the whole. To permit the employment of counsel at preliminary examinations is to metamorphosize the structure of the Code, and to dislocate its working. Moreover, if we attempt to put this change into immediate operation, it will probably lead to various abuses. The legal aspects of a case will become much more complicated, and its processes will be correspondingly retarded. Unless the varied mechanism of the tribunals is modified to suit that state of things, there can be nothing like satisfactory or expeditious procedure. Obstacles and embarrassments will inevitably present themselves. From the point of view of the accused person, it would certainly be very desirable to allow counsel, but if the peace and good order of society and the proper application of penalties are taken into consideration no pains must be spared to guard against the introduction of abuses. I need not remind you that blessings are never unmixed. But I may observe that if we can actually detect the losses coming in the suite of a gain, it is our duty to avert them as far as possible. That is the legislator's business. My chief apprehension is that if we allow the use of counsel at preliminary examinations, the proceedings will be greatly retarded. Do you ask me why? Because the processes will be much complicated. Because days will have to be fixed for calling witnesses, and it may be that the witnesses can not attend, or it may be that the counsel cannot find it convenient to do so. Then other days will have to be chosen. Further delays will probably attend the scrutinies of the record of evidence, as proposed by your Committee. In speaking thus I do not intend to say anything disparaging of barristers. But I hold in my hand some statistics which, you will admit, are impartial witnesses. They tell us something about changes of fixed days, and how the responsibility for delay is to be divided. For example, out of every hundred criminal cases, I find that postponements due to the Judiciary totalled 48, whereas postponements due to the Bar totalled 246. In civil cases the record is still more striking, for whereas only 1.9 of the delays stand to the account of the Judge, the barrister has to be credited with 30.1. These figures are fair witnesses. They tell something of what would result from employing counsel in preliminary examinations. That the liberty and rights of the subject must receive the utmost respect, goes without saying. But it is equally evident that a man must be detained in custody, even at the expense of his personal rights, where there is reason to apprehend that, if set at large, he would fly from justice, or destroy the proofs of his guilt, or repeat his offence. Farther, nothing is more important than to abbreviate as much as possible the period of detention in the case of persons not yet convicted of crime. I am afraid that if counsel were employed, the period would be greatly prolonged. (Mr. Hanai: No.) At all events, proper rules of procedure must be elaborated. The organization of the courts must be changed and a fuller provision of judicial machinery made, if this proposal about counsel is to be carried out. Mr. Hanai spoke to you of foreign countries. Let me quote some facts about them. France has 359 local courts and 2,866 district courts. The corresponding numbers in Germany's case are 172 and 1914. Those in Japan's case are 49 and 298. If we examine the ratios of local courts to population, we find that there is one local court in France for every 194,431 persons; one in Germany for every 262,989; and one in Japan for every 910,047. It is easy to see that, however diligent Japanese judges may be, however anxious to expedite affairs, there is great danger of delays and retardments. If you allow the employment of counsel, thus changing the whole preliminary system, it can not be doubted that the procedure will be greatly complicated and the course of justice delayed. In connexion with Treaty Revision, various amendments of the laws have had to be made. Some persons call it regrettable that whereas we have been busy with measures relating to the use of stamps on legal documents, and other merely technical questions, we have not proposed anything like a radical reform. I can only say that if the Government seen any necessity for radical reforms, it is not deterred for a moment by their dimensions. Mr. Hanai alleges that there is no such thing as a policy of criminal procedure in Japan. Our criminal law was taken from France, and we therefore followed France in having the secret proces verbal. That is our policy. If we propose to make a radical change of that policy, it behoves us to consider the consequences carefully. It is not right that we should undertake fundamentally destructive operations merely in deference to the cry that the Revised Treaties are about to go into operation. We have agreed that our various Codes shall be working as a preliminary to the operation of the Treaties; a provision in that sense exists in the German Treaty. But there is no condition requiring us to alter our Code of Criminal Procedure or other laws. Certainly it is our duty, now that a number of nationalities with manners and customs different from our own are about to pass under our jurisdiction—it is our duty to do everything in our power to make things satisfactory for them. Further, even though our treaties with foreign States impose no obligation of the kind on us, it is our duty to try and provide for our own people a beneficent system of laws. When, however, a radical change is proposed, we are compelled to observe that it must not stop short at one part of the Code but must extend to all parts. The result of a change fundamental in character but defective in method must be a loss of consistency and expedition. The Department of Justice has for some time been considering the question of amending the Code of Criminal Procedure. Various investigations of the subject have been made, and the amendments proposed by the Peers were, for the most part, the outcome of those investigations. We gladly endorse them. On the other hand, though the matter has received much attention from us, we have been so closely occupied, as you have yourselves seen, preparing measures connected with Treaty Revision and other essential affairs, that it has been impossible for us to submit a draft of an amended Code of Criminal Procedure during this session. We hope to have it ready by about next session. If you ask me on what lines revision is to be effected, I confess that I can not yet give you an explicit answer. But the important point is that the protection of the rights of the individual will be made cardinal, while, at the same time, the peace of society will receive attention. To combine these two aims harmoniously is an essential responsibility which devolves upon you, gentlemen, as much as upon us. Again, it has been stated in this House that the preliminary judges treat defendants to-day not as if they were men but as if they were merely things. As to that, I do not apprehend that among persons who have studied the elements of jurisprudence, there are any who have failed to grasp the fact that until a man has been definitely proved guilty, he must be treated as entirely innocent.—(Cries of, "There are; there are.") Of course, among the many judicial officials hitherto employed it is not impossible that some have failed to observe that principle fully. But you must remember that vigorous measures have gradually been adopted of late and are still in progress, to sift the judiciary, and to furnish it with judges and procurators of the modern school. Further, as to actual practice, instructions have been given to them—but I am precluded from entering into particulars in that direction. I may say, however, that we are doing everything in our power to extend the facilities for obtaining bail and to reduce to a minimum the detention of persons prior to commitment.—(A voice, "You are not succeeding.") I do not say that, as a point of judicial procedure, I consider the limited employment of counsel in preliminary examinations to be altogether wrong. On the contrary, I am distinctly in favour of such a system if the limits and the methods be duly prescribed. But I do consider that to make such a radical metamorphosis of the system of preliminary examination in connexion with a comparatively trifling alteration of one part of the Code, must involve difficulties in practice, and we can not regard the prospect without grave misgivings. I would therefore beg of you to postpone this matter for a season, as we hope to be in a position to submit a full revision of the Code for your consideration next session.

Mr. Seki—Your Excellency alleges that the use of counsel would tend to retard the proceedings, and you have read to us statistics showing that in civil and criminal cases the responsibility for delay rests chiefly with the barristers. I would point out that such figures are misleading. Barristers are obliged to make written application when they ask for a postponement, and a record in this clearly established. But no such obligation devolves upon judicial officials. There is no record of the delays caused by them, and any comparison of figures must therefore be most unfair. As to the contention that barristers would complicate the proceedings and retard them, the very opposite would probably be the case. The assistance of counsel could not fail to expedite the progress of the trial. It is owing in great part to the absence of counsel that persons accused of offences not involving more than a couple of months' imprisonment, are now kept in jail sometimes for as long as a year before their case is decided. Surely Your Excellency must be aware of these things. Are you not mistaken in the views you have advanced?

The Minister—I do not think there is any occasion to discuss these points in detail. (A Voice—"Yes, that's the way.") That the proceedings in preliminary examinations are protracted, is a fact established by practical experience and quite familiar, I imagine. I leave you to form your own estimate of the causes. For my part, I have lately heard much talk about the responsibility of preliminary judges, and I confess that I am very glad to hear it. If it reaches my ears, it reaches theirs also, and doubtless prompts them to even greater diligence than they already employ. I have some figures here relating to the year 1897, and as they bear upon this point I will read them:—

Number of persons who underwent preliminary examination in 1897	20,482
No. of decisions rendered within 5 days	930
do do do 10 do	1,903
do do do 15 do	2,305
do do do 20 do	2,229
do do do 30 do	3,376
do do do 60 do	5,425
do do do 90 do	2,076
do do do 180 do	1,424
do do do one year do	231
No. of decisions not rendered within a year.	23

There is certainly room for improvement, but all concerned are doing their best.

No further discussion took place, and the House, without dissent or division, passed the Bill as amended by the Special Committee.

VARIOUS MEASURES.

The Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) relating to assistance in the arrest and detention of seamen refugees from foreign men-of-war was then passed.

A Government Bill for the Regulation of Farm Boundaries was then read and handed to a Special Committee. The purpose of this Bill is to re-arrange the paths and straighten the divisions between agricultural holdings; and also to effect exchanges of lots so that each farmer shall have his land in a single holding. At present considerable areas are wasted by crooked boundaries and needless paths, and the labour of farmers is dissipated owing to their farms being divided into fragments separated sometimes by long distances. Official efforts have for some time been directed to correct these defects, but it is found that legislation is required. The Bill proposes that farmers objecting to co-operate in carrying out the desired improvements may be required to do so, and that if they fail to furnish the necessary labour, its monetary value may be assessed, and levied after the manner of a tax. On the other hand, the Government will not reassess the taxable value of land thus appreciated, or make any charge for its registration, and surplus areas created by the process will be bestowed on the most active promoters of the improvements.

Government Bill for extending the competence of the State to appropriate lands for public purposes.

THE PRISONS.

A private Bill was then introduced for transferring the Prisons to the control of the Central Government, the latter to assume all charges connected with them, and to take over all buildings and property belonging to them; the law to go into operation from October 1st, 1900.

Mr. Horiya having briefly recommended the measure as essential to the uniform regulation of prison affairs, Mr. Kudo Kokan invited an expression of the Government's views with regard to the Bill.

Count Matsukata said that the Government had always approved of the proposed transfer, and had made several attempts to accomplish it. The financial programme originally elaborated by the present Cabinet had included this reform. But the programme had been based on an increase of the Land-Tax rate to 4 per cent., whereas the House had cut down the rate to 3.3 per cent. A diminution of the Treasury's income to the amount of 9 million yen had resulted, and, although compensatory measures had been adopted, there was still a difference of some four millions as compared with the Government's estimate. That action on the part of the House had dislocated the programme; otherwise the Government itself would have introduced a Bill for transferring the prison expenditures to the charges of the Treasury, from the fiscal year 1900-1. But, having no revenue in sight to defray such an outlay as 4 or 5 million yen, the Government had been obliged to abandon its purpose. If the House passed the measure now before it, and if the new law became operative from Oct. 1st, 1900, the expenses for half a year would have to be provided. That could be accomplished, perhaps by temporarily drawing upon the fund set aside to assist engineering work necessitated by inundations. But for the fiscal year 1901-2, some new source of increased taxation would have to be provided. Doubtless the House would give its consent to that when the time came, but the fact had better be borne in mind when dealing with this Bill.

Mr. Kudo gathered from these remarks of the Minister's that the Government contemplated the probability of not being able to abolish the increased Land Tax at the end of five years, although it was understood to have agreed to that limitation.

Count Matsukata declined to discuss future contingencies.

Dr. Hatayama approved of the principle of the Bill, but failed to see how it could be carried out without funds. The Minister had told them that some additional source of increased taxation would be required if they passed the measure. It appeared that the Government wished to exact from them a tacit pledge about future taxation. The question was certainly one that called for minute investigation, and he moved that the Bill be handed to Special Committee.

A long, and sometimes turbulent, altercation ensued. It was plainly the aim of the Opposition to have the Bill handed to a Committee, which would have dispelled all hope of passing it during the present session, whereas the Liberals and National Unionists were equally determined to deal with it once. A ballot was finally taken, when 135 voted against, and 109 for, handing the Bill to a Committee. The discussion was therefore terminated.

Mr. Ooka Ikun spoke at some length, but his speech consisted chiefly of an exhortation to the House to lighten the burden of local taxation by transferring the prison expenditures to the Treasury's charges. The measure, he said, had been earnestly desired by him for the past seven years, and he regretted to observe that the Government's attitude towards it was one of hesitancy. The Government, when introducing the Budget, had assured them that it was at the end of its revenue resources, yet they had subsequently been asked to pass supplementary budget after supplementary budget, and it was quite evident that ways and means were available if necessary. He suggested that if the Government maintained its hesitating attitude, and induced the Upper House to display a similar mood, they should decline to pass any more supplementary budgets which might be submitted to them.

After some further discussion the clause was applied, and the House passed the Bill.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The private Bill for amending the Business Tax Law then came up for its Second Reading, and was favourably recommended by the Special Committee. The proposed amendment is to abolish all the taxes which the present law imposes on renting values of premises and on employers. The introducers of the Bill estimated that the loss of revenue resulting from their amendment would not exceed half a million yen, but the Government Delegate alleged that it would be nearer 3 millions. The Bill was finally passed by 102 votes to 80.

The Special Committee's report on the private Bill for separating the businesses of physician and pharmacist recommended that no hard and fast rule be adopted, but that discretionary power be vested in the Minister of State for Home Affairs. The House rejected the Bill by 115 votes to 53, and rose at 5.15 p.m.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS. NEW BILLS.

The House met at 10 a.m., and, having read the following two Government Bills, handed them to Special Committees:—(1) Bill providing for the registration of immovable property held in perpetuity by foreigners within the present Settlements. (2) Bill containing a project of Lost Articles Law.

Three Government Bills were then unanimously passed for increasing the pensions of school teachers and improving their status, and the Special Committee's report on the Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the system of Local Government, was presented. The Committee recommended many changes, and after some debate these were endorsed by the House. In spite of the Government Delegate's opposition. The Second Reading was voted by 131 votes to 70, and the Bills, having been discussed clause by clause, were ultimately passed.

The Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for the Regulation of Farm Boundaries, was placed upon the Order of the Day as a matter of urgency, and, having been read, was handed to a Special Committee, after which the House, went into secret session to consider the private Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for abolishing the import duty on salt fish coming from Saghalien, and, having rejected it by 82 votes to 69, rose at 4.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m.; and, having decided that a Conference of the House be held with regard to the Peers' amendments of the Tonnage Dues Bill, endorsed their amendments of the Government Bill for making changes of local boundaries in Okinawa Prefecture, and passed the Government Bill providing for the remission of taxes on manufactured tobacco intended for export.

SETTLED ACCOUNTS, ETC.

The Settled Accounts for 1896-7 were approved, but the House endorsed the Committee's report that they contained items not in conformity with law, not proper and not sufficiently considered.

The Peers' amendment—introduction of the qualifier "artificial" before the word "fertilizer"—of the Bill for exempting fertilizers from import duty was approved, and the following measures were handed to Special Committees:—

A Representation relating to the restoration of property confiscated in 1873.

A Representation urging that steps be taken to expedite the construction of the lines included in the First-Period Railways.

A Representation urging that work on the Umita Kure Railway—12 miles; cost, 1,260,003 yen—be commenced from the fiscal year 1900-1.

SILK REELING.

A Representation urging that steps be taken to promote the use of the silk reeling machine now working in the Government's experimental filature at Nishigahara. Japanese sericulturists still adhere, for the most part, to their old custom of hand-reeling, and have no adequate appreciation of economical methods of manufacture. Their work is often unprofitable, and always unfitted to compete with that of Occidental peoples, who, in spite of their higher scale of living and more costly labour, are so clever in employing scientific machines that they easily beat their clumsy Oriental rivals. It is calculated that if the reeling machine now working at Nishigahara—which appears to be particularly well adapted to Japanese silk—were generally employed, the value of the labour saved in reeling 2 million koku of cocoons (Japan's yearly production) and of the increased weight of the silk obtained, would be 26,600,000 yen.

THE PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. Hoshi Tora moved that the Order be changed for the purpose of reading a Government Bill for amending the Law of the Houses, in the sense of increasing the emoluments of the members; the President's pay to become 5,000 yen annually; the Vice-President's 3,000 yen; and the members', 2,000 yen each. The House endorsed the motion, and handed the Bill to a Special Committee, with instructions to report on it by the 6th instant. (The increased rates are to become operative from July 1st, 1899).

PARIS EXHIBITION.

A Representation for giving State aid to open a saké stall in the Paris Exhibition was handed to a Special Committee. The idea is to find a market abroad for Japanese saké, and with that object it is proposed to dispense the liquor gratis at the exhibition. The projectors calculate on giving free drinks to 500,000 people, and, such extensive hospitality being beyond their means, they ask for State Aid.

REPRESENTATIONS.

The House adopted Representations for establishing a High School in Shikoku, and for abolishing the Premunition Law of 1892, and then proceeded to consider a Representation relating to the affair of religious instructors at Sugamo Prison. This document declared that the Buddhist teachers had been forced to resign; that the course adopted towards them had been exceedingly harsh; that the officials of the Home Department had themselves recognised the wrong, and that public opinion was now in a state of great excitement about the matter.

Mr. Shimada Saburo asked for a statement of the Government's view. If the Buddhist teachers were forced to resign, there had been a violation of the Constitution. Had they been forced to resign? Also, was it true that the wrong had been recognised by the officials of the Home Department? Finally, if public opinion was in a state of great excitement, why did not the Government deal with the question?

The Government Delegate emphatically denied that anything in the nature of force had been employed, and recounted the actual facts. He emphatically denied that the officials of the Home Department had recognised any wrong. And he emphatically denied that any symptoms of public excitement were apparent to the Government.

An excited discussion ensued as to whether the Representation should be entrusted to a Committee or debated at once. The House finally rejected the proposal for a Committee by 104 votes to 89.

Mr. Shimada Saburo said that the House was called upon to decide between the Kenshi-to Cabinet, which held office at the time of these occurrences, and the signatories of the Representation. The Government Delegate, speaking on behalf of a Cabinet in which Count Itagaki had been Minister of Home Affairs, repudiated the charges sertafim. If the charges were declared true, the Representation would amount to an impeachment of the Government. If they were to be declared untrue, the House must have grounds for the declaration.

A brief debate ensued, and the House adopted the Representation by 102 votes to 91.

OTHER MATTERS.

The following measures were handed to Special Committees:—

Bill for amending the Colonists Protection Law, in the sense of allowing Emigration Companies to pay the whole of their security in public bonds or approved mercantile paper.

Representation for the Multiplication of Salmon and Masu.

The House, having dealt with two petitions, rose at 5.05 p.m.

MONDAY, MARCH 6TH. HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.35 a.m., and, having agreed that a Conference of the Houses should take place with regard to the Tonnage Dues Bill, and received the report of the Petitions Committee, read two Bills sent up from the Lower House and handed them to Special Committees.

CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

The changes made by the Representatives in the Bill for amending a portion of the Code of Criminal Procedure, then came up for discussion.

Mr. Kaneko Kentaro, while sensible of the inadvisability of the House's reversing its decision, urged that the present case might well be made exceptional, in view of the important bearing of the question on Treaty Revision and the country's foreign relations. He spoke of what had passed when he attended the conference on International Law in Geneva in 1893, and said that this very problem of allowing counsel to assist accused persons at preliminary inquiries had come up for discussion, and that the maintenance of the secret system in Japan had been strongly condemned. All European countries now allowed accused persons to have the benefit of counsel, and it did not redound to Japan's credit that she should be an exception. Of course she could choose her own time for making a reform, either before or after the inauguration of mixed residence, but there could be no doubt that the alteration of the system would come with much better grace if it preceded the complaints which the secret examination would certainly evoke from foreigners when they had to submit to it. Japan had at last gained admittance to the comity of nations, and the occasion was eminently suitable for a reform which her new associates universally endorsed.

Mr. Murata Tamotsu pointed out that if foreign systems were to be implicitly taken as models, they must not stop short at abolishing the secret examination. They must also adopt trial by jury.

The Government Delegate denied that counsel were allowed by all Occidental countries in preliminary examinations. With regard to the charge that the present system works harshly and leads to the conviction of innocent persons, he quoted the statistics for 1897, which showed that whereas the public procurators had sent 39,067 persons before the juges d'instruction, the latter has dismissed 12,491 of the number, after examination. Each country had its own system, and must consider its own condition in drafting its laws and designing its procedure.

Mr. Miyoshi Taizo declared that the secret examination was responsible for terrible abuses. Above all, it opened the door wide for judicial corruption. He cited the Soima case; the Waterworks case, and the Okayama Prefecture case, and affirmed that the administration of justice could never be sound so long as such procedure was adopted.

After some further discussion, the closure was applied, and the House rejected the Representatives' amendments, and commissioned the President to nominate Managers for a Conference.

NEW LAWS.

The following Bills were passed:—

Government Bill (sent up from Lower House) relating to the rights of persons who have lost their nationality.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) relating to the rights of foreign mortgagees.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for the prevention of offences against the Tobacco Monopoly Law.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) relating to the relief of losses caused by inundations.

Government Bill relating to the registration of the property rights of foreign individuals and judicial persons.

Private Bill relating to the property qualifications of electors and candidates.

The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for transferring prison expenditures to the charges of the Treasury, was handed to a Special Committee, and the House, having dealt with various petitions, rose at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The House met at 1.15 p.m.

Questions were submitted with reference to the action of the former President of the Board of Audit, and with reference to the declaration of the Minister of Finance on the 3rd instant that the transfer of prison expenditures to the Treasury's charges would necessitate increased taxation from the year 1900-1.

The Peers' changes in the Bill for amending the Local Government System were endorsed, but their changes in the Registration Bill were referred to a Conference. The latter question led to a discussion between the Liberal and Progressist leaders. Mr. Hoshi Toru condemned the Peers' amendments, first because they produced an increased revenue of only 80,000 yen, whereas the Representatives' amendments would produce 500,000; and secondly because the Peers had favoured the rich at the expense of the poor. Dr. Hatoyama retorted that the Articles amended by the Peers had been passed by the Representatives so hurriedly, under the leadership of Mr. Hoshi himself, that no proper consideration could be given to them, and that the amendments were highly commendable.

THE PAYMENT OF MEMBERS.

The Bill for increasing the allowances of members of the Diet then came up for discussion. The Special Committee reported in favour of the measure, but recommended an amendment in the sense of allowing to members the option of receiving or rejecting the increase.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo regarded this project as secondary in importance to only one question—the question of the Ashiwa-Mine poisoning. It was stated in the exposé of motives that an increased allowance was necessary so as to enable the members to support their position. Money had nothing to do with a member's position. To say so was to insult the House.

From one point of view, this increase was simply a bribe. The country was already suffering from increased taxation. The market value of arable land had declined by 20 per cent. A financial emergency existed scarcely less acute than that which had induced the Sovereign to make a grant out of the Privy Purse for the building of warships six years ago. This was a question of morality. What sort of face could they show to their Sovereign and their fellow-countrymen if they voted for such a Bill?

Mr. Hoshi Toru observed that when the question of paying members came before the British Parliament, the Liberals had supported it, the Conservatives had opposed it. In short, the rich had been arrayed against the poor. He considered it an honour to the present House that it should be called upon to deal with such a question. In effect, what they were invited to discuss was whether members should have any allowance at all, for if it were denied that the allowance should be adequate, then it was constructively denied that there should be any allowance at all. They were all agreed, he presumed, as to the principle. If so, why should an increase be deemed immoral? It could not reasonably be pretended that a sum which did not exceed the pay of a District Headman or a Bureau employé was adequate for a member of the Diet. To shrink from raising the emolument to a reasonable figure while, at the same time, admitting that there ought to be an emolument, was a case of sa-jo no jin (the Chinese Emperor who thought it right to fight against his enemies but wrong to follow up his victory). There was no question of additional taxation on account of this payment: it would be defrayed out of taxes already imposed. The expenditure was a bagatelle—only some 600,000 yen annually, or 1.8 sen per head of the population. They had to defray out of their own pockets the cost of their elections, and the State possessed no title to their unremunerated services. The people wanted to see their allowances increased—were anxious for it. This project had been mooted when the Okuma Ministry was in power, and had received the consent of the Cabinet. The Progressists could not logically condemn it merely because it was brought forward by the Yamagata Cabinet. Besides, the Committee's amendment would give members the option of taking or leaving the money. Those that could not reconcile themselves to receiving it, had only to let it alone. The Minister of Finance would applaud their scruples.

Mr. Shimada Saburo considered that to talk of what had been contemplated by the Okuma Cabinet was out of place. As for England he was quite sure that the question of paying members of Parliament would never have been considered for an instant had the country been reduced to such financial straits as to be obliged to tax the machinery of communications, posts, telegraphs and railways. Upon Mr. Hoshi Toru and his followers would be the responsibility of having compelled the adoption of most improper taxes. Had they not just reduced from ten thousand yen to three thousand the appropriation for a committee to investigate the State purchase of private railways? How, on the very morrow of such a step, could they vote a large increase of their own allowances? As for the pretence that a larger sum was required to maintain the status of the members, he protested that money had nothing to do with the status of a member.

Mr. Matsumoto (Liberal) ascended the rostrum, and was commencing, on behalf of himself and his fellow Liberals, a vehement declaration of dissent from the views expressed by their respected leader, Mr. Hoshi, when the closure was put and carried.

The House, by 134 to 127, decided that the decision should be by unsigned ballots, and the result was that 134 voted for the Second Reading and 125 against.

Mr. Matsumoto moved an amendment that the President's allowance should be increased by 100 sen, and that the allowances of the members should remain unchanged, but he found no supporters, and the Bill was passed as amended by the Committee.

The following business was then discharged:

The three Bills relating to Capital Fund for Education, the Maintenance of the Navy, and for Aid in Natural Calamities, and the Bill for restoring the Central Radium Relief Fund, were passed without debate; and the Representation for the Official Compilation of Primary-School Ethical Text Books, and the Establishment of an Industrial School, were adopted.

The following measures were read and handed to Special Committees:—

Bill for regulating Consular Functions (sent down from Peers).

Three Bills (sent down from Peers) for increasing the Pensions and improving the status of School Teachers.

Bill (Private) for amending the Law of Organization of the Courts of Law, in the sense of providing that Judicial Consultations in the Court of Cassation may be open to the public, inasmuch as, not questions of fact, but only the interpretation and application of laws, were debated.

Three Private Bills for abolishing Security Payments in Criminal Appeals.

A Private Bill for amending the 23rd Article of the Criminal Code in the sense of including the badges worn by members of the Diet among the articles whose use is forbidden to ordinary persons.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and, having agreed to the appointment of Managers to confer with the Lower House on the amendments of the Bill relating to the Registration Law, should have proceeded with the first reading of the Bill for increasing the Allowances of the Members, but Viscount Tani moved that the reading be postponed until some of the Cabinet Ministers attended to answer questions, and the House, endorsing the motion, took the next measures on the Order, namely, the Bill embodying a Law of Lost Articles, the Bill relating to the Sale of State Lands, Forests and Moors, and the Bill for the Adjustment of Arable Lands, all of which were passed. The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Business Tax Law, was handed to a Special Committee, and at this stage, the Prime Minister, the Minister of State for Finance, the Minister of State for Communications, and the Minister of State for Justice having entered the House, the reading of the Bill for increasing the Allowances of the Members was proceeded with. Marquis Yamagata stated briefly that the question whether members should have allowances or should not have allowances had passed beyond the range of discussion, and the point to be now determined was what amount of allowance would enable a member to support his position worthily; concerning which point the Government's view was embodied in the Bill. After these few words from the Prime Minister, Viscounts Soga and Tani, supported by Baron Date, commenced a long series of interrogations, dealing primarily with the meaning of the word position, as applied to a member of the Diet, and secondly with the sources from which revenue to meet this outlay was to be obtained. The iterated and reiterated questions on the former subject failed to elicit any clear response, being framed chiefly with the object of perplexing the Government Delegate, but with regard to ways and means the Minister of Finance explained that he expected to obtain surpluses from the Stamp Tax, the Adjustment of Arable Lands, and the Revised Delimitation of Building Lands in Districts and Divisions. The two Viscounts, while couching their statements in the form of queries, as was necessary at this stage of the proceedings, denounced the untimeliness of such a measure at a juncture when the Treasury was compelled to resort to taxation of a most objectionable character, and sought to create the impression that the increased allowances would serve solely to minister to the luxurious habits of men who ought to serve their country gratis. An attempt was made to apply the closure to this protracted process of questioning, but the President ruled it out of order. The Bill was finally handed to a Special Committee with instructions to report on it by 10 a.m. on the following morning.

Baron Suyematsu raised a question about the propriety of the President's ruling that the closure could not be applied during the question stage of a Bill. Such was not the intention, he said, of the rules relating to the closure which he had recently introduced, and which the House had endorsed. The President pointed out that, whatever the intention of the rules might be, their text admitted of only one interpretation. The question having been put to the House, however, it endorsed the view of Baron Suyematsu.

The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for changing the Local Government System in Tokyo, though favourably reported on by the Special Committee, obtained only one vote for its Second Reading; but the House unanimously adopted a Representation urging the better conservation of former Imperial residences, and, having dealt with a number of petitions, rose at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

BUDGETS.

The House met at 10.30 a.m., having decided to sit the whole day for the remainder of the session. A large part of the business related to Supplementary Budgets all of which were favourably recommended by the Budget Committee, with some reductions. When the House was about to discuss these Budgets, Mr. Inouye Kakugoro inquired whether any answer had been received to the Question presented by him on the previous day, namely, did the Government intend to affirm that some new source of taxation must be found if the prison expenses were transferred to the charges of the Treasury? The President said that no reply had yet come, and Mr. Inouye then moved that the House defer the discussion of the Supplementary Budgets until the Minister of State for Finance attended, and made some definite declaration on this point. He said that, while asked to believe that the Treasury could not, without recourse to increased taxation, find 4 million yen to carry out an essential reform, they were nevertheless invited to pass a crowd of Supplementary Budgets involving expenditures of many millions.

Mr. Ooka Ikuzo supported the motion, but while he was speaking the Government's answer to Mr. Inouye's Question arrived, and, being read aloud, was found to be a curt statement that Mr. Inouye's version of the Government's intention was exactly correct. This announcement created great merriment, and Mr. Inouye, declaring himself satisfied, withdrew his motion. The Supplementary Budgets were then taken one by one and passed, as amended by the Committee. With regard to two only did any serious discussion take place; namely the Budget providing for a Formosan loan on account of public undertakings, and the Budget providing special subsidies to the European and American steamship services of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and the Toyo Kisen Kaisha. The former measure was opposed, chiefly by Mr. Noma Goso, on the ground that the nature of the administration of Formosa did not justify the proposed expenditures, and that, if the Budget were adopted, the country would find itself committed to a series of constantly increasing outlays. The House nevertheless passed the Budget, with the Committee's amendment reducing the total of the loan by 5 million yen.

SUBSIDIES TO STEAMSHIPS.

The Budget for steamship subsidies did not provoke any radical or resolute opposition. Mr. Ooka Ikuzo spoke against it, but his objections were of a trivial character. They related only to the maximum speed (14 knots) of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's steamers for its European service. He said that such vessels were not fitted to compete with the ocean grayhounds of the highly advanced countries with which Japan had to compete, and he charged the Government with having fixed the speed so as to suit the convenience of a private company, rather than with a view to the interests of the nation. Mr. Shimada Saburo also asked some questions, and the Government Delegate said that the Government deemed the speed sufficient, and that the proceeds of the taxes already imposed would suffice to defray the projected outlay. An unsigned ballot having been taken, the Budget was passed by 165 votes to 78.

NEW LAWS.

The two Bills relating to the Formosa Public Undertakings Bonds and amendment of the Navigation Encouragement Law were then passed, as were the following also:—

Project of Law for dealing with persons taken sick or dying while on a journey.

Project of Law for establishing a Colonization Bank in Hokkaido.

Project of Law relating to the Special Financing of a Capital Fund for State Forens.

Project of Law for restoring the Hereditary Pensions of the Touami Clansmen.

The following were handed to Special Committees:—

Project of Law (sent down from the Peers) relating to the Registration of the Rights of Property of Foreigners and Foreign Legal Persons.

Project of Law (sent down from the Peers) for determining the Property Qualifications of Electors and Candidates for Election.

Project of Law relating to lost articles.

The House was counted out at 4.30 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

PAYMENT OF MEMBERS.

The House met at 10.15, and, having handed four Supplementary Budgets to the Budget Committee with instructions to report on them the following day, proceeded to discuss the Bill for increasing the allowances of members of the Diet. Viscount Nagaoka, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported against the Bill, the Committee's view being that such a measure could not properly be adopted at a time when the financial condition of the State was such as to require large additions to the people's burden of taxation. A report was presented on behalf of the minority of the Committee also, approving the Bill, on the ground that the allowance now received by the members did not suffice to support their position. An animated debate ensued. Viscount Tani led the opponents of the measure and Mr. Kato Hiroyuki headed its supporters. The former did not advance any solid arguments. They rested their case on sentiment only. Making no attempt to controvert the principle that members should be paid, they confined themselves to declaring that on the very morrow of voting increased taxes, the House would be acting a disgraceful part if it voted an increase of its own emoluments. They strenuously denied the applicability of foreign precedents to Japan's case, especially precedents borrowed from republican countries, and they urged that to wear fine clothes and fare sumptuously did not in any way tend to improve or maintain a man's social status. Viscount Okabe and Baron Date endorsed these arguments. Mr. Kato Hiroyuki and Baron Ozaki, on the other side, took the simple ground that if men serve the State for a salary, the salary should obviously be adequate; that 800 yen a year was by no means adequate, and that men of wealth and title were scarcely in a position to judge how these questions presented themselves to their less fortunate fellows who had to think carefully of ways and means. The discussion elicited from Viscount Tani an interesting avowal, namely, that if the House passed the measure, he did not imagine that any one would be so foolish as to refuse the increased allowance, though the Law permitted him to do so.

A signed ballot was taken to determine the method of voting, when 116 were in favour of an unsigned ballot and 102 in favour of a signed ballot. The unsigned ballot resulted in 119 for the Second Reading and 100 against it. Viscount Tani then proposed an amendment, discriminating between the Houses by not making any change in the allowances of the Upper House, and increasing those of the Lower to 1,500 yen annually. Baron Suyematsu denounced this proposal as unbecoming, and said that such an amendment would stultify the action just taken by the House in voting for the Second Reading. The amendment was rejected by 141 to 60, and an attempt to deprive the members of the right to refuse the increased allowance was negatived by 96 to 90.

Having handed some Bills to Special Committees, the House rose at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.30 p.m.

FRANCE SILK TARIFF.

Mr. Kato Masanosuke presented a Question with regard to the action taken by France in imposing an arbitrarily increased tariff rate on Japanese silk stuffs. He asked what steps the Japanese Government intended to take, and whether retaliatory measures would be adopted.

ASHIWO.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo devoted nearly an hour to expounding a Question on his favourite subject, the poisonous products of the Ashiwo Copper Mine. He declared that he had presented fourteen Questions to the Government on this subject since 1891, but had never once succeeded in obtaining a satisfactory answer.

PRISONS.

Mr. Kudo Kokan presented a Question seeking information about the declaration made by the Minister of State for Finance on the 3rd instant, to the effect that some new source of taxation must be found if the Prison Expenditures were transferred to the charges of the Treasury.

NEW LAWS.

The House then proceeded to the Order of the day. There was an almost entire absence of discussion, the only Bill that gave rise to any argument being the project of Fishery Law, which was ultimately rejected. The following business was done:—

Bill for extending the Government's powers appropriating property for public uses. Passed.

Bill embodying a project of Fishery Law. Rejected.

Bill for establishing a system of Special Accounts in the case of the Public Undertakings Bonds and Railway Bonds. Passed.

Amendments by a Conference of the Houses in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Adopted.

Bill relating to a Special Account for the Forestry Capital Fund. Passed.

Special Supplementary Budget No. 5 for 1899-1900. Passed.

Bill relating to Consular Functions. Passed.

Three Bills for increasing the Pensions and improving the Status of School Teachers. Passed.

Project of Lost Articles Law. Passed.

Bill relating to the Property Rights of Foreigners and Foreign Legal Persons. Passed.

Bill relating to Grounds in the neighbourhood of Temples and Shrines. Passed.

Bill for the better control of State Forests and Moors. Rejected.

Bill relating to the rectification of errors in commuting the Pensions of Shinto Officials. Rejected.

Bill abolishing Law No. 11 of 1897, which empowers the Government to entrust to private Companies the Construction of Lines included in the Railway Building Programme. Passed.

Three Bills for abolishing Security Money in connexion with Appeals in cases of Crimes, Delicts and Fines. Passed.

Bill for amending the limits of Law Courts Jurisdiction in Iwate Prefecture. Rejected.

Representation for appointing a Continuing Committee when the Settled Accounts of Revenue and Expenditure are not passed during the course of the regular Session. Passed.

Representation urging that certain portions of the Civil Code be amended, so as to bring them into harmony with Japanese Customs. Handed to a Special Committee.

The House was counted out at 4.40 p.m.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A SAD CASE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Will you kindly give the following "facts" a place in your paper?

In Western Japan lives a widow and her three children—two daughters and a son. The eldest daughter when twelve years of age was adopted by another family. Three years later the adopted father died, when the adopted mother desired to be relieved of the child, but had no intention of giving her up without remuneration. She therefore wrote the true mother offering to return the girl on the payment of yen 150, and, in the event of the mother not paying this price, stating that she would sell the child for three years to a brothel. The price demanded was more than the poor mother could meet, for she was struggling to supply the needs of herself and other children; and this child of 15 years was sold for "seven" instead of "three" years—the purchase money going into the hands of the foster-mother.

Seven years rolled round, and the true mother expected to receive her child; but through the intrigue of the brothel-manager and foster-mother—the latter was receiving a monthly percentage of the girl's earnings—it had been so managed that the helpless girl must earn still yen 300 before her slavery would end. The letters from this victim of man's passion and greed told only of repugnance for the life to which she was bound, and were full of entreaties to be freed. Finally a letter came saying death was preferable to the life she was leading. In despair the mother journeyed to the city where her child was in bondage, and succeeded in getting possession of her. Ten years of enforced slavery—to which "death is preferable"—has been this girl's portion. Happy in her freedom, she is now earning her living in an honest and respectable way; but on this innocent woman, who is but 25 years of age, will rest the blot of a soiled life. Where are the patriots? surely the time has come for such to lift their voices and say—these things shall not be.

How long is the Government of this land going to sanction a condition of things that permits of such cruel enslavement of her women? for, Mr. Editor, however the law may "read," morally, these girls have no liberty; and, so long as legalized prostitutes are possible, so long will such sacrifices be forced upon the women of Japan.

If it be true that a nation is judged by the esteem in which her women are held, is it not time for ambitious Japan to remove this blot upon her name?

Yours, &c.,

WHITE RIBBON.

KOREAN NEWS.

Korea seems to be falling again into a state of unrest. The telegraph says that the Russophile party are agitating for the restoration of Cho Pyöng-sik to power, and for the investiture of Lady Om as Empress. This lady has long been the Emperor's favourite mistress, and her influence would doubtless be entirely at the disposal of the pro-Russian politicians if they succeeded in obtaining for her the position of Imperial consort.

On the other hand, there is a small source of friction between Russia and Korea. Russian subjects have whaling privileges in the waters off the north-east coast of Korea. It appears, however, that, for some unexplained reason, a whaling boat which carried a Russian permit was seized by the local authorities near Gensan. They forwarded a report of the fact to Söul, but in the meanwhile Russia had preferred a demand for compensation to the extent of 34,000 yen. The Korean plea, we presume, is that, although Russia has acquired the privilege for her own subjects, she has not acquired the right of conferring it on third parties.

Describing Chinese New Year in Söul the Korean Weekly Repository, which appears to have stepped into the shoes of the deceased Independent, says: For centuries until 1895 the Chinese calendar prevailed in Korea, and about it has grown up a large number of customs and observances. Though the Gregorian calendar was legally adopted in 1895, and Jan. 1st is observed as the official New Year, yet the people hold to the old calendar and celebrate its opening as a gala-day. One reason for the strong hold it has on the people is that by this time the winter costume has reached that stage in its transformation from immaculate white to the colour of mother earth where it becomes convenient to make a change. Therefore on that day the entire nation, from the patrician of the bluest blood to the unwashed coolie on the street, appears in new or freshly washed garments. The season was generally observed throughout Söul. The streets were gay with the variegated costumes of the children. The air was full of pugnacious kites. The creditor pursued the unfortunate debtor with all the merciless vigour of yore. Stone fights appeared to be as popular as ever, though the burden of maintaining them seems to have fallen upon the "small boy." Korea, in supreme self-sacrifice, gave up serious life for fifteen days and united in a grand effort to help the sun through the winter solstice.

The school for the study of Chinese classics is to be reorganised. The present Minister of Education, Hon. Sin Kiann, is a staunch believer in the doctrines of Confucius.

The total number of Korean Scriptures (portions), published last year was 93,000 and the actual sales 34,913, as against 6,335 in 1897, and 1,253 in 1895. The readiness with which Koreans buy Scriptures and Christian books generally is a constant and pleasant surprise to the missionary.

On account of an escape of three prisoners from jail no less than five officials, including the chief-keeper, clerks, and keepers, have been deprived of their positions.

The Paddlers lately petitioned the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce for the re-organization of their guild. The Minister gave them little encouragement, telling them the organization had been abolished by Imperial edict, and that he was subject to the further pleasure of the government.

CHINA NOTES.

The Echo de Chine states that the latest trials of the new French cruiser D'Entrecasteaux, which is under orders for the China station, have been very successful. Using her full power she made over 19 knots, and she did her twenty-four hours' continuous steaming at 17.8 knots, with a smaller consumption of coal than had been anticipated, while the working of her engines and boilers gave complete satisfaction.

H.M.S. Iphigenia returned to Shanghai from target practice on February 27th, we learn from China exchanges. Shooting was carried on under favourable conditions and excellent results were obtained, seventy per cent. of hits being recorded. At the commencement of the practice a unique incident took place, a shrapnel shell exploding in the target and setting it on fire.

The balance sheet of the Municipal Council of Shanghai shows that the total assets of the municipality amounted last year to Tls. 1,439,366, against which there are loans outstanding amounting to Tls. 1,066,800. The total ordinary revenue in 1898 was Tls. 753,370, and the ordinary expenditure Tls. 733,099; the extraordinary revenue (chiefly from loans) was Tls. 244,564, and the extraordinary expenditure Tls. 247,140. The budget for 1899 is very interesting. The ordinary income is estimated at Tls. 767,300 and the ordinary expenditure at Tls. 763,610; the extraordinary income at Tls. 145,000, of which the ratepayers are to be asked to authorize the raising of Tls. 110,000 by loan, and the capital expenditure, including the deficit from 1898, at Tls. 144,605. While revenue shows no great changes, in expenditure there is a large increase in the appropriation for the police, the estimate being Tls. 211,870 against an expenditure of Tls. 182,382 in 1898. The new loan is to be spent on public works which have been found indispensable and are estimated to cost Tls. 144,775. The increase in the Secretariat is very considerable as a glance at the following figures will show:—

	Estimate for 1898	Tls.
Secretary.....	5,000
Accountant.....	3,600
Two Assistants	4,600
	13,200
For 1899:—		Tls.
Secretary.....	7,200
Assistant Secretary	3,600
Accountant.....	3,900
Sub Accountant.....	3,100
Assistant, General Office	2,400

20,300

It must be borne in mind that the population of Shanghai now numbers nearly 350,000 souls. The death-rate among foreigners, we notice, is 16.2 per mille, which is considerably higher than the ratio at Yokohama.

News has been received at Foochow of the destruction by fire of the gaol at the Futsing district magistracy on the night of the 6th Feb., resulting in twelve prisoners being burnt to death and the escape to freedom of five. Four prisoners were recaptured, but not before receiving severe wounds at the hands of the soldiers sent after them. The fire was caused by the upsetting of a lamp on a quantity of straw, materials for making sandals by prisoners working in the industrial department of the gaol.

It is reported from Changking that Yü Mantse and about 3,000 followers have enrolled themselves as a battalion under the command of General Chou of Chengtu, and that Chiang and Tang, his notorious lieutenants, who refused to join, have been arrested and thrown into prison by the district magistrate of Pishan.

A new edition of the travels of MM. Hue and Gabet in Tartary, Tibet, and China, is to be published, and in their preface the publishers somewhat sarcastically remark:—"These gentlemen did not find in Tibet lost manuscripts of the Life of Jesus, nor do they describe the Tibetans as savages. Their half-dead servants did not take kodak pictures of them while being tortured on the rack. Nor did they use the powers of hypnotism in dealing with the Lamas and while being subjected to outrageous tortures. There is, in fact, nothing incredible in M. Hue's story, and yet, perhaps because of this reason, the book is far more interesting than any report that has since appeared." We notice from home papers that Mr. Savage Landor's tales of Tibet are being somewhat roughly handled by men who know something about the country. If his description of things Tibetan is anything like the "faked" experiences detailed in his book "Among the Hairy Ainsu," then they are assuredly not worth the paper they are printed on.

According to a Peking dispatch the electric railway between the Machispu terminus and the Yungting-gate of Peking will be ready for traffic by the 10th of March next. With reference to the Lu-Han Railway, at the end of the Chinese year about four miles of that new road had already been laid outside of the Paotingfu terminus.

The death occurred in Shanghai on the 26th Feb. of Herr C. Zedelius, M.D., physician to the German and Austro-Hungarian Consulates, and one of the medical attendants to the I.M.

Consulate. Dr. Zedelius was attacked recently with inflammation of the lungs, and, though every care was given him, he was not strong enough to rally from the attack. He was born at Oldenburg in 1852 and came to Shanghai in 1879 to join Dr. Goltburg, whom he succeeded in his practice. He was devoted to his profession and made himself very much liked and respected by all with whom he came in contact. He leaves a widow and four children.

The Peking correspondent of the N. C. Daily News writes:—

The Peking University has no fewer than 160 young men, mostly M.A.'s and licentiates, who are divided into classes for the study of English, German, Japanese, and Russian. Since the realization of this important reform project of the Emperor Kuang Hsü about two months ago, no fewer than two high Ministers of the Empress Dowager's Court have denounced the University in strong terms, namely Ch'ü Hsin (Manchu), President of the Board of Rites, and Hsü Fu (Chinese), President of the Board of War. Although the Empress Dowager is inclined to make these denunciations a pretext for closing up the University, some of her more politic advisers, such as Jung Lu and Prince Ching, are strongly advising her to refrain from making herself still more obnoxious to her people and the Foreign Ministers by such a step.

The Empress Dowager is evidently preparing to make another grand coup. It will be remembered that soon after the coup d'état of September 1st she caused the raising of a bodyguard of 10,000 young Tartars for her protection, and this large force was organized, armed, and officered by the end of December last. In the middle of January last she suddenly ordered the secret raising of 3,000 more young Tartars, selected by Jung Lu. This force was organized and armed with repeating rifles just before the last week of the last Chinese year. It is entirely officered by the Empress Dowager's kinsmen and these 3,000 men now act as a special guard around her quarters, wherever she may be residing, whether in Peking or at Eho Park, in addition to the regular force of Hosen and Foot Guards detailed for this duty by the Imperial Household Department. The majority of the people of Peking who sympathize with the Emperor in his present circumstances are afraid that his death will be announced within a month from now and it seems strange to them that the Foreign Powers do nothing to protect him, since he has been brought low for following their advice and representations.

With reference to the proposed Hankow-Canton Railway, the Chinese Director Chang Taotai, formerly Consul-General at Singapore, has informed his friends—says a contemporary—that the line will begin at Canton, pass Fatsan to the city of Samshui, on the West River. From this place the trunk line will go across and enter Hunan joining at Hankow the Lu-Han Railway. From Samshui again there will be constructed branch lines; namely, one to Koeilin, the capital of Kuangsi province, which will be called the Western branch line; while from Canton will be an Eastern branch line connecting that city with Huichou, thence to Swatow and northward into Fukien province. The Viceroy T'an has already detailed one Battalion of 500 men of the Chien Regiment to act as a guard to the workers on the new railway which it is intended to begin early in May next.

The remains of Mr. I. Wheeler, Chief Engineer-artificer, H.M.S. Phanis, were buried with full naval honours on March 1st, at the New Cemetery, Shanghai. Capt. Cochran and officers being present. Deceased, who was only in his fortieth year, was a native of Plymouth and had been 13½ years in the Service. He was only taken ill on Feb. 23rd, went to the hospital on the following Saturday, and died at 3 p.m. on Feb. 28th. A post mortem was held which proved death was caused by a combined attack of pneumonia and pleurisy. He leaves a widow and eight children.

It is now known definitely by wire that Mr. George Jamieson, C.M.G., will not return to Shanghai, having retired from the Consular Service, which losses in him, remarks the N. C. Daily News, one of the best men it has ever numbered in its ranks, and a man most popular both privately and as an official. Mr. Jamieson entered the Service as a student interpreter, after a competitive examination, in 1864, and became a 3rd class assistant in 1867, a 2nd-class in 1869, and a 1st class in 1872. In his service of nearly thirty-five years he has been at Taiwan, Chefoo, Pagoda Island, and Yokohama, where he was Acting Judge for a year and a-half, having been called to the Bar in 1885. At Shanghai he has been at various times Acting Law Secretary, Acting Assessor, Acting Interpreter, Acting Assistant Judge of the Supreme Court, Assistant Judge, Acting Judge, and Consul-General, the post which he was occupying with that of Commercial Attaché when his health broke down and he had to go home on leave. He lost his wife, who was most highly respected and valued in Shanghai, some three years ago, and of his three daughters two are now married. Although it has been feared that Mr. Jamieson's health would not allow him to come back to work, the knowledge that he has definitely resigned comes as a distinct blow, and the best wishes of every one who knows him will go with him in his retirement.

The N. C. Daily News of March 2nd says:—On the first of the flood, at one o'clock yesterday afternoon, the French mail steamer Sydney carried away her buoy shackle whilst swinging in the upper reach. The starboard anchor was immediately let go, but the wind that was blowing across the reach carried her over towards Pootung shore. On the tautening of the cable the vessel swung round with considerable force and fouled the P. & O. Co.'s tender Gutslaff which was at her buoy, the stem of the tender smashing in two of the steamer's plates and denting a third just abaft the after gangway on the port side. The heel of the mail steamer then touched the bank and she swung round head up river dragging her anchor home. Assistance was immediately summoned and Capt. Aubert of the Sydney engaged the five available tugs and every effort was made to tow the vessel off. A nine-inch hawser was also carried out to the Company's buoy and hove on by the powerful winches on board, but all to no avail. At five o'clock, as the water had fallen, the tow boats cast off. It is anticipated that the steamer will be towed off on this morning's high water.

The M. M. steamer Sydney, under her own steam and assisted by four tugs, came off the mud in the Shanghai river, on March 2nd. She seems to have sustained no injury.

For many years Shanghai has possessed a capital public band mainly supported by the Municipal Council. The musicians have always been Manila-men and now it seems that the troubles in the Philippines have so far turned their heads that the men refuse to serve the Shanghai ratepayers any longer unless their salaries and perquisites are considerably increased. Here is a chance for some of the Japanese "foreign music-makers" who now find living rather hard in Yokohama owing to the dearth of public entertainments.

A Russian school was opened on the 25th ultimo at Tientsin, specially built in its own grounds, owing to the fact that "it was the Russian Minister's desire to have it so"—at least, so it is reported amongst the Chinese in that port, says the N. C. Daily News. It seems that a class for the study of Russian was added to the English school at the Eastern Arsenal, but Viceroy Yü Lu was asked by the Russian officials to provide separate funds for the building and maintenance of an independent Russian School or College.

Mr. C. J. Dudgeon delivered an interesting speech at the fifth ordinary meeting of the Lao kong-mow Cotton Spinning and Weaving Co., Ltd. Having alluded to the varied experience of the year—the first six months' working was so favourable that an interim dividend of 4 per cent. was declared; but the second half-year's output subsequently led the Directors to regret their generosity—he gave an illustration of the "rigging" of the market that Chinese speculators had indulged in.

Taking as the basis the price of cotton in January, 1898, which then was abnormally high, the course of the market was in round figures as follows: from January to June the market rose some 12 to 15 per cent.; from June to September it fell (from June prices) between 25 and 30 per cent.; from September to the present date, the pendulum has again swung the other way, and there has been a rise from the lowest point of nearly 25 per cent., which in effect brings us back to the prices of January, 1898. The fluctuation between highest and lowest quotations during the 14 months has been (on lowest cost basis) very nearly 40 per cent. Now, gentlemen, it is clearly absurd that fluctuations such as this, which are entirely unwarranted by any movement in cotton prices in other parts of the world, should occur in Shanghai. The plain inference is that the still undeveloped condition, as may call it, of the Shanghai cotton market is being exploited by the cunning of native speculation. I venture to think, however, that this native manipulation of the local market rests upon such a slender foundation of ignorance and short-sightedness, that it can without much difficulty be checked. Cotton is a commodity which has what may be called a world's value, and it is absurd that such world's value of China cotton should be upset, to the extent which it has been, and is, by the cunning of the native speculators. There is reason to think that the present speculative rise will result in badly burnt fingers to its originators, but, however this may be, it seems to me that one means of preventing further repetition of this manipulation of market lies in combination among the foreign buyers; that, in fact, something in the nature of a Cotton Exchange be established, having for its object the regulation of local cotton prices in relation to world's value, and preventing the cotton sellers from playing off one buyer against another, which they certainly are doing at the present time.

Mr. Dudgeon said that the Company had been able to obtain supplies of cotton from abroad that allowed them to watch the market-rigging with complaisance; but such a condition of affairs was far from satisfactory, in view of the fact that the mills were originally started to spin Chinese cotton. In the latter part of his address, Mr. Dudgeon, referring to the stoppage of the night-work, said:—

The Company's experience of night-work has not been satisfactory; the work done is bad, the wages bill is high, and the wear and tear which day and night working entails upon the machinery is very great indeed; in fact expert opinion has been given that for every 1 per cent. depreciation that is written off for day-working, 2½ per cent. should be written off for day and night working. This of course means that the profit on night-work is very much less than that on day work. Further than this, the changing of the day and night shifts causes a disorganisation in the work of the mill entailing considerable loss. As an illustration, on the double shift system the workers going off one shift care little as to the state in which they leave the machines, knowing that it is someone else's business to put them right; but, more than this, a worker on one shift will deliberately leave a machine in a messed-up state in order to spite the incoming worker on the next shift. This is not done on the one-shift system when the only result of a carelessly left machine means loss of wages on the following day to the worker who is responsible for the trouble. It may be that when there is still further organisation of labour—when the desired industrial class has been created—and perhaps under circumstances of great profit in spinning, the resumption of night work may be desirable, but for the present the Directors are fully satisfied that a long day shift gives more satisfactory results than day-and-night working.

Shanghai papers report that telegrams have been sent by order of the Empress Dowager to the Generals commanding troops in Shansi, Shensi, Honan, and even as far west as Kansu province, to make all haste to assemble with their best troops in the vicinity of Peking and await orders there. Apropos of the above, the notorious General Tung Fu-shiang, Commander of the half-savage Kansu troops, now in Chihli province, has also had orders to present himself at Court, as the Empress Dowager "has need of him."

Li Hsing-chang is still engaged on his survey of the Yellow river. The story of his recall to Peking must therefore have been apocryphal.

CONSULAR APPOINTMENT TO YOKOHAMA.

The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung announces that Mr. Coates has been appointed H.I.G.M.'s Consul-General to Yokohama. Mr. Coates in 1886 was Vice Consul to the German Consulate-General at Yokohama, and Acting Consul in Kobe from 1887 to 1888. Later he was appointed H.I.G.M.'s Consul at Hong-kong, and then went to Christiania in a similar capacity. The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung also formally announces the appointment of Mr. R. von Krencki as H.I.G.M.'s Consul to Stockholm.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

We understand that the passenger lists homeward of the next two N.D.L. steamers—the Bayern and Prinz Heinrich—are filled to their utmost capacity, and berths can not be obtained on either.

The P. & O. Brindisi (registered tonnage 2,265 tons, gross 3,687 tons) was sold at public auction on Saturday morning for 50,000 yen, through Messrs. H. Lucas & Co., to Mr. Denbigh, a Vladivostok merchant. Messrs. Whymark and Thompson were the auctioneers. —Hogo News.

It is stated that the Japanese officials who have been making a tour of Europe with a view to obtaining a practical comprehension of the European educational systems have warmly reported in favour of the British. They admit the German to have a more definitely technical character, but technical education is already in a measure provided for in Japan, and it is also urged that the English system is more suited to the Japanese temperament.

Mr. Otani Kahei will attend the Philadelphia Commercial Conference to be held in October next as representing the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce. The Agricultural Department thinks it advisable to send as many representatives as possible from the Chambers of Commerce in Japan, and Mr. Kiuchi, Director of the Commercial and Industrial Bureau, will visit every Chamber on his way back from Kinshu to impress this on the officials. —Yoroku Choho.

How to get Indian tea into Tibet has long been a perplexing problem, and the valuable report of Captain Trench on the disastrous shrinkage of trade with Turkestan gives it additional importance. There is no question about the enormous advantage which would result could it be accomplished. The Tibetans are great tea-drinkers, and would be only too glad to get the Indian leaf instead of the refuse of the China market. Nor is it disputable that the tendency to over-production at the Indian tea gardens, which lowers prices more and more, would be kept in check if such a splendid outlet for the surplus as Tibet could only be secured. There, however, lies the difficulty; the country, although ostensibly under mere Chinese suzerainty, is governed by a host of Celestial officials who set their faces resolutely against the importation of Indian tea. Their main reason for this hostile attitude is that they make fine pickings out of the duties they levy on imports from China, a source of income which they believe would shrink miserably if the embargo on Indian competition were removed.

The Novos Vremya publishes an interview with the Japanese Minister to Russia on the present situation in Korea. M. Hayashi is represented as depicting the state of affairs in very dark colours, declaring that the country was in a condition bordering upon anarchy, and was a prey to political agitators of all shades, who aim simply at turning events to their own personal profit. The Japanese Government was consequently closely following the development of affairs, and was ready, by armed force if necessary, to protect the Japanese subjects residing in Korea, although without in any way aiming at the independence of the kingdom. M. Hayashi denied the existence of any special understanding between Japan and Great Britain. Japan, he added, only wished to see her subjects allowed freedom and tranquillity to pursue their avocations, and was firmly resolved faithfully to observe the agreement existing with Russia. Even if the present Japanese Cabinet left office, as appeared probable, the foreign policy of Japan would not be modified, more especially as the chief of the new Cabinet would probably be Marquis Ito.

The death is announced of General Annenkoff, the constructor of the Transcaspien Railway, by whom also the idea of a trans-Siberian Railway from European Russia to the Chinese frontier was also largely evolved and suggested. He was a kind of Napoleon of railway-making. His reply to a question with regard to the opening of the Central Asian Railway was characteristic. He was asked, "So you opened your railway on the right day, notwithstanding the rain, which was said to have washed away part of the line?" "When I fix a day," replied the General, "for opening a line, it is opened on that day, come rain or storm." General Annenkoff strongly advocated the project of an Anglo-Russian junction line. "We could make a branch from Merv to Herat without difficulty," he remarked, "if you would run your railway on from Pishin to Candahar to meet our line at Herat. If that was done I would undertake to deliver your reliefs, officers and men, for India at Candahar in nine days after leaving London."

The Budget of the Ministry for the Colonies has been presented to the French Chamber, and M. Doumergue, who drew it up, estimates that the increase for 1899 amounts to little less than five and three quarter million francs, while the whole Budget is about one hundred million francs, or four million pounds sterling. This is a considerable augmentation, and M. Doumergue thinks that it might easily be lessened. He thinks that the military budget for the Colonies is too great, and also that the local budgets will bear diminution. The civil officials are especially too numerous. In Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Réunion alone there are more than two thousand functionaries, some of whom are paid by the Home Government. If all these officials had to be paid by the Colony, the local councils would have less hesitation in demanding, or in acquiescing in, the abolition of many of these useless posts. The same evil exists in all the French Colonies. There are in all some eleven thousand functionaries employed in them, and the Home Authorities pay their salaries to the amount of nearly eight million francs. On the other hand, M. Doumergue urges the development of Colonial trade, if possible, without employing any more functionaries. The commerce of the French Colonies is already increasing slightly. It rose from 477 millions of francs in 1896 to 514 millions in 1897. With a careful development of trade and agriculture, and a diminution of unnecessary expenses, the French Colonial Empire may in course of time be made to pay.

JAPAN BREWERY COMPANY.

THE RECONSTRUCTION SCHEME.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Japan Brewery Company was held on Monday afternoon at the Company's office with the object of considering the following resolutions:—

- (1).—That it is desirable to reconstruct the Company, and accordingly that the Company be wound-up voluntarily, and that James Dodds and James Stewart be and they are hereby appointed liquidators for the purposes of such winding-up.
- (2).—That the said liquidators be and they are hereby authorized to consent to the registration of a new Company to be named The Japan Brewery Company, Limited, with the Memorandum and Articles of Association which have already been prepared with the privacy and approval of the directors of this Company.
- (3).—That the draft agreement submitted to this meeting and expressed to be made between this company and its liquidators of the one part and The Japan Brewery Company, Limited, of the other part be and the same is hereby approved, and that the said liquidators be and they are hereby authorized, pursuant to section 149 of the Companies' Ordinance 1865 of the Legislature of Hongkong, to enter into an agreement with such new Company (when incorporated) in the terms of the said draft and carry the same into effect with such modifications (if any) as they may think expedient.

Mr. J. Dodds (Chairman) presided, and there were also present Messrs. M. Kirkwood, H. Z. Wheeler, F. S. James, R. A. Wylie, A. B. Walford, W. Sutter, B. Gillett, R. Ward, W. R. Brinett, A. Woolley, R. J. Ward, Stradman, O. Hayne-mann, Veend Dier, H. Hecker (Chief Brewer), and J. Stewart (Secretary). These gentlemen represented 4,374 shares.

THE OBJECT OF THE MEETING.

The CHAIRMAN read the notice convening the meeting, which was as follows:—

The object of the reconstruction is to carry into effect the wish already expressed by the shareholders that the capital of the Company should be in Yen and not in dollars and that the shares should be uniform and not of different denominations as they are at the present time. Advantage has also been taken of this opportunity to recast the Memorandum and Articles of Association which in their old shape were the occasion of much difficulty and doubt.

At the above-mentioned meeting the resolutions necessary for carrying out the reconstruction will be proposed. A copy of them will be found on the other side. It is perhaps unnecessary to point out that the resolution for winding up is merely part of the machinery advised by counsel for effecting what is desired, and will not involve any disturbance of the business, since the new or reconstructed Company will step into the shoes of the existing Company.

The CHAIRMAN made a few introductory remarks, and read the resolutions passed by the two meetings of the company held in April and May of last year. He then read the draft agreement which had been drawn up by their legal adviser, which embodied the wishes of the shareholders as expressed in the resolutions which had already been passed. He added: I do not know that it is necessary for me to make any lengthy remarks on this subject. This agreement will be here for your approval until the next meeting, which will be called to confirm it if it is passed. Meanwhile there is one point to which I would call your attention. You will notice that the limit that the directors can pay out by way of dividend for the current year on the old shares is yen 45,000, or 30 per cent. for the year. I think that a few words are necessary to explain why that limit has been fixed. We have, as you are aware, increased our capital very largely, and that increase of capital is being used for the expansion of the Brewery plant, machinery, and premises in order to meet the increased business that we confidently expect from the increased consumption of beer in Japan and from the general tendency of events in the Far East. But this new capital will not be capable to any great extent of increasing the Company's earning capacity until next year, and meanwhile the new shares will have to rank for dividend with the old. Whilst the profits distributable as dividend for this year will exceed the sum of yen 45,000 unless some unfortunate event should occur we consider it will be wise to carry over to next year as large a sum as possible, so that we may next year find ourselves in a position to maintain, we hope, the same dividend on even larger capital, whilst much of it is not earning anything, as we now propose to pay on the old. If this be done it will not be very sanguine, perhaps, to have confidence in maintaining at least equally good dividends in future years. Our number of local shareholders has considerably increased and these should be of great value to the company if these shareholders will bear in mind that their personal efforts can be of great assistance to the Board. There is another point I would mention. You will notice that in the articles of association the directors are named for the new company. In the new articles the number of directors is limited to six, and those six are to be the old directors. That is being done under advice that in carrying out reconstruction it facilitates matters very much if the old and the new directors are the same. After the new company is reconstructed the number can be increased of necessity, but at present we think no changes are desirable. I think perhaps the best way will be to put these resolutions seriatim to the meeting, but possibly before doing so some of the shareholders may have some remarks to make on the reconstruction scheme itself. Of course it is to a large extent a technical document carrying out the wishes of the shareholders. The directors have followed the advice of their legal adviser in the matter.

None of the shareholders offered any remarks, and the resolutions were proposed from the chair and passed seriatim.

The CHAIRMAN—That closes the meeting. It is necessary for an interval of three weeks to elapse before the confirmatory meeting is held. I would suggest that the third Wednesday from this would be a convenient date, as it is desirable to have the matter completed within this month if possible.

This was agreed to.

AN EXPLANATION.

The CHAIRMAN—I will take this opportunity of referring to another matter. The Directors regret extremely that there has this winter been some beer placed on the market that was undoubtedly not good and was injurious to the reputation of Kirin. They think it their duty to take this opportunity of informing shareholders and the public that the cause of this inferior quality was not due to any change in the quality of material used nor to any alterations in the system of brewing, but was unfortunately caused by an accident to the machinery—an accident which there is no probability can occur again, and which, through temporarily raising the temperature of some of the cellars, affected the beer stored in them. Before the effects of the accident on the beer, which were greater than were expected, were detected it was put on the market. The pecuniary loss in the way of repairs was light, and these bad effects have for more than two months past disappeared, and the beer now being put on the market and the beer in the cellars is, the brewers feel confident, as good as any beer, that has ever left the Brewery. No question of cost of material will ever make your present Board depart from the rule, which has been the rule observed since the Brewery was started, of using only the very best malt and hops that can be purchased in Germany irrespective of price, and it is for this reason, as well as for the expert German brewers—the Brewery has now three skilled German brewers—that Kirin has maintained, and will still, they believe, maintain, its superiority over other beers brewed in the East.

The meeting then closed.

YOKOHAMA CEMETERY.

A general meeting of the Yokohama Foreign Community was held at Keil's Building on Thursday afternoon to take into consideration the appointment of trustees for the accumulated funds for the Yokohama General Cemetery. His Honour Judge Wilkinson presided, and there were also present, the Rev. E. Champneys Irvine, Messrs. J. F. Lowder, J. Dodds, J. P. Mellison, J. H. Brooke, H. Gauert, A. O. Gay, N. F. Smith, W. B. Walter, G. H. Allcock, and B. Gillett (Hon. Secretary).

Mr. Gillett was asked to act as Secretary of the meeting, and read the notice calling it.

His Honour Judge WILKINSON then said:—I have been asked by the committee to take the chair on this occasion, and I have responded to that request with very great pleasure. The place given to us by the Japanese Government for the burial of our dead is now being fast filled up, and the time is near at hand when fresh ground can no longer be opened there. Thanks to the care of successive Committees appointed by this community for taking charge of the cemetery that place has been kept in a condition which is a credit to the community. We all know how much that is due to the personal care of Mr. Gillett—(hear, hear)—and I wish on this occasion, as I have done on previous occasions, to express my own personal gratitude to Mr. Gillett for the care which he has taken of the place.—(Hear, hear.) The cemetery has been placed at our disposal free, and in the management of it funds have been accumulated without in any way preventing that care being taken of it which we should all wish to see taken. But the income is about in excess, or any rate be very seriously diminished, and it is right that the community should consider what steps can be taken to preserve it in that order in which it has been up to now and in which we should all like that it should be kept after we are no longer here to look after it. We might trust to those who come after us in this community to see that it is cared for, but if there are any means by which that burden can be lightened and by which the care of it can be secured it is only right that we now should take such steps as will be necessary and proper and right under all the circumstances. It appears that a sum has accumulated which is not absolutely necessary to spend at once, upon the cemetery. I have no doubt that it could be all expended on the cemetery with advantage, but it has appeared to the committee—and I for one would wish to express my concurrence in that view which they have taken—that the money can be better applied by forming a permanent fund in which a sum—perhaps a small sum—can be added from time to time for the necessary repairs and for the proper care of the Cemetery. A resolution will be proposed to you in that sense, and as I understand the resolution it is one suggested by the committee, and it is for the community themselves to determine whether that resolution shall be adopted, but I have no doubt that the community will endorse the view taken by the Committee and say that the money which has accrued from the management of the Cemetery should be applied for its further preservation. I shall ask Mr. Lowder to move the resolution.

Mr. LOWDER—Mr. Chairman, as a member of the community to which you have just alluded I have very great pleasure in proposing for the consideration and approval of this meeting a resolution which I understand meets with the approval of the Committee:—

Whereas in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that permanent provision be made for the maintenance and preservation of the grounds now used as a burial place for the members of the foreign community of Yokohama it is resolved that the Committee be and are hereby authorised and instructed, out of the moneys now in the credit of the Cemetery fund, to set apart the sum of 9,000 yen and by deed or declaration of trust to vest the same in the Committee of Yokohama General Cemetery for the time being in trust that the said sum shall by the Committee be securely invested or placed on fixed deposit with a bank or banks in Yokohama and so that the interest thereon shall alone be available and shall from time to time and at the discretion of the Committee be exclusively applied to the maintenance and preservation of the grounds heretofore and now set apart and used and known as the Yokohama General Cemetery.

Mr. WALTER seconded.

Mr. BROOKE said the resolution spoke of investing the money in the names of the Committee. The Committee was a changing body. Were they to understand that the Committee for the time being would always be the trustees for the Cemetery?

The CHAIRMAN said that was a legal question. Difficulties had arisen from time to time as to the succession of trustees, and so far as it could be done he should understand that by this resolution the Committee for the time being should be the trustees. It would be for any legal gentleman who should be working with the Committee to assist the Committee as far as possible.

Mr. LOWDER bowed assent to this latter proposition.

Mr. ALLCOCK pointed out that according to the deed of trust the interest alone of this money would be at the disposal of the Committee for the time being. The amount was about 9,000 yen, and that would perhaps yield 450 yen per annum. In the event of a serious disturbance a typhoon or anything of that sort, the expenses would considerably increase. Would it not be well to allow the Committee to have the option in such circumstances of reducing the capital instead of depending on the interest alone?

Mr. GILLETT—In reply to the remarks Mr. Allcock has made I may say the subject has received the attention of the Committee for some time past. In the event of a typhoon or something occurring and creating damage it will be a matter to call on the community generally to repair the damage. The interest on the amount of 9,000 yen is supposed to be set apart monthly to pay the wages of the work-people about the place. I think in regard to any extraordinary expenses which may occur the community will readily respond to any application that is made to them.—(Hear, hear.) Probably if we get a typhoon only once in three or four years it will not amount to anything very much. It will be much better to set apart this sum for the work-people instead of going to the community time on time when the cemetery has been closed up. I may add that the current wages amount to from 24 to 30 dollars monthly. The interest on this fund brings in 450 yen, and I think there will be some little left over to meet any particular emergency which may arise.

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously, and the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman for presiding and to the executors of the late Mr. Keil for the use of the room, on the proposition of Mr. GILLETT.

SHOOTING AFFAIR ON A SAILING SHIP.

A Board of Trade inquiry into the circumstances attending the death of William Hughes, boy on the British ship Haddon Hall, who was shot accidentally by another boy named Harloch on Jan. 11th, was held on Friday morning before Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, Consul.

Owen Prichard, master of the Haddon Hall, of Liverpool, said that on or about Jan. 11th, in latitude 6° 54' south and longitude 125° 30' west, the deceased was shot on board. They were passing through islands which were infested by dangerous savages, and for fear they should be boarded at night, being becalmed, he gave a loaded revolver to his chief officer, who he believed put it away in his drawer. It was a Smith and Wesson 32 bore weapon. This was a day or two days previous to the accident. On the 11th about seven a.m. Hughes was sent by the chief officer to wash his room out. Soon after a boy named Henry Harloch also went in to trim the lamps. Witness was asleep at the time, when he heard an unusual noise. He immediately jumped up, and, running on deck, saw Hughes standing by the cabin door. The chief officer was holding him, trying to nip a wound in his neck so as to stop the flow of blood. Witness ascertained that it was a bullet wound, and he tried to ascertain the direction the bullet had taken. While they were examining him deceased dropped on the deck from weakness. Witness asked him if he would have some brandy, but he would not have any. They carried him on to the main hatch under an awning. Deceased said he was going to die, and nothing could save his life. Some water was brought to him, but he declined to take it. Witness did all he knew of, but he saw the case was hopeless. Deceased died at ten minutes to eight, about 40 minutes after the accident. He was only conscious for 30 minutes after the accident. Witness thought the bullet must have gone right down into the stomach. Deceased was buried the same evening at five o'clock. Harloch looked very much frightened when witness saw him after the accident. Witness asked him some questions as to how the accident occurred, and he said he pulled the trigger of the revolver twice. The first time it missed fire. When he first saw deceased he was putting his hand to his abdomen as if he had cramps there.

Dr. Wheeler was at this point asked to give his opinion as to the cause of death, and he interrogated both the captain and the boy Harloch. The latter explained that when the revolver was fired deceased was in a kneeling position, and he (Harloch) was standing above him. When the shot was fired deceased got up and walked out of the room.

Dr. Wheeler said from the fact of the deceased putting his hand to his abdomen it would appear that the bullet had effected the phrenic nerve. He should have thought the vertebral column was injured, but for the Captain's statement that there was no sign of paralysis. There was evidently internal hemorrhage, and possibly one of the large arteries might have been torn by the bullet. He was of opinion that with such a wound no medical aid could have been of any service.

The Captain added that the accused was a delicate boy. His conduct was everything that could be desired, and he was a general favourite with everybody.

Harry Harloch said he went into the mate's room to trim the lamp, and found deceased washing the floor. He said, "Have you seen the mate's revolver?" Witness said, "No," and deceased was going to open the drawer where it was when witness opened it before him and took it out. Witness held it with the muzzle in his left hand, and the trigger in his right, and accused was about two feet to the left of him. Witness pulled the trigger once, and it missed fire. He pulled it a second time, and the charge exploded. Before witness pulled the trigger accused told him that the mate had taken out the cartridges. After witness pulled the trigger the first time accused knelt down to wash the floor, but still looked at the revolver with interest. He was then three or four feet away. Witness was holding the revolver in one hand when he pulled the trigger the second time, and it must have been pointing in deceased's direction. Deceased jumped up suddenly from the floor when the shot was fired, and uttered an exclamation. He then went out of the room. Witness put the revolver back in the drawer and followed deceased outside. He was leaning against a rail about 10 feet away. Witness had never had a firearm in his hands before. He took it from the drawer out of mere curiosity. When he took it out he was not certain whether it was loaded or not; but when deceased told him it was not loaded he took it for granted that was correct, and after the first shot he had no doubt whatever that the chambers were empty. He had been on the best of terms with deceased.

Thomas Jones, mate of the Haddon Hall, said he heard the report of a pistol, apparently from his cabin. He ran aft, and met Hughes coming out of the cabin, with both hands on his neck, and blood running out between his fingers. Deceased went forward, but witness took him aft to place him on the hatch. The captain then came out and examined him. He was looking very pale, his lips were blue, and the flesh round the wound was burnt and black.

The revolver was here produced, and examined, and witness said anyone who had a knowledge of fire arms could see whether it was loaded or not if it was held in the proper way. When witness sent Hughes into his room he thought possibly one of the boys might find the revolver, and he went into the room to take out the cartridges. He did so, and looked round for a little box to put them in, but could not find one, and as he did not find one, and did not like to put the cartridges loose in the drawer he replaced them in the chambers. He could not tell why Hughes told Harloch that he (witness) had unloaded the revolver.

The Captain, asked to explain why the revolver missed fire the first time, said it was probably because it had not been in use for some time, and the clogging of the oil prevented the hammer striking with sufficient force to explode the cartridge.

William Owen, able seaman, also gave evidence.

The finding of the Court was that the deceased died from the results of a bullet wound accidentally inflicted by Harloch, who was ignorant of the revolver being loaded, and that nothing could be done by the officers after the accident to save deceased's life.

Mr. Bonar then called forward the boy Harloch, and addressed him as follows:—I think no doubt that you are more sorry for this than any one else can be and this will be a warning to you—and no one could have a more serious warning—as to the use of firearms. The occurrence is finished, but you must remember that causing the death of someone else by your own carelessness is a very sad business. I hope you will never handle firearms carelessly again.

WASH'D OVERBOARD IN A HURRICANE.

A Board of Trade Inquiry was held at the British Consulate, Yokohama, on Saturday morning before Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, Consul, as to the death of Owen Smith, an able seaman on the British Barque Fiery Cross, on the 23rd February, at sea.

Albert James Kain, master of the Fiery Cross, said previous to the accident they had had hard gales and a tremendous sea. On the morning of the accident witness gave orders to "wear ship." There was a great sea running, and they were close to a lee shore in latitude 32° 40' N. longitude 131° 0' E. The sea was breaking right over the ship. Owen Smith was on deck about 3.30 a.m. going along with other men, and witness received a report that he had been washed overboard. A life buoy and lines were thrown overboard after him. The ship was going about a knot or a knot and a half at the time; it was then calm. The deceased was on the quarter about five or six yards from the ship when witness saw him. It was very dark and rainy and the deceased apparently could not grasp the lines thrown to him. Witness did not know if deceased could swim; he did not think swimming would have been of any avail. Witness called the crew to man a boat, but they all said it was madness to do so. The man and a boat which had been washed overboard were then at least five hundred yards astern. The weather was not fit for a man to go over the side with a line to deceased's assistance; he would have been dashed to pieces. The only thing left for witness to do was to get the ship to the wind, as she was close on a lee shore, and all their lives were in danger. They were to the north of Van Diemen's Strait, and 15 to 20 miles from shore. It was a bad coast, and witness was being driven to leeward by the heavy easterly sea. Witness therefore got his ship to the wind. The main hatches, and the side of the house, were stove in by the same sea which washed deceased over.

W. H. Gascoe, boatswain, said between three and four on the morning in question he gave the order to square the fore yard. It was very dark. Two men left the poop before witness did, one being deceased. The sea was running south to east, and the ship heading north-west. A tremendous sea broke over the ship, and witness "sang out" a warning. He saw immediately afterwards a man swept overboard, and was told it was deceased. Witness made his way to the poop and saw a life line heaved overboard. The Captain afterwards suggested manning a boat, but witness pointed out that it would be useless, and that the ship was dangerously close to the lee shore.

A seaman named Maclean said he was on deck when the sea broke on the ship, and saw deceased in the water four or five yards from the ship. The man at the wheel threw a line overboard and witness thought accused had caught it, but he failed to hold it. The Captain then threw the life buoy. The Captain asked for volunteers to man a boat, but witness and others thought it would be endangering their own lives without being able to do anything for deceased. Witness believed deceased could swim a little. Smith was able to shout when he was washed overboard. They roared out to him to catch hold of the boat which had been washed overboard at the same time, and deceased shouted back, "Where is she?"

A seaman named Allen also gave evidence. If an attempt had been made to lower a boat it would, he said, have been at once broken to pieces.

Hugh Caird said he was at the wheel at the time of the accident. He heard a cry and saw deceased in the water. He threw a rope as far as he could towards deceased, and witness thought deceased had caught it until the line was drawn in slack. The Captain came out a few seconds after and threw a life buoy. He thought nothing further could have been done for the deceased.

In answer to Mr. Bonar the Captain said there were five buoys, all on the poop. There were no lines attached to the buoys.

Mr. Bonar said he had no doubt everything possible was done, but it struck him it would be well to have lines attached to the buoys.

The finding of the Court was that deceased was washed overboard and drowned and that everything possible was done by the Captain and crew to save him.

Kobe, March 7, 5.55 p.m.
The severest shock of earthquake experienced since 1891, was felt here at 9.55 this morning. Great alarm was caused, the people everywhere rushing out of their houses into the streets.

No serious damage is reported in the immediate neighbourhood of Kobe, but at Osaka a portion of the Boseki Kaisha mill collapsed, killing and injuring no fewer than sixteen persons. Other damage of a minor nature is reported.

No reports of damage are to hand from Kyoto. The shock was felt with great severity at Gifu, but no damage was done.

NEWS FROM PARIS.

Paris, March 8.

The Senate, by a vote of 125, has decided to proceed with the discussion of articles of the project of law having for its object to entrust to the Court of Cassation, that is to say, to all the Chambers united, the revision of the Dreyfus case. M. Dupuy, the Premier, raised the question of confidence. During the morning visits were made to the offices of various associations and political groups of the Opposition, and numerous papers were seized.

The condition of Pope Leo XIII. is causing uneasiness. He has been obliged to undergo an operation in his leg.

The Spanish Cabinet has tendered its resignation in consequence of the impossibility of obtaining a majority in the Senate to approve the cession of the Philippines.

Paris, March 3.

The Senate has adopted the project of procedure by 153 votes to 131.

The Pope is better. His speedy recovery is hoped for.

Saigon, March 5.

In the affair of Colonel Picquart' appeal against appearing before the court martial, the Court of Cassation has issued a ruling rendering Picquart justiciable by the court martial with regard to certain counts and justiciable by the Assize Court with regard to others.

The Senate has elected M. Fallières by 131 votes against 85 for M. Constans.

M. Fallières was Minister of Home Affairs in 1882; Minister of Foreign Affairs, ad interim, and of Public Instruction in 1883; Minister of Home Affairs in 1887; Minister of Justice in 1889, and again Minister of Justice in 1890. M. Constans is a Senator, and was formerly Ambassador at Constantinople.

France and England have come to an agreement that France shall have at Muscat a coal depot under the same conditions as those obtaining in England's case.

M. Silvela, Conservative, has formed a new Cabinet in Spain.

Paris, March 4.

The Government will demand of the tribunals the dissolution of all illegally constituted Leagues. It is confidently stated that no proof has been found of the existence of a Royalist plot.

DISASTROUS EXPLOSION IN FRANCE.

Saigon, March 6.

The powder magazine at Lagoubran, near Toulon, exploded at 2 a.m. to-day. The magazine was razed to the ground, and about one-fourth of Lagoubran was destroyed. Sixty persons were killed and a hundred and ten wounded. The cause of the catastrophe has not yet been ascertained.

Later.

The number of persons killed by the explosion near Toulon is more than 50. It is believed that the explosion was of spontaneous origin, and that its cause was the fermentation of the powder.

Saigon, March 9.

The sad ceremony of interring about a hundred victims of the explosion at Lagoubran took place to-day.

The sentry on duty at the Melinite Magazine of Toulon was attacked during the night by a band of six men. Dynamite cartridges were found which had been placed against the Arsenal. There is much excitement in the town.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Saigon, March 7.

The public discussion of the revision of the Dreyfus case will commence on the 10th of March.

MUSCAT.

Saigon, March 8.

M. Delcassé, Minister of Foreign Affairs, speaking in the Chamber of Deputies, announced that England had hastened to recognise the right of France to establish a coal depot at Muscat, and that the British Government had expressed its regret with regard to the proceedings of its agents.

THE COLONIAL BUDGET.

The Chamber has adopted the Budget for the Colonies.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

THE POPE'S ILLNESS.

London, March 2.

The Pope having had a prolonged swoon; has been ordered to bed, and absolute repose is enjoined by his medical advisers. He is somewhat better.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

Herr von Bülow, German Foreign Minister, in a speech in the Reichstag, stated that, unless the culprits who perpetrated outrages upon Germans at Tientsin are severely punished, or if such outrages be repeated, China would incur grave consequences.

Referring to the Anglo-German Agreement, the speaker said that it deals rather with future contingencies than actualities.

THE CHURCH QUESTION IN ENGLAND.

The English Church Union has decided to memorialize the Queen, the Archbishops, the Bishops, and both Houses of Parliament, denying the right of the Crown or of Parliament to determine the doctrine, discipline, or ceremonial of the Church of England, and stating that the Union is not prepared to barter the principles of the Church for establishment or endowment.

THE DISTINGUISHED PATIENTS.

London, March 3.

The Pope is doing well. Rudyard Kipling is improving.

LORD HERSCHELL DIES SUDDENLY.

Lord Herschell has died suddenly at Washington, D.C.

[The Right Hon. Barrister Herschell was the son of a clergyman, was born in 1837, called to the bar in 1860, made a Q.C. in 1872, was made Solicitor General and knighted under the Liberal Government of 1880, was raised to the peerage in 1886, and made Lord Chancellor. He also acted as Lord Chancellor in the Gladstone-Rosebery administration of 1892-95. He was a sound lawyer, a fair speaker, and a man of solid, though by no means brilliant parts. At the time of his death he was representing his country on the Anglo-American-Canadian Commission.—J.M.]

THE DREYFUS BILL PASSES.

The Senate has passed the Dreyfus Bill. SAGASTA CABINET RESIGNS.

The Sagasta Cabinet has resigned, having met violent opposition in the Cortes.

HOLLAND APPRECIATIVE OF JAPAN'S PROGRESS.

The Second Chamber of Holland has passed a bill placing Japanese on an equal footing with Europeans in the Dutch East Indies.

THE "TIMES" ON ITALIAN DEMANDS IN CHINA.

The Times, in a leading article, sympathizes with Italian demands for concessions in Che-kiang province. It hopes that the British Foreign Office will grasp the true condition of affairs before too late, as China is breaking up, its future lying with nations who understand what to do.

ENGLAND APPROVES ITALIAN DEMAND.

London, March 4.

It is believed here that Great Britain has approved the Italian demand for the lease of San-moon Bay.

THE NEWCHWANG RAILWAY AGREEMENT.

Replying to a question about Russia's protest against the terms of the Newchwang Railway agreement, Mr. W. St. John Brodrick, Parliamentary Secretary to the Foreign Office, said that the Government regarded the engagements of China thereon as binding.

BRITISH ARMY ESTIMATES.

Mr. Geo. Wyndham, Under Secretary for War, in introducing the Army estimates, said that the country must face the fact of new burdens, the Empire being placed under additional responsibilities. He added that the colonial troops, including those at Wei-hai-wei, now numbered 31,991.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PROMOTION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

London, March 5.

Rear-Admiral Dewey has been promoted to be Admiral and Colonel Otis to be Major-General, in recognition of distinguished services.

THE NEWCHWANG QUESTION.

A despatch to the Daily Graphic states that the British Minister, Sir Claude MacDonald, assured the Tsungli Yamen that China may rely on the support of Great Britain in resisting any attempt that may be made to force her to repudiate the Newchwang contract.

NEW SPANISH CABINET.

Signor Silvela has formed a Conservative Cabinet.

The Cortes have been dissolved.

EXPLOSION OF NAVAL MAGAZINE NEAR TOULON.

A naval magazine near Toulon exploded, involving the death of all the soldiers on duty and of many inhabitants. Forty of the dead bodies have already been recovered.

THE TOULON EXPLOSION.

London, March 7.

A further report from Toulon puts the killed at 60 and injured at 100, as the result of the explosion of the naval magazine.

SAN-MOON OCCUPIED.

The Rome correspondent of the Daily Chronicle reports that official despatches have been received intimating that Italian Marines have landed and occupied San-moon.

THE HOOLEY AFFAIR.

The Official Registrar has ordered the prosecution of Hooley on offences against the Debtors' Act.

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

London, March 8.

The whole Court of Cassation has assembled to try the Dreyfus case; but the public hearing is not likely to be fixed before the 10th of April.

MUSCAT.

M. Delcassé, Foreign Minister, speaking in the Chamber of Deputies, said that the British Government recognizes the identical rights of France and England in Muscat, and that the same Government had expressed profound regret to France for the incorrect, spontaneous action of one of its agents.

The Times comments on the divergence between this statement and those made in the British Parliament, and says, if the latter are correct, the local agents (at Muscat) deserve commendation, and not repudiation, for apparently their action has baffled the original designs of France.

THE KAISER AND MR. KIPLING.

Kaiser Wilhelm, as an enthusiastic admirer of his unrivalled works, has cabled enquiries after Kipling's condition.

THE ITALIAN DEMAND.

FRANCE DENIES GIVING ADVICE.

London, March 9.

It is positively denied at Paris that France had advised the Tsung-li Yamen to reject the Italian demands, which she approved.

ITALIAN REINFORCEMENT.

Admiral Grenet on board the Stromboli sails from Venice in a few days, to take command of the Italian squadron of six ships concentrating in Chinese waters.

THE MUSCAT AFFAIR.

BRITISH COUNTER-DECLARATION.

The Hon. St. John Brodrick, Under Secretary to the Foreign Office, speaking in the House of Commons, said that the Government had expressed no disapproval of the action of the British Agent at Muscat, which was taken under its instructions.

The English and French Press are discussing the discrepancy between the statements of M. Delcassé and Mr. Brodrick.

The Times regards M. Delcassé's declaration as transparently misleading and suggests the publication of the official papers.

THE ITALIAN DEMAND AND THE POWERS.

Peking, March 3.

The Italian demand being supported by England, it is supposed that the rest of the Powers will make no objection in the matter.

ENGLAND WILL SUPPORT JAPAN.

It is thought here that England will not object should Japan propose to the Chinese Government the establishment of a coaling station at an important point in the province of Fukien.

THE DEMAND REFUSED.

Peking, March 4.

The Chinese Government has refused to countenance the Italian demand, and sent back the documents.

THE ATTITUDE OF ENGLAND.

The Chinese Government is much irritated by the attitude of England in the affair.

FRANCE FOREWARNED CHINA.

France acquainted the Chinese Government several days ago with the intended demand of Italy, and the Tsung-li Yamen had already been resolved upon the course to be taken in the affair.

RESOLUTION OF ITALY.

The Italian Government will attempt a military occupation on the arrival in Chinese waters of the three newly despatched men-of-war.

ALLEGED PLEDGE OF THE SHANHAIKWAN-NEUCHWANG RAILWAY.

It having got abroad that the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang Railway had been hypotheated against the Chinese loan, Russia has sent in a protest.

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL")

Manila, Feb. 21.

The chief leaders of the important sugar-producing island of Negros have made a declaration which is likely to have great influence in the settlement of the disturbances in the Southern Philippines.

After a conference with Brigadier-General Marcus P. Miller at Iloilo, the Filipino leaders returned to Silay, a large town in the North of the island of Negros, and the American flag was hoisted amidst great enthusiasm.

The Filipino Commissioners then came on to Manila, and had a conference with General Otis, in the course of which they intimated their desire to resume their peaceful occupations under American protection.

Important developments are expected.

An extensive conflagration has taken place at Paco, a suburb of Manila. It is beyond doubt that the fire was due to incendiarism by sympathisers with the rebels.

Manila, Feb. 23.

Last night, Filipino sympathisers with the rebels set fire to numerous houses in the districts of Santa Cruz, Tondo, Binondo, and a huge conflagration resulted.

The English Fire Brigade, co-operating with the American soldiery, turned their attention to checking the spread of the conflagration, and they did splendid work in prevailing the spread of the flames to the Escolta, which is the principal business quarter of the city.

Upwards of fifteen hundred houses were destroyed.

In the excitement which prevailed large numbers of rebels were successful in evading the lines and entering the city. Many Filipinos were killed, and numerous arrests were made.

To-day, the fires were renewed in other districts of the city, but thanks to the vigilance of the American authorities the native rising proved abortive.

Manila, Feb. 24.

A quiet night has been experienced in the city. Two small fires occurred, but the precautions taken by the authorities to prevent incendiarism by Filipinos proved effective.

Mr. C. F. Simpson, foreman weaver, in the Manila Trading Co.'s Cotton Mills at Tutuban, who was shot in the stomach in the fighting which took place in the neighbourhood of the mills, has died from the effects of his injuries.

It was John Haslam, not J. Ellis, who was the other man wounded. He is not seriously injured.

In the skirmishing outside the city on the previous night the rebels lost heavily in the district between Caloocan and Tondo.

JANOWSKI AND PILLSBURY.

Pillsbury has accepted Janowski's challenge under certain conditions which may prevent the match. Pillsbury stipulates that no one, unless personally agreeable to him, shall have anything to do with the match or its arrangements. He also wants all the profits from the publication of the news, etc., to be divided between himself and Janowski, and stipulates that they shall supply the reports themselves, allowing no newspaper reporters to be present; that the match shall be played in a private room, and that no one shall be admitted without the consent of both players. On receiving this letter, Janowski gave out a statement to the effect that he would only play in public, and that he would insist that the newspapers reporters should have the news of the games free of charge.

Drawn by perpetual check.

Notes by James Mason in The British Chess Magazine.

(a) Letting out Black's Queen's Bishop—truly no great matter, seeing that he may isolate the Queen's Pawn—no great matter either. A comparatively light and open game ensues, agreeable to the genius of both players.

(b) A move later.—White Bishop having now a good retreat, as it were, behind the Rook.

(c) With this, and the advance of his Bishop's Pawn, White secures a fine attacking position. Black can hardly afford to exchange, and have his Knight driven away from f3; for then his Queen's Pawn would be in danger, and the operations against his King no less formidable than they actually appear. Any way, the defense is extremely difficult.

(d) To guard the Q P. If Kt to B sq; 16—P to B5, and may be, 17—B takes Kt, loss would be almost inevitable. So, the weakening 16..... P to K3 must come.

(e) It is said that Mr. Showalter afterward expressed an opinion that 17—P to B5 would have been stronger, an opinion which seems to be perfectly correct. The clearing of the Bishop's file in that way, at expense of the exchange, would greatly intensify his attack—already very nearly irresistible.

(f) Of course Black sees he loses a Pawn in consequence of this, but he diverts his adversary's main attack, and, on the whole gets off rather cheaply.

(g) No hurry to take the Knight. 30—P to K4 seems stronger. Then, if 30..... R to Kt2, 31—B to B2, Black's course would not be so simple—in order to arrive at a Draw.

(h) The Rook is no longer wanted to defend, as the Bishop can not be easily driven off from K3. Mr. Janowski's play is very ingenious.

(i) Or, perhaps better, 33—B to B4. The ending is indifferently conducted by White. When Black recovers his Pawn, as he does presently, a Draw naturally results.

OUR PROBLEM-SOLVING COMPETITION.

W.H.S. as usual heads the list of solvers, having sent 43 correct solutions of last year's problems. The following is the list of the six principal solvers:—

W.H.S.	43

Miss S.	13

The prize offered by the Chess Editor—a valuable work on chess—falls thus to W.H.S. who indeed deserves great credit for his exceptional abilities in solving.

NOTES.

Lasker has been showing splendid form in Scotland, says an exchange. On two successive evenings at Glasgow he played in all 52 simultaneous games, winning 50, drawing 2, and losing 0! On each occasion his time was but a little over three hours. These are vastly different performances from some we have seen in England, and we imagine that in a considerable measure the change is due to the fact that gambits and lighter openings have entered more largely into the play of the champions. One notable incident is that he lost an Evans gambit, opened by Sheriff Spens, this being a single-handed off-hand game. At Stirling Mr. Lasker encountered twenty-five opponents, of whom 24 were defeated, while one, Mr. Henderson of Perth, was successful in winning. At Edinburgh out of 27 games he won 24, drew 1, and lost 2 (to Messrs. D. V. Mills and J. H. Graves, of the Northampton County team).

M. Rosenthal, the great chess player, has been giving M. Balashoff, a Russian amateur, for 26,000f. for a journey to Stuttgart in October, 1896, to give him lessons. The Court has awarded 15,000f. being the sum promised. Rosenthal was the French chess champion of about ten years ago. He was, however, not so good a player as Zukertort to whom he lost in a match of several games. He appears to have retired from chess altogether several years ago and to have been succeeded by Janowski, the present leader of French chess.

SINGAPORE CHESS CLUB.

For the championship competition there have entered Su Lionel Cox, Messrs. C. W. Banks, A. L. Chittenden, L. M. Cordova, W. Craig, J. B. Elcum, P. McIntyre, T. R. Miles, W. Mosbergen, G. S. Reutens, and P. A. Reutens. Play has already commenced and the tournament is expected to be very lively.

YOKOHAMA CHESS CLUB.

There was an exceptional large attendance at last Thursday's chess meeting. In all three members appeared—that is two more than usual—and the happy coincidence was celebrated by a consultation game. It was not such a bad game either considering the standard of our players. We give the score without further comment:—

According to the latest investigations the number of foreigners in Tokyo is 921.

The Tonnage Bill has been passed by the Peers as presented by the Government.

It is announced that Mr. Chinda, Minister in Brazil, will be appointed to Brussels.

POSTAL rates, telephone charges, and railway fares will be raised throughout Japan on April 1st.

A heavy gale prevailed in the Yokohama-Tokyo district on Wednesday night and telegraphic communication with the south was temporarily suspended.

DYSENTERY is prevalent in Kanagawa Prefecture, six cases having appeared in Yokohama during the last month.

COURT WEDL, the newly appointed Secretary of the German Legation, arrived per steamer China on Monday.

MR. TAKAHASHI KOREKIYO, of the Yokohama Specie Bank, was appointed Vice-President of the Bank of Japan on the 28th ultimo.

THE scene of the manoeuvres of the Standing Squadron has been changed. They will take place between Kyushu and Suruga Bay.

A MARINE named Inamura (26), belonging to Yokosuka, who had been charged with murder, was sentenced to death on the 17th inst.

THE sale of the Asahi Shimbun's issue of Feb. 27th has been prohibited on account of containing matter injurious to public morals.

CAPTAIN GEO. CONNER, for so many years Commander of one of the N.Y.K. Shanghai mail boats, was married in Yokohama on Tuesday.

MARQUIS YAMAGATA and other Ministers of State will entertain the members of both Houses of the Diet at the Imperial Hotel on the 10th instant.

THE last football match of the season was played on Yokohama on Wednesday afternoon, resulting in a win for the juniors by two goals to one.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha will open its new line between Tamsui, Amoy, and Hongkong, from April 1st. The Maisuru Maru will be placed on the line.

THE cruiser Akashi at Yokosuka, and the despatch boat Miyako at Kure, have been completed, and trial trips have been made with very satisfactory results.

MR. ODAORI, Consul in Shanghai, has proceeded to Nanking, and Mr. Kato, Consul in Chungking, to Sueng-tu, to enquire into the rebellious prevailing there.

THE trouble among the staff of the Bank of Japan has been dealt with in drastic fashion, the resignations of the discontented being accepted in every instance.

AT 11.30 p.m. on Tuesday a fire took place at the residence of Amenomiyama Toyofuro, Nichome, Tsukiji, Tokyo, resulting in the destruction of two houses.

THE Sennenji Temple, Bakan, Choshu, has in contemplation the erection of a large bell in memory of the patriots who lost their lives during the Japan China War.

SINCE last year much damage has been done by gales to the famous Isukubahina Shrine, Aki. It is now in contemplation to re-build the shrine at a cost of yen 100,000.

A young clerk in the employ of Messrs. Butterfield and Swire has just died at Shanghai from hydrophobia. He came to Japan for treatment but only lived to land in China.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING is seriously ill with pneumonia at a hotel in New York, both of his lungs being affected. The only chance of recovery is his personal tenacity to life.

It is reported that Mr. Kato, Japanese Minister in London, intends to retire, and that Mr. Kurino, Minister in Paris, will be appointed in his stead, Mr. Tsuzuki, Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, succeeding the latter.

ONE hundred and eighty members of the Imperial Diet left Shimbashi by the 7.40 train on Monday morning for Yokosuka, where they inspected the newly built warship Akashi.

ABOUT 11 p.m. on Sunday fire broke out in a house occupied by Takeuchi Gosaburo, Hirazuka Inura, Ehara-gori, Tokyo, and destroyed two houses. This is the nineteenth case of fire in the district this year.

AN IMPORTANT CASE.

We learn from Kobe journals that the Mascarenhas case is likely to come before the Courts once more. This case occupied a great deal of attention some years ago. In 1870, a Portuguese subject, Mr. J. S. Mascarenhas, leased from a Japanese a plot of land outside the Kobe Settlement at an annual rent of 4 yen, paying also 900 bu, or 300 yen, for the buildings on the land. The rent was doubtless fair at the time. At least the owner of the land was content to let it on those terms. As for the form of the lease, there is, we believe, a difference between the Japanese wording and the English wording; but that point need not concern us here. It is enough to say that the lease was for an unlimited period. The official arrangement under which these extra-Settlement leases are made at Kobe provides that "all foreigners occupying ground and houses within the extra-Settlement limits are liable for payment of the same municipal charges or Government land tax as are paid by Japanese subjects." Mascarenhas ought, therefore, to have been responsible for the taxes on the land. That responsibility remained with the landlord, however, for reasons which we do not understand, and as the conditions of the place changed, the taxes increased gradually, until they far exceeded the amount of the rent. Under these circumstances the landlord appealed to the Japanese courts, and obtained a judgment raising the rent from 4 yen to 107.43 yen. Mascarenhas was then under Japanese jurisdiction, in common with all Portuguese subjects. Rendered uneasy by this experience, he transferred the land to an American citizen, in order that any further enterprises against him should be tried in a Consular Court. Now the official arrangement referred to above provides that "when a foreigner and a Japanese have made an agreement for leasing ground * * * each agreement must be reported by the respective parties to the Japanese Authorities and to the Consul of the nation concerned, in order that the agreement may be sealed and registered on both sides as proof of validity." Mascarenhas duly reported the matter to the Portuguese Vice-Consulate, but the Japanese landlords—there were now two of them—did not report it to the Japanese Authorities. In fact, they refused to do so, and, on the contrary, instituted proceedings to have the rent raised, on the ground that they had not been consenting parties to the transfer, that they would not consent to it on the former terms, and that it was consequently invalid. The Court admitted this plea and doubled the rent. It would, of course, have been competent for Mascarenhas to surrender the land, but he preferred to keep it. In fact it is pretty plain that the ultimate object of the landlords was to recover possession of it. The next incidents were the death of Mascarenhas, and an attempt to transfer the land to his heirs. Again the Japanese owners refused to register the transaction. They also declined to receive the rent, which was nevertheless duly paid by Mascarenhas' executor into official hands. Things remained thus for some time, until suddenly the landlords agreed to register the transfer and receive the rent. But their complacency was not a sign of resignation. It was simply due to the discovery that in the new Civil Code perpetual leases are not recognised, and that if a lease of land has been concluded for an indefinite period, a law court, on the application of either party, may fix a time for its duration, not less than 20 years and not more than 50.

The interesting point in this matter is that any leases of unlimited period now existing between foreigners and Japanese with respect to extra-Settlement lands, are liable to be treated as the Mascarenhas lease will probably be treated by the courts. That is a fact to which we drew attention long ago. Perpetual leases of lands within the Foreign Settlements are specially protected; but leases of extra-Settlement lands fall within the unrestricted purview of the laws of the empire. There is a proposition in Kobe to raise a public fund for the defense of this Mascarenhas case. Such a step appears to us to be quite useless. The Courts of Japan can not ignore the Codes, and the Civil Code provides, with the utmost explicitness, that a lease like that of Mascarenhas may be limited by order of the Court. There is, however, a curious ambiguity. Dr. Lönholm, in his translation of the 268th article of the Code, says:—"The Court may, on the application of a party interested, fix the duration of the right at from 20 to 50 years;" and in his treatise on "The Condition of Foreigners under the New Treaties," he writes, "the Court, on the application of either party, must fix a time for its duration, not less than 20 or more than 50 years from the time of its beginning." Mr. Gubbins' translation of the same Article is:—"A Court of Law shall, on the application of the parties, determine the period of the duration within the limits of 20 and 50 years." It will be observed that there are two differences here. Dr. Lönholm speaks of an application by either party; Mr. Gubbins, of an application by both parties. It is a fundamental difference, for if both parties have to apply before the Court can take action, a one-sided application like that now made in the Mascarenhas case would be insufficient. Looking at the Japanese text, we find that the word employed is tōjisha, which may be translated either "the parties concerned" or "a party concerned." It appears to us, however, that the latter interpretation must be accepted, for evidently if both parties are agreed as to the necessity of fixing a term, there can be no reason to apply to a Law Court. Besides, the superficiary is explicitly entitled to relinquish his right of superficies at any time, if the original superficies is for an indefinite period, and he has consequently no occasion to seek the intervention of a Law Court. Evidently the Code refers to an application by the lessor only. The second point of difference is that the period of from 20 to 50 years fixed by the Court is reckoned according to Dr. Lönholm, from the date, of the beginning of the superficies, whereas Mr. Gubbins' translation does not indicate any manner of reckoning. Dr. Lönholm's actual translation, indeed, is virtually identical with that of Mr. Gubbins, but his subsequent analysis explicitly assigns the beginning of the superficies as the date from which the Court counts. We do not believe that such an interpretation is tenable, and there is nothing in the original Japanese version to warrant Dr. Lönholm's analysis. Take, for example, the lease of the Mascarenhas land. It was concluded in 1870, and has there already run for 29 years. Hence a Law Court could terminate it at once, if the minimum period of 20 years be counted from 1870. It is not absolutely inconceivable, of course, that the framers of the Code may have intended to confer that power on a Court. But it is very improbable. Besides, another difficulty arises. Suppose that an unlimited superficies has been running for 50 years before any application is made to a Law Court. In that case the Court would be powerless, according to Dr. Lönholm, for the maximum period within which its authority is exercisable would have terminated. The Code must be read, we think, in the sense that the period fixed by the Court dates from the time of the application. It will be interesting to see how these questions are determined in the Mascarenhas case, but, for the rest, there can be no doubt that the Code gives the lessor a right to have the duration of the lease fixed by a Law Court, and that the Courts will have to recognise the right. We do not wish to be interpreted as defending the course pursued by the Japanese throughout this affair. There appears to have been a great deal of manoeuvring, some of which was probably crooked. But the gist of the matter is that the Japanese found they had made a very bad bargain, and it is precisely against the hardship of being perpetually tied to such a bargain that the 268th Art. of the Civil Code protects a land-owner. We may note that the land in question is situated in the extra-Settlement area at Kobe, about which there has been so much talk lately. If, as has been persistently contended, land leased by foreigners within that area was on the same Conventional basis as land inside the Settlement, the heirs of Mascarenhas would be secured against the difficulties they are now encountering.

JAPANESE POLITICS.

It appears to be supposed in certain quarters that there has at length emerged upon the Japanese political stage a principle about which men may range themselves in some kind of compact phalax. That such an incident is much to be desired, can not be denied. It would puzzle the wisest man in Japan to explain the bases of political organizations at present. Ten years ago, there were some visible and intelligible materials for constructing party shibboleths. There was the agitation against the so-called "clan statesmen," and there was the clamour for liberty of speech and of public meeting. Incidentally, a great deal was heard about cutting down administrative expenditures and reducing the Land Tax. But those were side issues, and, at any rate, since the parties have endorsed schemes and expansions involving more than twice the former outlays of the State, their mouths are closed so far as these problems in their old forms are concerned. Neither will it be questioned by any candid student of the times that the anti-clan-statesmen agitation retains no shred of vitality. It is a dead issue; as thoroughly defunct as the problem of freedom of speech, which has been fully solved. The clan statesmen are still very much to the fore, and they will remain to the fore as long as they live. But it is not because of their clan connexions. It is because of their reputation, their ability, and their experience. They alone have emerged from the ten years' struggle with enhanced fame. To them the country has seen itself compelled to turn in every difficulty. If, when the contest commenced at the opening of the Diet in 1891, there seemed to be a possibility of their being pulled down permanently from their high places, the idea has now ceased to be entertained in any quarter, and the public recognises that these men are essential factors of sound and stable administration. The encounter has, indeed, been quite artistically, even picturesquely, conducted by the clan statesmen. They have preserved a calmly defensive attitude throughout. Like a skilled fencer who allows impetuous adversaries to impale themselves on his weapon, they have suffered each of the parties in succession to demonstrate the shallowness of its own political creed. Looking back now at the general features of the struggle, the salient impression we gather is that the party politicians, for the sake of union with the clan statesmen, have done the things which they previously denounced, and when the union was severed, have denounced the things that they had previously done for the sake of preserving it. Their platforms have fallen to pieces, and if they have accomplished anything it is the feat of showing that for purposes of constructive statesmanship they possess no useful recipes. What then is to be the next step? It is certain that the parties comprise many men of high ability and great organizing capacity; men whose services Japan needs. But we doubt whether the history of political evolution in any country can show a phase precisely parallel to that now existing in Japan, where no party is in a position to pretend, with the least chance of being credited, that it obeys a motive other than the ambition of capturing office. Granting the potency of that motive the world over, we nevertheless find that elsewhere it is at least associated with, if not subordinate to, some plausible principle of statesmanship, or plan of reform. But here the quondam principles of party politicians have become a by-word and their plans obsolete. We are not suggesting any intrinsic lack of morals or poverty of conception. The situation, as it presents itself to us, is that until Japan gets sufficiently tired of her progress to tolerate conservatism, there can be no genuine differentiation of political parties, and no really respectable struggles in the political arena. Some people, as we observed at the outset, seem to think that the time has come, and that the legend on the new banner will be reduction of military armaments and retrenchment of public outlays. We do not believe it. Here and there advocates of that policy have begun to raise their heads. The Progressists lost two of their most puissant leaders for its sake, and are now threatened with the loss of some lesser lances. Viscounts Tani and Soga, with their following in the Peers, constitute a little band of men ready to support the same cause, and one or two brilliant but erratic journals endorse it in a fitful kind of way. But there is that in the hearts of the Japanese people, whether they like to confess it to themselves or not, which holds them firmly to this programme of big armaments. They will not abandon it. It is not there that the materials for a new platform will be found.

DEMOCRATIC SPIRIT IN JAPAN.

The prime object of law-making and law-enforcing is to secure life and property. Theoretically speaking, there are no differences in the values of lives. So far as the protection of life is concerned, the duty of the State is the same towards every individual of the population, and every individual may claim an equal right to assist in framing and administering the laws that make his life safe. But the case is different when we come to property. The larger a man's possessions, the greater interest he has in the executive and legislative systems by which good order and public peace are preserved, and the heavier the taxes he pays, the greater weight should his voice have in regulating their employment. These fundamental principles were observed by the drafters of Japan's Local Government System in 1888 and 1890. The District Assemblies being places that have to do with the assessing and expenditure of taxes for local purposes, it was enacted that twenty-five per cent. of the members of such Assemblies should consist of, and be elected by, the chief land-owners of the locality; namely, men possessing land officially valued at ten thousand yen and upwards. There is nothing offensive to justice in such an arrangement. The inhabitants of a country may be regarded as a huge joint-stock company, the share unit being the property of the smallest taxpayer; and just as in an ordinary mercantile or manufacturing association, each share should confer a vote on its possessor, so the number of units of property held by a member of a national company should represent an equal number of legislative votes. These are academical notions, it is true, and there is seldom any practical possibility of giving effect to them. But in the local government system of Japan they received recognition, as we have just said. The owners of comparatively small lots of land, lots valued at less than ten thousand yen, elected 75 per cent. of the members of the District Assembly, and the owners of lots assessed at higher values elected the remaining 25 per cent. To that arrangement there has been constant objection on the part of the bulk of the local inhabitants. They never could persuade themselves to recognise its justice, and session after session has witnessed the introduction of bills in the Lower House for abolishing the ōjinushi seido, as the system is called. The agitation has at length succeeded. Hitherto the proposals for change came entirely from the people and were uniformly discountenanced by the Government. But now the Government itself has not only abandoned its position, but has even consented to father the desired alteration by embodying it in a bill of its own drafting. Of course the Lower House has passed the bill amid plaudits. Its fate in the Upper is uncertain: it will probably be wrecked on the familiar rock of want of time, for many measures have precedence of it. We note the incident, however, as another illustration of the democratic spirit prevailing in Japan.

QUESTIONS OF TITLES.

It is a frequent source of perplexity to foreigners to know what forms of address to adopt in writing or speaking about the members of a Japanese nobleman's family. Ought the daughter of a peer to be called "Lady So and So," and the son "the Honorable So and So," or should they be plain "Miss" and "Mr."? There is really no room for this doubt. Japanese law is explicit on the subject. It limits the title to the nobleman and his wife. His parents and his eldest son are to receive the treatment of nobles, but without titular distinction, and with regard to daughters and younger sons there is no provision whatever, so that the country's legislators evidently do not intend them to receive any title or to be distinguished from plain, every-day folk. It is at all events comfortable to know that we are not offending against any written rule or unwritten usage when we speak of a Marquis' son as simply "Mr." or his daughter as "Miss." The law from which we extract this information has just undergone revision at the hands of the House of Peers, but the amendments were made with closed doors, and as they have not yet received the Imperial sanction we can not speak about them with any assurance. If, however, they passed in the shape given to them by the Special Committee, one great disability under which the daughters of noblemen now labour will perhaps be remedied. A female can not, according to the present law, succeed to a title of nobility. The Throne, as our readers probably know, is similarly interdicted to female occupants. Japan can not have a reigning Empress. She may have a female regent, when there is no prince to fill the post, but the sceptre can not be wielded by a woman. Neither can there be, under existing rules, a peeress in her own right. The latter restriction is singular from a Japanese point of view, because an ordinary family name may be perpetuated by a woman. There are, indeed, special facilities of that nature in this country. A woman is competent to establish herself as the head of a house, and in that capacity to take a husband who adopts her family name and plays a subordinate rôle in her legal life. A husband married under such circumstances is called ninshu, and if he be a foreigner, he acquires Japanese nationality. Such, at least, is the present rule, and such also is the rule which the Government has adopted in framing the new Law of Nationalization. The House of Representatives, however, has changed the Law in the sense that a foreigner becoming a ninshu shall not acquire Japanese nationality, and it remains to be seen whether the House of Peers will endorse the alteration. That is a question apart, however. Our point here is that although an untitled female may become the head of a house and may perpetuate its name, a titled female does not enjoy the same privilege. The amended Peers Law does not explicitly remove the ineligibility of a nobleman's daughter to succeed to a title, but its provisions seem to us to be not incapable of interpretation in that sense, whereas no such interpretation is possible in the case of the present law. It would certainly redound to the credit of Japan's system if such discriminations against women were abandoned. We say nothing about the Throne, though we note that some of its greatest occupants in ancient times were females. But a peer's title ought not to be above a woman's right. In this matter Japan and Occidental countries are in the same category, so there is room, not for special criticism, but only for an aspiration. We do think, however, that the sons and daughter of peers might advantageously be given a distinctive appellation. Of course it will be understood that we are speaking here of nobles only; that is to say, bearers of the five titles Prince (not of the Blood), Marquis, Count, Viscount and Baron. All the children of Princes of the Blood are Princes or Princesses, and the rule holds good through all generations, though from the fifth downwards they lose the distinction of being "Imperial." Some of these days Japan will have as many Princes as Russia has. We wonder how they will be supported. It would shock the sentiment of the nation that a Prince of Imperial Blood should work for his living. Of course under the old regimen there were innumerable examples of that kind of thing. Indeed, there is scarcely a hereditary noble in Japan who can not trace his lineage direct to an occupant of the Throne, and there are many commoners who could do as much if their social position did not impose silence. But then, under the old regimen the title of "Prince" was not perpetuated by law. It had, indeed, no element of perpetuity, for the term was applied to the sons of the Sovereign only, their sons and sons' sons having no such distinction. The Imperial House Law has rectified that omission, whether wisely or unwisely is another question. There is another point which deserves notice in speaking of the Peers Law. In its present form it provides that a title of nobility becomes extinct if, at the time of its holder's death, no heir has been duly nominated. Posthumous children are thus debarred, which seems a strange arrangement. The rule was found to work hardly in the case of the late Count Katsu, for though he left a daughter, and though he had often expressed his wish and intention to adopt one of the sons of his former feudal lord, Prince Tokugwa Keiki, and make him his daughter's husband, he had not complied with the necessary formalities before his death, and the title would have lapsed unless the Emperor had made a special exception. The Law has now been amended so as to confer the inheritance on an heir nominated within a year after the death of the noble whom he succeeds, and it is probable that the Emperor will endorse the amendment.

MORTGAGES OF IMMOVABLES BY FOREIGNERS.

It has been observed, of course, that many projects of law submitted to the Diet during its present session are connected, directly or indirectly, with the operation of the Revised Treaties. Hitherto Japanese legislators were not required to take account of their country's jurisdiction being extended to foreigners, and it is consequently found necessary to alter or supplement many of their enactments in order to bring them into touch with the conditions that will exist after next July. Thus we have had amendments in the sense of opening the field of Japanese journalism to foreigners; of enabling foreigners to practise medicine on the strength of a foreign diploma; of dispensing with the use of stamps (natsuin) by foreigners on legal documents; of extending to foreigners the system of succour in litigation; of providing for such a division of capital as shall relieve foreign insurance companies and banks from paying an excessive business tax, and so on. To this list may now be added a Bill just submitted to the Diet for amending the Civil Code. It is known to most of our readers that a foreigner is entitled to acquire a mortgage on an immovable, and that the mortgage confers on him the same rights as though he were a Japanese subject. By way of parenthesis, we may mention that this provision is regarded by some persons as a means by which the veto against foreign ownership of land may be practically overcome. A foreigner, they say, can acquire a mortgage on land, and then by foreclosure—easily arrangeable with the proprietor of the land—can obtain permanent possession of the land so far as concerns its use for building or other purposes. That theory seems to us to be based on a defective knowledge of law. A mortgagee in Japan can not, by virtue of his mortgage, obtain any right of possession. If the debt secured by the mortgage is not paid at maturity, action for foreclosure must be brought in a Law Court, and the latter then orders a public sale of the property involved. It results, therefore, that a foreign mortgagee is not more favorably situated for obtaining possession than any other foreigner. At all events, the notion underlying the above theory appears very clumsy and quite superfluous. The propounders of the theory do not contemplate ownership of the land, but only possession of it for building purposes, and that can be obtained for a hundred or five hundred years in the form of a superficies. The amendments of the Civil Code which, as we have said, have just been submitted to the Diet, refer to articles 384 and 900. The former has to do with the removal of mortgages. For example, A has acquired property carrying a mortgage in favour of B. Desiring to remove the mortgage, A offers a certain sum to B. If B deems the offer too low, he may demand a public sale of the property, but in adopting the latter course he must pledge himself to buy the property at a price at least 10 per cent. higher than the sum offered by B in satisfaction of the debt, should the public sale fail to produce that price, and he must give security that he will do so. The clause of article 384 bearing on this question, says:—

A creditor who demands a sale by auction for the sake of obtaining a higher price, must state that he will himself buy the immovable at a price of one-tenth higher than that offered by the purchaser in case such price or a higher price is not obtained at the auction. In such case the creditor must give security for the price and expenses.

Now, inasmuch as a foreigner can not own land, the above provision is not applicable to him, and it follows that a foreign mortgagee is at the mercy of a dishonest debtor, for the latter may make a nominal sale of the immovable to a third party, and the new owner can force the foreign mortgagee to compound the debt, since he can not himself be forced to submit to the test of public sale. The Government Bill proposes to amend the Article in the sense that a foreign mortgagee need not undertake to buy the immovable at a price ten per cent. higher than the sum offered to him in liquidation, but shall merely make himself responsible for the difference between that price and the price actually obtained at auction, as well as for the expenses of the sale. For example, A, a foreigner, holds a mortgage for 1,500 yen on a property which B has purchased. B offers 1,000 yen to remove the mortgage. A declines and demands a public sale. The property, being put up to auction, fetches only 900 yen. Then A is debited with 200 yen plus the expenses involved in the sale.

The amendment of Art. 900 is of trifling interest. The second clause of the Article runs:—

If the person (ie. the head of a house) who loses his nationality has rights which only a Japanese subject can hold, these fall to the heir of the house, unless the former head assigns them to a Japanese subject within a year.

This is supplemented so as to read that the rights fall to the heir of the house or to the nearest relative, and that if neither the heir nor the nearest relative can lawfully hold the rights, and if they are not assigned to a Japanese subject within a year, they revert to the Treasury.

JAPANESE CHARACTER PAINTED BY A JAPANESE.

A pessimist's views about his fellow-mortals must usually be taken with all reserve. The Mainichi Shimbun's mood has been very pessimistic lately, and we regard its columns, therefore, with a certain amount of scepticism. Still the editor is a man of great eminence, and, although his judgment may have been temporarily warped by political experiences of an exceptional nature affecting him personally, no opinion expressed by such a writer is unworthy of notice. He says that the Japanese are deficient in the self governing faculty, and that they are without breadth of view. When they are in positions of authority they abuse their power to control others, and when they are in positions of inferiority they prostitute their judgment to their interests. No high plane of civilization can be reached by men of that mould. Having thus condemned his own countrymen, the writer passes on to the Anglo-Saxon, whom he describes as a person without any desire to rule others and with a strong objection to be ruled by others. Very complimentary to the Anglo-Saxon. But can he justly appropriate the praise? When did he free himself of the masterful ways, the innate love of empire, which have proved as useful to him in his career of conquest, whether commercial or military, as his inveterate objection to be mastered by any one else? That by way of parenthesis, however. The Mainichi proceeds to synthesise the records. The history of the Orient, it says, reveals only two kinds of peoples, despots and slaves. You can not escape from the evidence of history: it is conclusive. Every nation has the kind of government it deserves. The Japanese are brave. Of that there can be no doubt. But if you want to see how they interpret the uses of bravery, consult the chronicles of the Shikoden, where you can read what fine ends the hundred and eight bandits achieved by their courage, and if you then remember that these are the ideals proposed to himself by a Japanese, you can form an estimate of his moral standard.

SHILLY SHALLY DEVICES.

One of the Government's most recent steps has been to invite the Diet to remove the restriction upon foreign ownership of bourse-shares. This measure is heartily welcomed by a prominent Japanese journal, not for the sake of liberality—if, indeed, it can be called liberal—but because it seems to open a route for the advent of foreign capital. Most of us have become somewhat weary of this talk about the introduction of foreign capital, but the subject remains perennially interesting to Japanese, which is not wonderful, seeing that their industrial progress is virtually checked for lack of cheap money. How, then, is the privilege of owning bourse-shares likely to encourage foreign investors to seek employment for their money in Japan? The explanation given is that, in their capacity of bourse shareholders, they will become familiar with Japanese securities, and will develop a desire to acquire them. That appears to us to be a naïve notion. The commonest belief among the Japanese is that foreigners are ignorant of their affairs. "Unacquainted with the conditions of the country" used to be a kind of stock epithet for foreigners in the columns of Japanese journals, and though that precise form of expression is becoming obsolete, the idea that inspired it is entertained just as firmly as ever. "Only let the foreigner learn what Japanese shares are, what kind of dividends are paid on them, and how flourishing are the enterprises they represent, and he will open his purse-strings." Such is the notion. We are sorry to be obliged to disagree with it in toto. The Japanese would probably be greatly surprised if they obtained an insight into the knowledge that foreigners already possess of their affairs. We grant readily that neither in Yokohama nor in Kobe, nor yet in London, Paris, or Berlin, is there a very accurate acquaintance with Japan's national finances. The Japanese officials who compile the Budgets and keep the State's accounts, appear to be entirely indifferent whether foreigners understand or misapprehend the empire's pecuniary record, and, without their active assistance, the individual foreigner finds immense difficulty in obtaining information. But the affairs of Japanese commercial and industrial companies are very closely watched, not for the sake of the abstract interest they inspire, but because of the possibility that they may offer means of making money. We doubt whether there is as much as one Japanese enterprise that has not been keenly scrutinized by the shrewd, watchful foreigner, always ready to avail himself of every legitimate avenue to wealth. But no Japanese shares, whatever the quantity of gilt upon their edges, will tempt investors until the latter can obtain not merely a voice, but a controlling voice, in the management of the enterprises concerned. It would give us great satisfaction to be able to write in a different strain, but to conceal the truth would be distinctly mischievous, and the truth is that foreigners do not believe in the soundness of Japanese enterprises or in the integrity of those to whom their management is entrusted. Granting, as we ourselves confidently believe, that this scepticism is exaggerated, that in the majority of cases it has no valid basis, the unfortunate fact is none the less incontrovertible. The average for-reign capitalist would as soon think of putting his money into a Japanese Company whose books he can not inspect, whose management he can not take part in, and whose methods are beyond his scrutiny, as he would think of shipping merchandise in vessels not surveyed by Lloyds and not eligible for insurance. The Japanese will probably receive these statements with some indignation. They are very disagreeable statements, and, in a sense, very rude. But they are certainly not intended to be either unpleasant or discourteous. We are impelled to make them when we find a prominent vernacular journal deluding itself and its readers with hopes that such a device as opening the ownership of bourse shares to foreigners will create a market for Japanese securities abroad. It will do nothing of the kind.

POSTS, TELEGRAPHS, TELEPHONES AND RAILWAYS.

The cost of all these vehicles of communication has now been raised. The postage on mail matter of the first class becomes 3 sen, instead of 2 sen, for any weight up to 4 momme, and 3 sen for every additional 4 momme or fraction of that weight. The charge on second class mail matter—post cards—becomes 1.5 sen, and the charge for a return card, 3 sen.

With regard to telegrams, the minimum charge is to be 20 sen for a message not exceeding 15 kana syllables, and 5 sen for every additional 5 syllables, or fraction of 5. Messages in a foreign language will cost 25 sen up to 5 words, and 5 sen for each additional word. These rates carry a message to any part of Japan. Within the limits of a town, the corresponding charges are 10 sen and 3 sen for a Japanese telegram, and 15 sen and 3 sen for a foreign telegram. The name and address of the sender are counted, but the name and address of the receiver are not charged for, unless there is more than one receiver, or unless more than one address is given—as when the telegram has to be sent from place to place after a traveller whose whereabouts is not certainly known to the sender. It appears, however, that in the case of a foreign telegram, all the names and addresses are to be charged for, which means that the whole of the minimum limit will probably embrace nothing more than these preliminaries. The charge for special delivery will be 20 sen for any distance not exceeding 3 ri, and 6 sen for every additional half ri, or fraction of it. This last charge is, in our sense, less than the present rate of 12 sen per ri.
